235 work a discontinuance as *effectually as a feoffment. Co. Litt. 328, a, 329, b, 330, a, note 1, and Doe v. Prestwidge, 4 Mau. & Selw. 178. The expression of Coke (Co. Litt. 329, a,) "it is not a warranty only that maketh a discontinuance, but the warranty and the descent upon him that right hath together," induced me to think, at one time, that the discontinuance did not take place until the actual descent of the warranty, and, of course, until the death of tenant in tail. But farther examination and reflection have caused me to change that opinion, and I am now inclined to believe, that the warranty operates an immediate discontinuance in all cases, where, if the tenant in tail were to die at the moment of making the conveyance, the obligation of the warranty, and the right to the estate tail, would devolve upon the same person. I think so, because, in all such cases, the warranty operates as wrongfully in relation to the issue, as the mere feoffment of tenant in tail, and, indeed, more so: for while the feoffment only drives the issue to his action, the warranty goes farther, and will rebut him, if he have assets by descent. This opinion seems to derive strength from the consideration, that all the cases put by Littleton, to shew that warranty alone will not effect a discontinuance, are cases where, at the time of the conveyance, the heir to the warranty, and the heir to the estate tail, were not the same persons. In the case now before us, at the time of the execution of the deed from Prudence Harbour (she then having issue) the same person would, unquestionably, have been heir to the warranty, and to the estate tail. I am, therefore, of opinion, that that deed operated a discontinuance, immediately; or, in other words, turned it to a right; or, to speak more accurately, to a right of action.

Thus far, it will be seen that, I agree intirely to the preliminary propositions of the counsel for the appellees.

How far the right to the estate tail, is, after a discontinuance, and during the life of tenant in tail, placed in abeyance, I feel myself unable to decide. The books are very contradictory on this point.

Littleton § 649, 650, and Coke's 236 *commentary on them, seem to me to indicate, that it is in abeyance. But there are strong opinions to the contrary. In Sheffield v. Ratcliffe, Hob. 335, it is said, that "the feoffment of tenant in tail, gives away all the estates the tenant in tail feoffor had, as concerning himself, or any benefit that he may receive. But, as concerning his issue inheritable to the entail, and for their good, there remains in him a right of that entail, by force of the statute of Westm. 2, for the good of those that are saved by that statute against his alienation." Again (Ibid. 336,) "a tenant in tail hath the whole estate tail and all the right of it in himself, and may finally and totally bar it, as well against the issue, as against himself, by a common recovery, notwithstanding this statute; but by a feoffment he could not, by reason of this statute. And, therefore, that chief and mere right [which though it be discontinued is not barred by the feoffment] remains where it was not aliened; for it is not in his power by that kind of conveyance." Again (Ibid. 338,) "that there is still a right in the tenant in tail against this feoffment, appears in that he hath still power to bind it more finally and totally, by his fine or recovery, if he pursue them rightly." And (Ibid. 339,) "Littleton was confounded in himself that made an abeyance of a tenant of totum statum suum, and yet made it but an estate for life." And in the case of Stone v. Newman, in the exchequer chamber, Cro. Car. 427, six of the judges of England said, that "although a feoffment by tenant in fee simple gives all estates, interests and rights, yet it is not so in case of a feoffment made by tenant in tail; because the estate tail is an incident inseparable to his person and blood, and cannot be transferred to any other."

But whether the right to the estate tail, after a discontinuance, and during the life of tenant in tail, be in abeyance, or lie dormant in the tenant in tail, it is absolutely certain, that the tenant in tail, after such discontinuance, has the right and the power, with the assistance and co-operation of his alienee, to suffer a common recovery, which will enure

Thus stands the law in England, and thus stood the law in this country, before the act of 1776; except that fines and recoveries were prohibited as early as 1705, and were never afterwards tolerated. But, although estates tail were not permitted to be barred by fines and recoveries, other modes were introduced for accomplishing that effect; namely, writs of ad quod damnum where the estate was of less value than £200. sterling; and private acts of assembly, in each particular case, where the estate was of greater value. An examination of our statute book will shew, that these private acts were applied to docking estates tail, in every variety of circumstance or situation, in which a common recovery could be resorted to in England, for that purpose. Sometimes the entail was docked in favour of the tenant in tail himself, by vesting the entailed lands in him in fee simple; Nov. 1769, ch. 73, 8 Hen. stat. at large, 448. Sometimes it was docked in favour of a person to whom the tenant in tail had previously contracted to sell it; February 1772, ch. 77, 78, Id. 641, 643. The act of Nov. 1769, ch. 77, Id. 455, presents a very striking case, bearing a strong resemblance to the case before us. It is as follows: Richard Johnson, being seized of lands in tail, with divers remainders over, conveyed the same by indenture bearing date June 7, 1744, to John Robinson, who, with others claiming under him, remained in possession until November 1769. It being then discovered that Johnson had only an estate tail in the lands, and that the purchasers were likely to be disturbed in their title, and the said Johnson and his family involved in law suits on that account (from which it is manifest that he sold with warranty) an application was made to the legislature, in the year 1769, (twenty-five years after the sale, and while the discontinuance worked by the warranty was still in force); whereupon an act was passed docking 238 *the estate tail, and vesting the entailed lands in the purchasers under Johnson.

I come now to the construction of the statute of October 1776, docking entails. Its title is "an act declaring tenants of lands or slaves in tail, to hold the same in fee simple;" and its preamble shews, that it was enacted in lieu of the former methods of docking such estates tail. The counsel for the appellees contend, that this statute does not embrace the case of an estate tail that was discontinued, so long as the discontinuance remains in force. They say that the words of the statute "hath, or hereafter may have an estate tail in any lands or slaves in possession," and the subsequent words, "shall from henceforth, or from the commencement of such estate tail, stand ipso facto seized," &c. require that the tenant in tail, in whose favour the statute is to operate, should, at the time, be seized of an estate tail in possession &c. If I felt myself bound to give the statute a strict and technical construction, I confess I could not deny the correctness of this position. But what would be the consequence of such a construction? If it be adopted, it will not only exclude the case of a tenant in tail who had discontinued the entail, and the case of an estate tail abated by the entry of a stranger, on the death of tenant in tail, but it would also exclude the case of a tenant in tail who was disseized. For, a tenant in tail disseized is certainly not seized of the estate tail. Strictly and technically speaking, even his estate is turned to a right: a right of entry. 1 Prest. est. 20, 21; Goodright v. Forester, 1 Taunt. 578. And if the statute did not operate on the estate of tenant in tail, who had discontinued or who was disseized, so as to turn it into a fee simple at the very moment of the enactment, when did it operate on it so as to produce that effect? It was contended in the argument, that the estate tail must be restored by the entry of the tenant in tail, in case of disseizin, or by the formedon of the issue or remainderman, in the case of a discontinuance, and that when it was thus restored as a fee tail, the statute would instantaneously act upon it and convert it *into a fee simple. I can perceive nothing in the statute to justify this pretension. It alludes to two periods only for its operation; namely, the time of the passage of the act, and the commencement of the estate tail. But according to the construction contended for, it did not operate, at the time of its passage, upon an estate tail that was, at that time, turned into a right of entry or a right of action. And if it did not operate on it at that time, it cannot operate on it at the time the fee tail is restored by entry or action; for that is not the commencement of the estate tail. It had commenced long before, and was never annihilated. The most that can be contended for is, that it was suspended or in abeyance, by the discontinuance. The removal of the discontinuance is the restoration, or reanimation of the estate tail, not its commencement. It, certainly, is not the "commencement" of the estate tail, according to a strict construction of the statute; and the advocates of a strict construction, have no right to insist upon it as to one clause, and upon a liberal construction as to another. Here then, would be two classes of estates tail, those restored by entry, and those restored by action, on which the statute would never operate; to which we might add those cases where the estate tail was under a mortgage at the date of the act. Can any man read the preamble of this statute, and believe that this was the intention of the legislature? It is a law founded on great principles of national policy. It is a highly remedial statute, intended to remove great political and moral mischief. So far from being restricted to a rigid technical construction, according to the letter, I feel myself compelled to construe it according to its spirit, and thus to bring within the scope of its operation all cases that come within the mischief intended to be provided against. The division of estates, into estates in possession, remainder and reversion, comprehends every estate whatever; so far at least as relates to the time at which they confer the right of enjoyment. 1 Prest. est. 23. When, therefore, the legislature declared that all persons having any of these descriptions of es-240 tates tail, should *from thenceforth be seized thereof in fee simple, it thought not of technicality; it thought not of the particular situation in which persons having rights to estates tail, might be accidentally placed, in relation to those estates: it was contemplating, in all their extent, the various mischiefs which it was its object to remove; it intended, that all estates tail should be thenceforth converted into fee simple.

Mr. Pendleton, than whom no man was better acquainted with the history of our legislation, informs us, in Carter v. Tyler, that "the great subject of discussion, in the legislature in the year 1776, was, whether they should restore the fine and recovery, which was objected to on account of its fictitious nature, and the trouble and expense attending it; but the principal objection was, that it would permit the tenants to continue what was considered as a mischief; and that those who possessed the large estates, would have an inclination to continue them in their families." It cannot be supposed, that the legislature was ignorant of the nature of common recoveries, and of the power of the donee in tail who had discontinued the estate tail, to suffer a common recovery with the assistance and co-operation of the person who had the freehold; and that such recovery would operate to corroborate and confirm the estate of his alienee, and to bar the issue in tail, and the reversioner and remainderman. It cannot be believed, that it had forgotten its own practice of docking estates tail, by private acts, in favour of the persons to whom the tenants in tail had sold with warranty; and that the effect of such docking was to vest the fee simple in the alienee. When, therefore, we perceive, in the preamble of the statute of 1776, the deep conviction of the legislature of the evils of estates tail, and its strong determination to annihilate them, even in opposition to the wishes of those interested in them, can we believe, that the new mode of docking estates tail, which they adopted in preference to all former modes, was intended to be less extensive in its application, and less efficacious in its operation, than the former modes were? To my mind it is impossible. 241 *I cannot doubt but that this statute was intended to operate as one great universal recovery, and to dock all estates tail whatever; those created before the enactment, instantar and ipso facto; those to be thereafter created, from the moment of their commencement. And such was the construction given to the first statute of 1776, by the legislature, in the revised statutes of 1785 and 1792. For, in these, they drop all the expressions of the act of 1776, which gave rise to any doubt on the subject, and adopt the broadest term known to our language: "Every estate in lands or slaves which on the 7th October 1776, was an estate tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and from thenceforward to continue an estate in fee simple."

But, it is said, there are consequences resulting from this construction, which the legislature could not have intended; and it is thence inferred, that the construction is unsound. The premises must be established, before we can be required to assent to the conclusion. Those, who urge this argument, suppose the following case, namely, that tenant in tail had discontinued, and then died before the statute of 1776; or that he had been disseized and then died after the right of entry was tolled, but before the passing of the statute; or that a tenant in tail had died, and that a stranger had abated, before the enactment: and they then assert, that, if these rights to estates tail were converted by the statute of 1776, into rights to estates in fee simple, neither the issue in tail nor the remainderman entitled to them, could recover them by formedon in the descender or remainder; and that they could not recover them by writ of right, because they could not count upon their own seizin, or that of their ancestors, in their demesne as of fee.

I cannot subscribe to the correctness of the position as to the writ of formedon. Coke says, "the writ of formedon, a forma donationis, is so called because the writ doth comprehend the form of the gift." It has no reference to the nature of the estate which it seeks to recover; for, it is applied as well to the recovery of estates 242 in fee simple, as of *estates in fee tail. Formedon in the reverter lay at common law for the donor, after the failure of the issue of tenant in fee conditional at the common law; and after the statute de donis, it lay for the reversioner, after the failure of issue in tail. Plowd. 235, a. Booth, 154, 3 Tho. Co. Litt. p. 118, note D, and page 214, note N. And both at common law, and since the statute de donis, the estates recovered by the formedon in the reverter, were estates in fee simple. Formedons in remainder were unknown to the common law, but were given by an equitable construction of the statute de donis; and they are given as well to a remainderman in fee, as to a remainderman in tail. Fitzherbert says, "the writ of formedon in the remainder lieth where a man giveth lands to one in tail, the remainder unto another in tail, and afterwards the first tenant in tail dieth without issue of his body, and a stranger doth abate and deforce him in the remainder; he in the remainder or his heirs shall have that writ of formedon in remainder. And so, if the first tenant in tail alieneth in fee, and dieth without issue of his body begotten, he in the remainder in fee, shall have a writ of formedon in remainder, to recover his estate &c." F. N. B. 217. As to formedons in descender, it is true that since the statute de donis they have not been used in England, except for the recovery of estates tail; the reason of which is very obvious, namely, that none but the issue in tail can claim by descent per formam doni, and they always take an estate tail: yet there was one instance, at common law, in which even the formedon in the descender lay for the recovery of a fee simple. "As, if a man had issue a son, and his wife died, and afterwards he took another wife, and land was given to him and his second wife, and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, and they had another son, and the wife died, and afterwards the father died, and a stranger abated; there, before the statute, the son could not have a mort d'ancestor; for one part of the writ is to inquire if the demandant be next heir to his father, and that, he is not, but the eldest son is the next heir; for which 243 reason, such *writ would not serve upon his title, and therefore, before the statute he should have a formedon in descender, which was no other than a writ founded on his case." Plowd. 239, b.

Thus we see, that every species of writs of formedon has been used for the recovery of fee simple estates. There is no incompatibility, therefore, in resorting to them.

now, for the recovery of estates in fee simple, (made such by the statute of 1776), in all those cases where they would have been the appropriate remedy, had the estates remained estates tail. The enlargement of the estates into fee simple, makes no difference. In the language of the case in Plowden, the formedon is still "no other than a writ founded on his case." And so the legislature must have understood it; for it has, since the statute of 1776, continued to prescribe the limitation of all the writs of formedon; thus shewing its opinion, that they are actions which may still be brought. It has enlarged the estate, but left the remedy unchanged. If the parties in the supposed cases, could recover by writs of formedon (as, I think, is evident) it is unnecessary to inquire, whether, if they could not thus recover, they might recover by writ of right founded on the statute.

If this view of the subject be correct, the argument drawn from the supposed consequences of our construction, falls to the ground.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the statute of 1776, docked the entail of the land in controversy, and that, as the saving clause saves the rights of all persons other than the issue in tail and those in remainder and reversion, such docking of the entail enured to corroborate and confirm the fee simple which passed by the deed of Prudence Harbour; and that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed with costs, and judgment entered for the appellant.

BROOKE, P., concurred.

244 *GREEN, J., dissented. He said, no other question like that presented in this case, would ever, in all probability, occur hereafter; and differing with his brethren, but with great diffidence, he should, therefore, not discuss at large, the questions which had been so elaborately argued at the bar, but state the result of his examination of them as succinctly as possible.

The deeds of lease and release with warranty, made by Prudence, the ancestor of the appellees, in 1769, divested her of the estate tail, and of all right present or future: she had no longer jus in re nor jus ad rem: she was, thereafter, incapable of receiving an effectual release of the reversion, and under no circumstances could she be remitted to the estate tail. Her estate being a fee tail general, and necessarily to descend with the warranty to the issue in tail, that warranty operated as an immediate discontinuance, converting the estate tail into a mere right, and putting that in abeyance, necessarily to remain, upon her death, to the issue in tail if any, and if none to those in reversion, not as an estate to be reduced to possession by entry, but a right to be asserted by a writ of formedon only, unless that right was barred, in her lifetime and before it vested, by some lawful means. That might be done in England, in such a case, by a common recovery with double voucher, both as to the issue and those in reversion and remainder; and, as to the issue, by a fine only; neither of which passed any new or additional interest from the tenant in tail, but only operated as estoppels, corroborating the first conveyance incidentally, by barring the right of the issue &c. as the case might be, even although the recoveree in the recovery, or cognizee in the fine were utter strangers to the first conveyance. But in Virginia, those rights could not be barred by either of those methods, that being expressly prohibited by statute, and there were no means of barring them but by special act of assembly.

That is said to have been the effect of our statutes of 1776 and 1785 converting estates tail into fee simple, or of 245 *the statute of 1792 repealing the statute de donis with all other english statutes.

The statute of 1776, in terms, applies only to estates tail in possession, or in reversion or remainder after an estate for life or a lesser estate. And neither Prudence, nor Vandever, or indeed any other person, had any such estate in possession, remainder, or reversion, at the passing of the statute, or at any time since. The saving of the rights of all persons other than the issue in tail and those in reversion or remainder, is an exception in favour of the rights of strangers, in the cases embraced in the enacting clause, leaving it to operate in the cases provided for, as to the issue and those in reversion or remainder, as if there were no saving whatever, or as if the enacting clause had been concluded by a declaration, that in all such cases the issue in tail and those in reversion and remainder should be absolutely barred of all right. The present case certainly does not come within the literal terms of that statute.

The act of 1785 is in more general terms. It provides, "That every estate which on 7th October 1776, was an estate tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and thenceforward to continue, an estate in fee simple: and every estate, which since hath been limited, so that, as the law aforetime was, such an estate would have been an estate tail, shall also be deemed to have been and to continue an estate in fee simple: And all estates which before 7th October 1776, by the law, if it remained unaltered, would have been estates in fee tail, and which now by virtue of this act, are and will be estates in fee simple, shall from that time [Oct. 1776] and henceforth be discharged of the conditions annexed thereto by the common law, restraining alienations before the donee shall have issue; so that the donees, or persons in whom the conditional fees vested, or shall vest, had and shall have the same power over the said estates as if they were pure and absolute fees." In strictness, the right in question was not an estate tail in October 1776, the estate having been divested and turned 246 to a mere right by the *conveyance of 1769. And the absolute power over such estates (as over a pure and absolute fee) is declared to have been, or thereafter to be, in him in whom the estate was vested in October 1776, or in him in whom it had since been or might thereafter be vested. The right in question was not vested in Prudence, in October 1776, or at any time thereafter; and if such a right was converted by the statute into a right of fee simple, it remained in this new character, as in its former, a right vested in no one during the life of Prudence, and vested upon her death in her children, converted into a fee simple. But I do not think, that either statute, in its terms, affected any estate or right not vested in some one, nor until it was vested; and then and then only operated upon the vested estate, and converted it into a fee simple. If it had been intended to affect rights in abeyance, the language of the statutes would not have left that doubtful.

Nor do I think that the case comes within the equity of the statutes. The purpose of the legislature was to suppress an extensive public mischief, the perpetuation of property in particular families by entails; a practice greatly encouraged by our previous legislation. This object was completely effected, by giving an unlimited power of alienation, prospectively, to those then or thereafter possessed or entitled to entailed property, without ratifying their acts already done, which when done were unlawful, and which could not be rendered valid, by any act in their power without the aid of a legislative act. These cases were, moreover, very rare; and in those which existed, the fee simple right and power of alienation would be suspended only during a life in being; within the period universally allowed for executory limitations in favour of family settlements. And general laws are usually considered as providing for those cases which most frequently occur.

It was objected, that if the appellees are entitled, they are entitled as fee simple owners; and, therefore, cannot maintain a writ of formedon. My brother Cabell has shewn that a writ of formedon in 247 descender as well as in reverter *would lie at common law for the recovery of a fee simple estate, whenever a writ of right would not lie. And here, if the appellees were entitled in fee simple, they could not maintain a writ of right, as they could not allege a seizin in demense as of fee, either in themselves, or their ancestor from whom they claim by descent as heirs. They can claim only per formam doni. So that, whether the right cast upon them was a right in fee tail, or fee simple, it could only be asserted in a writ of formedon.

The statute of 1792, abrogating the english statutes, expressly saves all rights arising under any such statute at any time before the commencement of the act, in the same condition in all respects as if the act had never been made. The saving is not confined to vested rights, but extends to all of every possible description; and, consequently, to the right in this case then existing and in abeyance.

As to the question, whether the heir of Prudence at the common law, or her heirs under our statute of descents, would be entitled, if either; the settled doctrine is, that the estate tail goes to the heir of the body who would inherit the land entailed, if his ancestor held the same land in fee: as, if gavelkind land is entailed, it goes to all the sons; if borough-english, to the youngest; and if the tenure of the land so entailed, is changed to the common law tenure, it goes, afterwards, to the heir at the common law, the eldest son. So here, whoever by our general law of descents, would be entitled to inherit the land, if the ancestor held in fee, are entitled to claim as heirs in tail per formam doni, if the heirs in tail have any right.

Upon the whole, if left to my own judgment, I should be of opinion to affirm the judgment of the circuit court, but with considerable doubt, much increased by the strong opinions of my brethren to the contrary.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the tenant.

248 *Commonwealth v. Hudgin.

June, 1880.

Administrators—Appointment—Jurisdiction. *—A resident of Kentucky dies intestate there, having no estate in Virginia but a claim on this commonwealth for money: Held, the circuit court of Henrico county, wherein is the seat of government, has jurisdiction to grant administration of such decedent's estate.

Hudgin applied to the circuit court of Henrico, for administration of the estate of Walter Graham deceased, who died in the state of Kentucky intestate, leaving no other estate in Virginia but a claim against the commonwealth, for compensation for military service rendered by him, as an officer of the state line, during the war of the revolution. Hudgin produced a written instrument executed by the widow of the intestate, in due form, relinquishing her right to the administration. The attorney general contested the grant of administration to Hudgin, on the ground, that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to grant administration in such a case; and that the jurisdiction appertained solely to the general court. The circuit court held that it had jurisdiction, and granted the administration to Hudgin. And, there being many similar applications to the circuit court for administration, in like cases, the attorney general, in order that the question as to the jurisdiction of that court in such cases, might be definitively settled, appealed to this court.

The case was argued by the attorney general for the commonwealth, and Green and Leigh for the appellees. The question depended intirely on the construction and effect of the statutes, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 67, § 10, p. 222, ch. 104, § 12, 16, 32, pp. 377, 378, 382.

PER CURIAM. The jurisdiction of our courts of probat and administration, is prescribed with so much precision by our statutes, that there is no occasion to resort to the english doctrines on that subject, except so far as to ascertain the meaning of the phrase in our statutes, referring, 249 in certain cases, *to "the county or corporation, in" which the estate of the intestate, or the greater part thereof, shall be," as a criterion of jurisdiction. That is the rule to be applied to this case. There is no case in point in the english courts, the supreme power there residing in a natural person. But, resorting to the analogies of the english law, we may safely say, that the place, where a debt, constituting the whole of the estate, must be demanded and paid or prosecuted, and where all the documentary proofs constituting the foundation of the claim are found, is that in which the estate is; and, therefore, that the administration in question was duly granted. The order is affirmed.

THOS. SHARP [seal]"

This brought the testator to the very bottom of the paper, so that there was no room even to insert the date, which was inserted with the testator's name, above, in the blank left on the right hand of the small legacies, with a different pen and ink, apparently, from that with which the body of the instrument was written. On the other side of the paper was written the following words:

"And my wife Mary the half of the land I live on if she dont mary if she maryes her liveng and her choice of my slaves her lifetime.

THOS. SHARP Feb. 12. 1825."

The blank between the words "Hugh" and "dollars" in the 3d line was produced by blotting out something that had been there written; and the figures "30 s." at the end of that line, seemed to have been written with the same pen and ink with which the figures "30 s." and "5 s." were written at the end of the 10th and 11th lines. The blank between the words "John Sharp" and "dollars" in the 10th line, was also produced by blotting out something that had been there written. The words of the 11th line were, originally, but the final s was struck from the word "sons," and the words "and John — dollars each of them," were struck out with a pen and "5 s." inserted at the end of the line. Instead of the words "Loose and children my slaves," in the sequel of the instrument, the testator had first written "Loose and George my slaves;" but the name "George" was struck out, and the word "children" interlined above it, with the same pen and ink (it seemed) with which the codicil was written; the testator having, as it was proved, sold the slave George after June 1817, the date on the face of the paper. After the words "my executors" at the end of the instrument, and before the testator's signature, he had at first inserted the names of three executors, viz. Little Matthew Willson, Robert [surname illegible] and James Black, which he afterwards obliterated with his pen. The date and signature (viz. June 15, 1817, Thos. Sharp) inserted in the blank on the right hand of the small legacies, appeared to have been written with a different pen and ink from the body of the instrument, and with the same pen and ink as the words "the blacksmith 30 s." in the 11th line. And the words "my extors Andrew Thompson and old Matthew Willson," appeared to have been written with the same pen and ink with which the codicil of February 12, 1825, by which he made the provision for his wife, was written.*

251 ——— dollars *each of them;"

*This description of the instrument was extracted substantially, from the opinion of COALTER, J., who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court.—Note in Original Edition.

The testator died in the early part of the year 1826.

It was proved, 1. That the testator married some years after the first date on the face of the will; and the marriage gave occasion to the codicil whereby provision was made for the wife.

2. That the day after the interment of the testator, several respectable neighbours were called on by James Black his brother-in-law to examine his papers, to see whether he had left a will; and they found the 252 paper in question in an *old pocket book in the desk of the deceased, with some other papers, namely, clerk's tickets and sheriff's receipts; but it was not examined very critically by the persons then present, who regarding it as a paper of no importance, put it back where they found it: and that Joseph Brown who was not present on that occasion, and who believed there was no will, took administration of the estate of the deceased, as an intestate: but he being apprized of the existence of the paper in question, on the day of the appraisement, some search was then made for it; however it was not then found; he found it shortly after, and thought it his duty to produce and take advice upon it.

3. That the paper in question, every word and letter of it, was in the proper handwriting of the testator. This was proved by a witness, Joseph Ewing, who testified that he had seen the testator write twice, and he believed the paper in question was wholly in his handwriting; and by another witness, Joseph Brown, (the person who had administered on the estate of the deceased) who testified, that he had not been acquainted with the testator's handwriting before his death, but having, since the administration of his estate was granted to him, obtained possession of his books, papers and accounts, he felt no hesitation in believing the paper offered for probat to be in his handwriting. And there was other evidence, but more vague, touching the genuineness of the handwriting.

4. There was much parol evidence on both sides, detailing conversations held by the testator with his neighbours and acquaintances, about his will, and bearing on the question, Whether or no he regarded the paper in question as his will? In the opinion of a majority of the judges of this court, the weight of evidence established, very clearly, that he considered himself as having a will by him, whereby his estate would pass after his death, and the principal part of it to Alexander Sharp, according to his uniform intentions in his favour; and that though he might have sometimes 253 wished to have it drawn out in better form, he yet intended *this paper to be his will, in case he should die without altering or amending it. The other judges were of opinion, that the testator's declarations in conversation with others on the subject, as detailed by the witnesses, were contradictory in themselves, and inconsistent with the provisions of the paper now produced as his will, and, therefore, gave it no support whatever.

The circuit court was of opinion, that the instrument was "not a sufficient will," and refused to admit it to probat: From which sentence, Alexander Sharp appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellant, and Johnson for the appellees.

I. The first question was, Whether the instrument was well proved to be in the handwriting of the testator?

Upon this point, Stanard referred, 1st, to the evidence of Ewing; 2ndly, to the evidence of Brown the administrator of the deceased; and though that witness had not been acquainted with the testator's handwriting before his death, and had formed his acquaintance with it from an examination of his papers since, yet he contended that his evidence of the handwriting was competent evidence before a court of probat; and he cited Stark. on ev. part IV. 653-8, and the cases there collected.* M'Corkle v. Binns, 5 Binney, 349; Bowman v. Plunkett, 2 M'Cord, 518; Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 316. 3rdly, He examined the other parol evidence and the circumstances of the case, which he relied on as strongly corroborating the direct proof of the genuineness of the handwriting.

Johnson answered, that this being a will of lands, and the proof relied on as to the due execution and publication, consisting intirely in the fact of the will being 254 wholly written *by the testator, that fact ought to be proved by two witnesses at the least; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 1, p. 375. That this paper was proved to be in the handwriting of the supposed testator by only one witness, namely, Ewing: that as Brown had never been acquainted with the testator's handwriting during his life, in other words, had never seen him write, and so must have formed his judgment only by a comparison of the writing in question with other writings of the testator, his testimony was not competent evidence of the handwriting: and the other parol evidence and the circumstances, relied on as corroborative of the direct evidence, were too vague to justify a court of justice in inferring from them the genuineness of the handwriting. He cited Rowt's adm'r v. Kile's adm'r, 1 Leigh 216.

II. But the main question was, Whether the testator designed this as a will, or only as a note, memorandum, project, or plan of a will to be afterwards made? And this question was argued upon the circumstances apparent on the face of the paper itself, and upon the parol evidence of the conversations of the testator with his neighbours and acquaintances, in relation to his will. The only authority cited in the argument was Matthews v. Warner, 4 Ves. 186.

COALTER, J. The first question is, Whether the paper has been proved to be in the handwriting of the deceased by two competent witnesses? It is admitted, that there is one full and complete witness on this point; but it is said the other witnesses are incompetent, and if so that one witness is not enough. Waiving this last question, and saying nothing of the other witnesses, or of their competency, especially in a court of probat, I think, that according to the opinions of all the judges in the case of Redford v. Peggy, Ewing and Brown are both competent witnesses to the handwriting. It is not pretended, that it is in the handwriting of any one else; nor was any one acquainted with his hand, examined on the other side, to throw any doubt on this subject. It is like his hand, all the witnesses say. It was found 255 *preserved in a pocket book in his bureau, the day after his interment; and if placed there by himself, as we have every reason to believe, he would hardly preserve it as an ingenious specimen of the forgery of his own hand. The controversy seems not to have turned on this point; and hence the witnesses seem not to have been particularly examined as to their belief. The controversy seems to have turned mainly on the question, Whether this is a testamentary paper, or merely a memorandum to make a will by? On that point the witnesses were examined and cross examined, with great minuteness and care; not so as to the handwriting. Brown who administered on the estate of the deceased, and possessed himself of his books and papers, and thus became well acquainted with his hand, had no hesitation in believing the paper in question to be in his hand. Ewing had twice seen him write notes of hand. He was also one of those, who, after the funeral, searched his papers for a will. This examination of his papers gave him a further opportunity of seeing and becoming acquainted with the character of his hand. He believed the paper was in the testator's handwriting. On the whole, I feel no hesitation in saying (especially as the court below which heard the testimony of the witnesses, which may have been more full than the minute taken of it by the clerk, was satisfied as to that matter) that the paper in question is in the handwriting of the deceased.

The next and principal question is, Whether this is a testamentary paper? A question, which, it seems to me, ought to be considered and decided, if that can be done, on the face of the paper itself. The object of the law in requiring wills to be in writing, and, where not wholly written by the testator, to be published by him in the presence of witnesses, subscribing their names in his presence, and providing that a will so published and preserved, shall not be abrogated by parol proofs, is to prevent those perjuries, by which wills might either be set up, or revoked, contrary to the intention of the deceased.

256 *This paper is, certainly, very informal: but no one would say, that if this identical paper had been published in the presence of two witnesses according to the provisions of the statute, it would not be a good will. But our law has supposed, that a paper wholly written by a deceased person, subscribed by him, and bearing on its face evidence of a disposition of property in contemplation of death, especially where such disposition of property is made in such form as to shew, that he has completed all the dispositions intended to be made, and this is evidenced by making executors and signing the paper, has every guard thrown around it, which would be necessary to make it a will, if published in the presence of witnesses: that writing and signing such a paper (unless a suspended intention appear on its face, or that it is incomplete, by breaking off in its provision, want of signature &c. so as to shew, that it is only a disposition in part, and that something further was intended, whereby it would appear that the paper, in that form, was not intended as a will) is as much a publication of a will, as a publication in the presence of witnesses.

[Here the judge read the paper, and marked and described, with minute accuracy, all the peculiar circumstances appearing upon its face, as above detailed; and thence inferred, that it appeared on the face of the paper itself, that the testator had recurred to it frequently after it had been originally written, and made sundry alterations, amendments and additions, according to changes of circumstances or of inclination, and put his hand to it for the last time on the 12th February 1825. He also adverted to the length of time during which he had carefully preserved it, and the place and manner in which he had kept it.]

And then he proceeded: Let us suppose the case stopped here. Would or would not such a paper, containing a full disposition of his whole estate, thus repeatedly revised and changed, at different times, according to the alteration of his circumstances (for it appears he had sold his slave George after the first writing, and had also 257 married) closing with a *provision for his wife, making his executors &c. be considered as a disposition of his whole estate to take effect after his death? And being written by himself, and carefully put away, must we not have considered it as a will? Unless, indeed, a will, when written by a testator, must be in more ample form than this, and bear on its face stronger evidence of a final testamentary intent.

It has been likened to the paper made mention of in the case of Matthews v. Warner, 4 Ves. 186. But that paper professed, on its face, to be "a plan of a will proposed to be drawn out," and which, although it contained a disposition of his estate, that would have made it a will but for this internal evidence that it was a mere plan proposed to be drawn out, was not considered a will. That paper also contained these expressions, which were relied on to shew that the paper itself was not intended for a will: "Must pray my burial may be plain"—"I must not forget my good friends Miss Mary and Miss Charlotte Howell, who desire will accept 5 guineas &c." and, finally, it was indorsed, "a plan for the last will and testament of William Matthews &c." It was moreover written on a piece of official paper (he was a store-keeper of the king's dock-yard at Deptford) intersected with lines, containing (printed at the top) the different articles of which he had care; and was found loose in his desk in his office in the dock-yard with some official papers. In that case also, there was another paper, written four years afterwards, which began, "Finding myself in a very precarious state of health, the following is the plan I propose to draw will from, abrogating all the others I have already drawn out:" Going on to make several bequests, but breaking off in the middle of one. This was written on the back of a letter, but was found in his bureau, in the parlour of his dwelling house, in a bundle of letters and papers. Many witnesses were examined as to the declarations of the deceased; one set speaking of positive declarations, that he had made a will, and others as positively to declarations that he had not, and would not. The 258 lord "chancellor said: "It is always so, whether the evidence is to rebut a resulting trust, or to explain a will, one never fails to see, that the witnesses come with the party." This part of the evidence, he says, he lays out of the case, as in perfect contradiction. He went upon the face of the paper; the place where it was found; the other paper &c. but, above all, on the evidence of the paper itself. He said, "It is not, it cannot be denied (the argument presses so strong) that upon the perusal of this paper the natural conclusion is, that it was his intention to make a more formal paper than this. The inference cannot possibly be avoided. Then, ex hypothesi, this paper, at the time he subscribed it, was not the law, the testament. When then, at what period, did the voluntas testandi exist quoad this instrument? If it is admitted as it must be, that when he subscribed his name, he was looking to some future act, the decision that this is his will would destroy the most general maxim I know of, voluntas testatoris ambulatoria est usque ad mortem. No man can answer the question at what time that intention existed in his mind. I know there was a period when a contrary intention existed. He has given that evidence under his own hand by the paper of 1789." That paper, though at first admitted to probat as a will, was finally decided against by the court of commissioners. 5 Ves. 23.

But, in our case, there is nothing in the writing itself, that is, there are no expressions tending to shew, that this paper was a mere plan or memorandum to draw a will by. We must infer this fact, if we so decide, from the shape and size of the paper, and the form in which it is written. Trying this case upon the paper itself, and supposing the deceased to be unlearned as to the form of wills, but to know, that if written by his own hand, and in a way to be understood, it would be a will, though not attested by witnesses, can we say, that a paper, containing on its face evidence of repeated revision, amendments and additions, and carefully put away in his pocket books, is not to be considered testamentary?

259 *Catherine Lloyd's will, mentioned in a note, 4 Ves. 200, was, in fact, a letter written by an old lady to James Browning esq. in which, among other things, she says, "But in case of my demise I desire you will draw up and leave some blanks for some small legacies, that after my funeral charges are defrayed &c. then except some legacies, I give and bequeath to J. B. my lands and tenements &c. If my assets will afford it to pay in the burrow of Southwark — £; and to Miss J.

P. £30." &c. [going on with several bequests]: but please not put this rigmaroli in, till I send it correct. This only by way of memorandum in case I should go off suddenly." She lived three or four months after this. The prerogative court pronounced against this paper as being conditional, in case she died suddenly, whereas she had time to make a formal will: and parol evidence was admitted. But the court of delegates reversed the sentence, and pronounced the paper as the last will.

So in the next case, James Savage's will, in the same note; the objection to which was that it was written by the testator, disposing both of real and personal estate, and concluded with a clause of attestation, but there were no subscribing witnesses. It was considered imperfect by Dr. Calvert, on account of the clause of attestation not being witnessed; and he admitted parol evidence, on which he set aside the paper. The delegates were of opinion that, it being a will both of real and personal estate, it was, reddendo singula singulis, a good disposition of personals, and they rejected parol testimony against it.

Roberts, in his treatise on Wills, ch. 1, part 17, p. 198,* cites a case to this effect: a will had been fully drawn out and approved, and the attorney had directions to make a fair copy, and to bring it the next morning to be executed: but the testatrix died that night. It was held as conclusive of her having made up her mind, and was admitted as a will of personals.

260 *It seems to me to result from all the cases, when we are deciding on a paper, whether on its face it is testamentary or not, that it is the mind, not the words, the intention, not the manner, which is to be looked to; unless, indeed, the words or manner shew a suspended mind and intention.

The substance of the doctrine as laid down in Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 249, seems to be, that to begin a will thus: "I, A. B. do make this my will," if attested by three witnesses, makes it a good will of lands, though there is no signature at the end of it. This publication, and the name thus written, seems, then, to be considered a good signing; but, I believe, that is not held to be enough here, inasmuch as without a signature to an olograph will of lands, there would be no sufficient evidence of a concluded and final act. But it is there said, "The observation is just, that, as to personal estate, if it appears, upon the will, that something more is intended to be done, and the party was not arrested by sickness or death, that (viz. beginning the will as above) is not held a signing the will; which purports that there is to be a further act." The paper before us, was signed and sealed when first written: it afterwards, received some alterations when it was dated, and again signed; and, finally, it underwent farther alterations, in which provision was made for the testator's wife, his executors were changed, and it was again dated and signed. Taking it on its face then, how can we say, that any further act was intended unless the want of form shall be a ground on which we shall infer such intention? And I again ask, if the parol evidence as to intention, had never existed, or had been rejected, and was not in the record, could we infer, from this paper, an intention to write a will more at large, and so reject it? The paper disposes of his whole estate, names his executors, provides for his funeral and tombstone. There is nothing doubtful about it.

It was said, he intended the land and slaves were to be entailed; and hence it is inferred, that if he had known he could not do this, he might have made other provisions. *This is very true: but, surely, such ignorance is not sufficient to set aside a will otherwise good. The words, "my land to be entailed," are said to be words of direction to a scrivener; but they were to be entailed, not to him and the heirs of his body, but to him and his heirs forever. Whether he had any definite notions of the distinction between estates tail or in fee, it is hard to determine. These words, perhaps, would carry a fee, even if it had been lawful to create an estate tail. But he may have thought that he was giving the property in tail; and if from the circumstances apparent on the face of this paper, and independent of this clause, we are bound to consider him as writing a testamentary paper, surely, the form of words by which he creates an estate tail, is not, in itself, enough to found a belief, that he was merely writing directions. We often feel ourselves bound to construe a will as giving an estate tail, when we believe no such thing was intended; but we do not therefore say, that if the testator had been well advised, he would not have made such a will, but would have inserted other provisions, and that therefore such a paper is not "the law and the testament," and something further was intended.

If, however, there be a well founded doubt, arising from the face of this writing, whether it was intended as a testamentary paper or not, then, it is said, parol evidence may be admitted against it. How stands the case upon the parol evidence? [Here the judge stated and examined the whole of the parol evidence very fully and minutely.] He concluded: The weight of the evidence, I think, goes clearly to prove, that the testator considered he had a will, by which his estate would pass after his death, and the bulk of it to Alexander Sharp, according to his uniform intentions in his favour, always expressed to those to whom he made known his wishes. He may have wished to draw it, or have it drawn, in better form: but he clearly intended this paper to be his will if he should die without altering it. If a will is once made, no expression of an intention to have it drawn in some proper form, or even to alter it, if the testator does *not do so, but, on the contrary, says he has a will, which is found carefully put away, clear of all suspicion of fraud or management, can have the effect of setting the will aside. The evidence, in this case, so far from proving an intestacy, I think, supports the paper before us as a will.

In this opinion, GREEN and CARR, J., concurred, so that the sentence of the circuit court was reversed, and the writing in question was ordered to be admitted to probat, and recorded, as the perfect last will and testament of the deceased.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion that the paper in question is sufficiently proved to have been wholly written by Thomas Sharp. But I cannot agree that he intended it to be his will.

A paper is not to be established as a man's will, merely by proving, that he intended to make a disposition of his property similar to, or even identically the same with, that contained in the paper. It must satisfactorily appear, that he intended the very paper to be his will. Unless it appear, that the very paper was intended to be his will, it must be rejected; however correct it may be in its form, however comprehensive in its details, however conformable to the otherwise declared intentions of the party, and although it may have been signed by him with all due solemnity. In the case of Matthews v. Warner, the paper offered as a will, began thus: "2 Nov. 1785. A plan of a will proposed to be drawn out at the last testament of William Matthews, storekeeper of his majesty's yard at Deptford." After the usual preludes, being in health, sound in mind &c. it proceeded; "Imprimis. I give unto Miss Isabella Johnson, &c." and then proceeded with several other specific legacies; and after disposing of the residue of his estate, concluded thus: "I appoint my good friend Mr. Edw. L'Epine and my good friend Mr. Edw. Johnson, my executors, to see this my last will and testament 263 complied with. Dated at Deptford, 2d Oct. 1785;" and was signed "Wm. Matthews." There then followed a codicil; "I must not forget my good friends Miss Mary and Miss Charlotte Howell, who desire will accept of five guineas each, for rings to wear in remembrance of me. 6 Oct. 1785. Wm. Matthews." It was indorsed, "A plan designed for the last will and testament of Wm. Matthews, storekeeper of his majesty's yard, Deptford." Lord Eldon held this not to be a will, because it appeared, as he conceived, from the expressions in the beginning of the paper, and in the indorsement upon it, "A plan &c." that Matthews did not intend that paper to be his will, but only the plan, according to which, a will was to be afterwards drawn out. And I understand it to be now definitively settled in England, that even where a paper purports to be a will, and is signed in such manner as would be sufficient to give it effect as a will, yet if it appears on the face of the paper, that something more was intended to be done, and the party was not arrested by sickness or death, it shall not be a will. Roberts on Wills, ch. 1, part 17, p. 198-202. Roberts, in summing up the law upon the subject, says, "The later determinations at Doctor's commons, seem tending to establish a more discriminative doctrine," than that which formerly prevailed. "It now appears to be agreed, that if a testator leaves an instrument, which upon the face of it, carries evidence of an intention in the framer to perfect it by some further solemnity, which he died without having superadded, having had afterwards sufficient time and health and recollection to complete it, such paper may be inferred not to have been intended to operate as it stood; and the omission to finish may ground a presumption of a change of mind in the deceased." After reciting some cases in confirmation of this principle, he says, "The same doctrine is recognized by lord Eldon, in the late case of Coles v. Tricothick, 9 Ves. 249, who thus expresses himself on this point. 'The observation is just, that as to personal estate, if it appear upon the will, that something more 264 was intended to be done, and the party was not arrested by sickness or death, that is not held a signing of the will.' It seems therefore to be now understood that not every scrap of paper which a man writes in contemplation of death, making mention of intended dispositions of his personal property, will be received in the ecclesiastical courts as testamentary."

Let us apply these principles to the paper before us. The whole of the first side of it, (judging from the colour of the ink, the stroke of the pen, and the character of the handwriting) was written at the same time, except the words "my extors." &c. and perhaps the date, and some fee alterations. This side of the paper constitutes the body of the will, if will it may be called. But what is it? It bears on its face, intrinsic and (to my mind) irresistible evidence, that this paper was not, when it was written, intended to be his will. It is not, in the beginning, end, or any other part of it, recognized or spoken of by the writer, as a will, or even as the memorandum for a will. There is not a word in it, from which it can even be inferred to be a memorandum for a will, except the part where mention is made of funeral charges, a tombstone, and executors. There is not from the beginning to the end, one word commonly used in giving or disposing of property, by deed or will. Did ever man, however ignorant, sit down to write a will, and finish the work in this form, and upon such a mutilated piece of paper! And it is evident, that Sharp, although of secluded habits, is no where represented as an ignorant man. On the contrary, he is said to have done all his own writing, and to have kept his accounts very accurately. It is clear to my mind that this paper was, on its face, no more than a mere memorandum of the manner in which he intended to give his property, by a will thereafter to be made.

This result, deduced from the intrinsic evidence of the paper itself, is fortified by the positive testimony of witnesses. [Here the judge recapitulated the testimony of three of the witnesses, which, he said, left no doubt with him, that Sharp did not consider or intend this paper to be his will.]

265 "That part of the paper, relating to his wife, dated February 12, 1825, does not mend the matter. There are no words of disposition there, giving the lands to his wife; there is no recognition of the paper as his will. It is itself, a mere memorandum, and cannot change the character of what had been previously written on the other side, which was also nothing more than a memorandum. It was no will and not intended to be so when it was written.

I do not deny, that this paper, originally written as a mere memorandum for a will, might have become his will, provided he had afterwards published it as such. But this he never did.

It is said, however, that he afterwards considered it as his will. I do not believe that that, even if it were clearly proved, would make it his will. But there is no satisfactory proof, that he ever afterwards considered or wished this paper to be his will. The evidence, on this point, is very contradictory, and preponderates, in my opinion, against the proposition: at any rate, the declarations ascribed to him by the several witnesses, are so contradictory in themselves, and so inconsistent with the provisions of the paper now brought forward as his will, that they can give it no support whatever; even if a paper purporting, on its face, not to be a will, but a mere memorandum for a will, could, in any case, become a will, by general declarations of the testator, that he had made a will containing dispositions similar to those indicated in the memorandum. But I do not think, that such a paper ever could become a will, without proof of a subsequent publication thereof as such. The evidence of such publication, is not to be found in this record.

If Sharp intended this paper to be his will, it is very strange that, conversing with so many persons, and with such unreservedness, on the intended disposition of his property, he should never have shewn it to any of them; particularly, when we recollect, that the most, if not all of these conversations, took place at his own house, where the paper was kept. It is passing 266 strange, even if he intended to make *the very disposition of his property, indicated by this writing, that he should have been satisfied to make it on such a small, torn, defaced, mutilated fragment of paper. If it had been written when he was in extremis, and in a situation where a more suitable piece of paper could not be had, this remark would be entitled to no consideration: but this writing was commenced at least nine years before his death, and was revised by him about one year before his death. Under these circumstances, I repeat, that it is passing strange, if he intended it, on the 12th Feb. 1825, to be his will, that he did not, at some period between that and his death, transfer it to a different paper. A man who wrote with the facility with which he appears to have done, might have copied it, at any time, in less than ten minutes.

But, it is said, this paper was preserved with care, and was found, after his death, in the place where it was reasonable to expect he would deposit his will. I answer, that, if it were intended as a mere memorandum for a will, to be afterwards made, it would have been preserved with care, and would have been found, probably, in the same place.

No man could be more disposed than I am, to construe, with liberality, the wills which men have actually made. But wills must be made, before they can be construed. Every man, having property, must feel an interest that his property should pass, after his death, to the persons whom he would wish to have it. If he fails to make a will, having time and opportunity to do so, it must be presumed that he wishes those to have it, whom the law may designate as his heirs or distributees. I fear this reasonable intent would be frequently disappointed, if we decide, that "such a thing as this" (I use lord Eldon's language in a like case) is to be established as a will. I think the sentence of the circuit court ought to be affirmed.

BROOKE, P., concurred in this opinion. But by a majority of the court, the sentence was reversed &c.

*Haxall v. Lee.

Administrators—Appointment—Persons Preferred.—A person dies intestate in 1825; and in 1830, a distributee and a creditor come, at the same time, to ask administration: HELD, the court has no discretion to choose between them, but must prefer the distributee.

Thomas Bennett late of Petersburg, died there, intestate, in the year 1825. No application for administration of his estate, was made by any person, till February 1830, when Haxall, a creditor of the intestate, applied to the hustings court of Petersburg for the administration; and, thereupon, Lee, the husband of a daughter and distributee of the intestate, and in favour of whom (and of him only) the intestate's widow had relinquished her right to the administration, appeared and opposed the grant thereof to Haxall, and prayed that it might be granted to him. It appeared, that both parties were respectable and responsible persons. The hustings court gave the administration to Haxall. Lee appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the order, and gave the administration to Lee. And then Haxall appealed to this court.

M'Farland for the appellant; Allison for the appellee. The provisions of the statute concerning wills, intestacy and distributions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 32, 3, 4, pp. 382, 3, and the cases of Cutchin v. Wilkinson, 1 Call, 1; Hendren v. Colgin, 4 Munf. 231; Bohn v. Sheppard, Id. 403, were cited.

PER CURIAM. The statute gives the right of administration, first, to the husband or wife, and then to those next entitled to distribution, or such of the distributees as the court shall most approve: and, although it authorises the court, in case no such person apply for the administration within thirty days, to grant it to a creditor or creditors who shall apply for the same, or any other fit person, in its discretion; yet it provides, that if, after the grant of the admin-other distributee shall apply for it, the same shall be granted in like manner as if the former had not been obtained. If, therefore, in the present case, administration had been granted to Haxall, and Lee had come, at any time afterwards, to demand it, the court must have revoked the grant thereof to Haxall, and given it to Lee. But the creditor and distributee came both together: and both were trust-worthy. The court had no discretion to withhold the administration from the distributee, and give it to the creditor. The order of the circuit court is affirmed.

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Judgments—Relation.—A judgment has relation to the first day of the term at which it is rendered, and this relation is allowed in equity as well as at law.

Same—Lien—Equitable Estate.—A judgment creditor has a lien in equity on the equitable estate of the debtor, in like manner as he has a lien at law on his legal estate.

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Real estate is vested in a trustee by deed of marriage settlement, in trust to pay the wife an annuity out of the profits, and, subject to the annuity, in trust for a son of the grantor; while the annuitant is yet living, a creditor of the son recovers a judgment against him, and exhibits his bill in chancery, to subject the son's equitable interest in the estate to the debt: HELD, 1. that such an equitable interest cannot be taken in execution at law; 2. that it is bound by the judgment in equity, which will apply it to the satisfaction of the debt; but 3. as the annuitant is yet living.

Judgments—Relation.—A judgment or decree entered during a term of court relates back to the first day of the term, when—and only when—the cause in which it was rendered was in such a condition on the first day of the term that it could have been tried on that day if it had occupied the first place on a docket. The principal case—which is a leading one on this subject—has often been cited to sustain this rule, than which there is hardly a proposition of law more firmly established. See, citing principal case, Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 272, 278, and foot-note: Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 418, 419; foot-note to Jones v. Myrick, 8 Gratt. 179; Brown v. Hume, 16 Gratt. 466; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Gratt. 600; Yates v. Robertson, 30 Va. 477; Hockman v. Hockman, 98 Va. 456, 25 S. E. Rep. 594; Dunn v. Renick, 40 W. Va. 360, 23 S. E. Rep. 70; First Nat. Bank v. Huntington Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 583, 23 S. E. Rep. 793; note to Lane v. Ludlow, 14 Fed. Cas. 1082, and in Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 290, 291, 16 S. E. Rep. 489, it is said: "At common law, for certain purposes, the term was considered but one day, and all judgments and decrees entered during the term bore date as of the first day. In Virginia this legal fiction, though at first combated, because firmly established, and has always prevailed, until, as with us, it has become ingrafted upon the Code of the state. Code Va. 1887, § 3567; Society v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 599; Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh 268; Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 409; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Gratt. 599. In the leading case of Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh 268, affirming the case of Society v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 599, the point was elaborately argued by counsel of great ability and learning; and the opinion of the court, delivered by JUDGE GREEN, contains all the substance of what has since been written on the subject, inasmuch that in the latter case of Skipwith v. Cunningham, supra, JUDGE TUCKER regretted that the court had allowed a reargument of the question. All the cases, however, from the leading English case of Wynne v. Wynne, 1 Wils. 39, down, recognize as an exception 'where it appears that the plaintiff's case was not in a condition for a judgment on the first day, if the court had been prepared to hear it, and some further proceeding was indispensably necessary to mature his case for judgment.' Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407."

Same—Lien—Equitable Estate.—At law an equitable interest cannot be extended upon an elegit: but

and is not compellable to take a gross sum in satisfaction of the annuity, and as the trustee is to hold the subject and pay the annuity out of the profits, the court of chancery ought not to direct the sale out and out of the debtor's equitable interest subject to the annuity, but ought only to direct the application of the surplus of profits as they accrue, after paying the annuity, to the debt.

By deed of marriage settlement, dated the 10th September 1799, between Reuben Coutts, Jane New the intended wife, and Samuel M'Craw and others, trustees, Coutts conveyed to the trustees, sundry real estate, consisting of *lots and lands in Richmond and Manchester, with some slaves and other personal property, in trust, that they should hold the same to the use of Coutts till the marriage; and from and after the marriage, in trust to the use of Coutts and his wife, to hold the subject, and apply the rents and profits thereof, to and for their support, and that of Coutts's children, Lewis, Patrick, Elizabeth, Polly, and Elvira Coutts, and of any children which should be born of the intended marriage; and if Coutts should survive the intended wife, then upon trust to support him out of the rents and profits during his life; and if she should survive him, then to pay her out of the rents and profits, an annuity of £150; and after the death of Coutts, to divide the trust subject, as follows, viz. to divide equally between the grantor's two sons, Lewis and Patrick, the ferry lot in Manchester number 312, the ferry lot in Richmond number 324, the sandy bar and fishery, being 44 acres of land, two islands in James river numbers 313 and 315, and four lots in Manchester numbers 306, 307, 308, 309; and to divide the residue of the real subject, being a lot in Richmond number 355, and all the personal property, equally between all the above named children of Coutts, and the children, if any, of the intended marriage; and the whole subject was charged with the annuity of £150. provided for the wife, and the trustees were to see that it should be paid for that very reason. relief may be had in equity which gives a lien upon it in favour of judgment creditors by analogy to the lien at law upon the legal estate, and amongst several judgment creditors, adopts the legal rule of priorities according to the order of time. Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 417, citing principal case and Tinsley v. Anderson, 8 Call 520. And, in Findlay v. Toncray, 2 Rob. 377, BALDWIN, J., said: "I think there is no reason to doubt that the plaintiff's decree in October, 1836, was a lien upon the debtor Soule's equity of redemption under his deed of trust: for though the equity of redemption could not be sold under a f. fa. and was not extendible, yet the decree constituted an equitable lien thereupon, entitled to priority over subsequent liens by judgment or otherwise. 1 Sugd. on Vend. 542: Hales v. Williams, 1 Leigh 140: Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh 268."

To the point that, although an equity of redemption cannot be taken in execution at law, it is, on the general principles of a court of equity, bound by the judgment in equity, as it would have been bound at law: if it had been a legal estate, the principal case is also cited in Micheaux v. Brown, 10 Gratt. 617; Nickell v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 889.

To the point that an equity of redemption cannot be taken in execution at law, the principal case was cited in First Nat. Bank of Salem v. Anderson, 75 Va. 267.

her out of the rents and profits, and apportioned and charged equally among and upon the children; so as to divide the burden justly and equitably among them.

The marriage took effect. Coutts, the husband, died, leaving his wife Jane him surviving; whereby the children became entitled to the trust property, to be distributed among them according to the provision of the deed of settlement, subject to the annuity to the wife, and the trust provided by the settlement for assuring the payment thereof to her.

Afterwards, Walker recovered two judgments against Patrick Coutts (the son of Reuben, the grantor in the deed of marriage settlement above mentioned) in the 270 hustings *court of Richmond, for 500 dollars each, with interest and costs: these judgments were rendered upon the confession of Coutts, on the 2nd March 1821, but the quarterly term of the court at which the judgments were so recovered, commenced the 21st February preceding.

Patrick Coutts, by deed executed in the interval between the commencement of the term and the day on which Walker's judgments against him were rendered, namely, on the 28th February 1821—reciting that Mrs. Coutts had become bound as his surety for a debt of 1661 dollars, the amount of a writ of ca. sa. which had been sued out by R. Burton against him and executed upon him, and that she had incurred sundry other engagements for him as his bail and otherwise, and that he was also indebted to Samuel M'Craw for expenses incurred by him as trustee under the deed of marriage settlement, and for arrearages of the annuity of £150. thereby provided for Mrs. Coutts—in consideration thereof, conveyed to T. T. Bouldin and D. Roper, trustees, the ferry lot in Manchester number 312, the sandy bar and fishery of 44 acres, the two islands in James river numbers 313 and 315, and the four lots in Manchester numbers 306, 307, 308, 309, being parcel of the subject mentioned and described in the deed of marriage settlement: upon trust, 1. to indemnify Mrs. Coutts against loss by reason of her suretyship for the debt of 1661 dollars due to Burton; 2. to indemnify her against loss by reason of any other suretyships or engagements by her incurred for the mortgagor; and 3. to pay M'Craw, any balance that might be found due him, for expenses incurred by him as trustee under the marriage settlement, and for arrearages of the annuity of £150. due Mrs. Coutts.

And, by another deed, executed on the same 28th February 1821, Patrick Coutts, for the consideration, as expressed on the face of the deed, of 8777 dollars, cash paid, conveyed directly to Mrs. Coutts, all his interest in the lot number 355 in Richmond, which also is parcel of the trust subject mentioned in the marriage settlement.

271 *These two deeds of the 28th February 1821, were admitted to record in the office of the hustings court of Richmond, on the same day on which Walker's judgments against Coutts were rendered in the same court, namely, on the 2nd March 1821.

Walker sued out executions on his judgments against Coutts, which proved unavailing; and then he exhibited his bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, against Patrick Coutts, Jane Coutts, Samuel M'Craw (who was the surviving trustee named in the marriage settlement) and Bouldin and Roper, the trustees in the first mentioned deed of the 28th February 1821; setting forth the facts as above stated; insisting, that Coutts's two deeds of the 28th February 1821, were fraudulent in fact as against him; and that, whether fraudulent in fact or not, his judgments related back to the first day of the term of the hustings court at which they were rendered, and thus overreached those conveyances; and praying, that the subject thereby conveyed, or so much thereof as should suffice for the purpose, might be sold for the satisfaction of the debts due him with interest &c.

The defendants Patrick Coutts, Jane Coutts, and M'Craw, filed their answers, averring that the deeds of the 28th February 1821, were fair in fact, and claiming the benefit of them; and insisting, that Walker's judgments, as against them, could not be considered, on the principle of relation, as taking date from the first day of the term of the court at which they were rendered, but that, on the contrary, they took date only from the day they were entered.

As to the other defendants, the bill was regularly taken pro confesso.

There was no evidence whatever, touching the charge of actual fraud alleged in the bill: so that the only questions presented to the chancellor, were, as he stated them, Whether, supposing Patrick Coutts to have only an equitable right in and to the property comprised in the marriage settlement of 1799, and the legal title thereof to be outstanding *in the trustee M'Craw, Walker's judgments had priority over the two deeds of the 28th February 1821? and if so, Whether they constituted a lien on P. Coutts's equitable title in the subject? And the chancellor, holding the affirmative on both points, decreed, that the marshal should sell all of Coutts's interest in the property, at public auction, subject to Mrs. Coutts's annuity, and bring the proceeds of sale into court, to be applied to the satisfaction of Walker's demands by future order.

This court, upon the petition of Mrs. Coutts, allowed her an appeal from the decree.

S. Taylor and R. G. Scott, for the appellant, contended, 1st, That Walker's judgments constituted no lien on the property in question. For, they said, the lien of a judgment on the real estate of the defendant, arises from the capacity of the creditor to extend it by elegit; and if that capacity to take the subject in execution has never existed, or has determined, the creditor, in the one case, loses the lien he once had, and, in the other, never acquired one at all. Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 186. Now, here the legal estate of the property was in M'Craw, the trustee, under the marriage settlement of 1799, charged with Mrs. Coutts's annuity of £150. and P. Coutts had only an equitable estate, which could not be extended on an elegit, any more than an equity of redemption which certainly was not extendible. 2 Cruise's Dig. Tit. 15; Mortgages. ch. 3, § 22, p. 139; Id. Tit. 14, Estates by Statute Merchant &c., § 77, p. 72; Scott v. Scholey, 8 East. 467. If Walker had no lien by his judgment, Mrs. Coutts must prevail in equity, since her deed certainly gave her a lien. She had equal equity, and the legal advantage.

2ndly, That Walker's judgments did not take date from the first day of the term, but only from the day they were actually rendered. The doctrine of the relation of a judgment to the first day of the term, was manifestly unjust, when carried to the length of giving a posterior judgment 273 *priority over a previous bona fide conveyance; and ought not to be allowed to prevail at law, much less in equity, unless the law imperiously required it in all cases. This whole doctrine of relation was a fiction of the law. The president Pendleton said, in Eppes v. Randolph, that a legal fiction, contrived to support justice, is never to be permitted to do an injury to a third person. So, in 18 Vin. Abr. Relation, K. pl. 4, p. 293, it is laid down, as a general rule, that relation shall not do a wrong to strangers. The only date to the judgment-roll in England being the first day of the term; and thus every judgment of the term having the same date, namely, the first day; the reason was apparent, why judgments there all related back to the first day of the term, the record, in general, shewing no other date. But this was only the general rule; for if there be any thing on the judgment-roll, as a memorandum or the like, which shews the true date, the principle of relation which dates the judgment from the first day of the term, is not allowed, per Holt, C. J., 3 Salk. 212; Wynne v. Wynne, 1 Wils. 39; Swann v. Broome, 3 Burr. 1595. The general principle, then, of the relation of all judgments to the first day of the term, they said, could not justly obtain in Virginia. For the reason of the general principle in England, was, that there, the whole term, in intendment of law, is but one day, and the record shews but one date, the first day of the term; so that to hold all the judgments of the term as judgments of the first day, is consistent with and required by the record. But this reason would not hold in Virginia, where, by positive provision of the law, the business is arranged for several days of the term, and the orders and proceedings of each day are drawn up and signed by the judge; where office judgments are declared to be judgments of the last day of the term at which they are confirmed; where the record shews the precise date of every judgment and proceeding; where the law recognizes, and the record shews, a first and a last day and intermediate days of the term: where, consequently, to intend that every judgment of the term is a judgment of the first day of it, would contradict the record. They referred to the case of The Mutual Assurance Society v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 539, in which a judgment was held to relate to the first day of the term; but they said the point did not appear to have been argued there, and ought not, therefore, to be considered as settled by that adjudication.

And, if this doctrine of relation ought to be allowed to prevail at law, in this country, where the reason on which it was founded in England never existed, yet, they contended, it ought not to obtain in equity. Anon. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 684, pl. 5. The rule was certainly a very harsh one, and very unjust in its operation, if it could be made to deprive a fair purchaser for valuable consideration actually paid, of the property he has bought.

3dly, That, supposing Walker's judgments related back to the first day of the term, overreached the two deeds of the 28th February 1821, under which Mrs. Coutts claimed, and constituted a lien on the subject; a lien resulting from the liability of the subject to extent on an elegit; then Walker's proper remedy was to take out his elegit, and extend the property; and as he had thus a complete remedy at law, the court of chancery had no jurisdiction of the case. There was no allegation that the profits would have been insufficient to pay the debt.

4thly, They suggested, that so far as the deed of trust of the 28th February 1821, was intended to indemnify Mrs. Coutts for her suretyship for P. Coutts to Burton, who was a judgment creditor, she ought to be placed in the place of Burton, and if his judgment was prior to those of Walker, she ought at least to be allowed a priority over Walker, to the extent of the debt due to Burton.

5thly, They said the decree was, in one respect, certainly erroneous: that the chancellor ought to have directed an inquiry to ascertain, whether the trusts created by the marriage settlement of 1799, had been all executed, and the amount due

Mrs. Coutts on account of her annuity; *and if it was found proper to decree any sale of the subject at all, he should have directed the sale of so much thereof as would suffice to satisfy Walker's demand, instead of selling the whole of P. Coutts's interest. And the chancellor should have subjected the property mortgaged by the deed of trust to the satisfaction of Walker's claims, before he touched that conveyed by the absolute deed to Mrs. Coutts.

W. F. Wickham and Bacchus for the appellee, agreed that P. Coutts's interest in the subject was only an equitable estate, and such an equity as was not liable to extent under an elegit. But, they said, a judgment creditor acquires a lien in equity on the equitable estate of the debtor, as he acquires a lien at law on a legal estate held by his debtor. Sugd. law vend. ch. 9, § 5, p. 337; Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh, 140. And this consideration alone was sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of the court.

As to the question, Whether in this country a judgment should be held to relate back to the first day of the term at which it was rendered? They said, the affirmative was held by this court, in the case of The Mutual Assurance Society v. Stanard, and could hardly have passed without consideration. It is a settled principle of the common law. 4 Com. Dig. Execution, D. 1, p. 246. In Wynne v. Wynne, 1 Wils. 39, the rule was stated in the argument, with the reason of it: "the general intendment of the law is, that every judgment has relation to the first day of the term; the reason is, because the court cannot determine every suitor's case in one day." The principle, in truth, is necessary to place the suitors on a fair footing of equality; in other words, to the administration of equal justice. This reason holds here, as well as in England, and in equity as well as at law. Neither can any good reason be given for the distinction suggested by the counsel for the appellant, that, although in a court of law, a judgment shall relate back to the first day of the term, and give a lien from that date on a legal estate in 276 *lands held by the debtor; yet, in equity, the judgment shall have no such relation, and its lien on the equitable estate of the debtor shall take date only from the day of the term when the judgment was rendered. If such a distinction should be allowed, and several creditors should recover judgments against the same debtor, at the same term, they would be entitled in equity (though equity always favours of quality) to satisfaction out of their debtor's estate, in the order of their judgments; that is, according to the accidental arrangement of their causes for trial.

GREEN, J. The principal question is, Whether Walker's judgments overreached the deeds under which the appellant claims? This precise question was determined in the affirmative in The Mutual Assurance Society v. Stanard; but it is said, that, in that case, the point passed sub silentio, and without discussion; and that, although at the common law, the whole term was considered as but one day, and all the judgments therein related to the first day thereof, and overreached all intermediate conveyances of and charges upon the debtor's lands; yet that was because the time when the judgment was actually rendered, never appeared on the record, all being enrolled as of the term generally, or as of the first day of the term: that in consequence of our statutes, requiring that the proceedings of all our courts shall be signed by the presiding judge, either daily at the adjournment of the court, or the next morning at its sitting, and that all office judgments, not set aside during the term, shall be entered as judgments of the last day of the term, the actual time of the entering of every judgment necessarily appears on the record, and consequently takes away the foundation of that rule of the common law. This general principle of the common law, like many others, is of such remote antiquity, and so long recognized without dispute, that the reasons and policy on which it was founded, are, in a great degree, left to conjecture. One reason is assigned arguendo in the case of Wynne v. Wynne, cited at the bar: that all the suitors 277 whose cases are in such a *situation as to entitle them to a judgment on the first day of the court, ought to be in the same situation, and none to have any advantage over another, and as it is impossible for the court to give judgment in all such cases in one day, the only means of putting them upon a footing of equality, is to refer all given in the same term to the first day, and give them the same effect as if they were really so. Another reason may have been to prevent debtors from withdrawing their property from the effect of judgments against them, by alienations made after it was known that in the course of the term a judgment would pass. Whatever was the foundation of the rule, it operated uniformly as between different creditors, and the creditors of and purchasers from the debtor, without any exception, so far as I have been able to discover, until the case of purchasers was provided for by the statute 29 Car. 2, Ch. 3, § 14, which required, that the true date of all judgments should be noted on the margin of the roll, and provided that they should bind, as to purchasers, only from such date. Before that statute, judgments confessed in vacation, under powers of attorney previously given for that purpose, related to the first day of the preceding term, and overreached intermediate alienations. To remedy this mischief, of allowing judgments confessed upon powers of attorney, when no previous suit was depending, to overreach intermediate alienations, was the chief object of the provision of the statute on that subject, as appears by its preamble. An attempt was made to remedy this mischief, partially, before the statute, by the power of the court, in an anonymous case in Sid. 222, in which a judgment, entered in vacation, upon a warrant of attorney given in vacation, was set aside, because, relating to the first day of the preceding term, it would be a great danger to purchasers; although it was insisted, that it might be held to be good against the party, and void as to purchasers, which was denied, and the judgment was set aside, because if it remained and bound the party, it must also bind purchasers from him. The courts in

278 England, always had the *means of ascertaining the dates of all proceedings in the suits depending in them, as appears from the frequent questions which have been made as to the effect of those proceedings. Thus, a statute acknowledged the 22d January, after the first day of the term, was overreached by a judgment on the 23rd. Standford v. Cooper, Het. 72; Cro. Car. 102; Hutt. 95; Garrard v. Norris, Latch. 53. So, in Jenk. 250, cited 18 Vin. Abr. Relation, D. pl. 3, p. 293, a case is stated, where a fine levied after a statute acknowledged in the same term, overreached the statute. But cases might occur, in which judgments might be rendered during a term, which could not by possibility relate to the first day; as where it appears, that the plaintiff's case was not in a condition for a judgment on the first day, if the court had been prepared to hear it, and some further proceeding was indispensably necessary to mature his case for judgment. As, in the case of a common recovery, the præcipe being returned to the first day of the term, and the tenant appearing and vouching to warranty, and a summons ad warrantizandum awarded returnable to a future day in the term; if the vouchee die before the return day, the recovery is void; Wynne v. Wynne, 1 Wils. 42. Or, if the return day be Sunday, which is not dies juridicus, and the vouchee dies on that day, and a judgment is afterwards given, it is void, because no judgment could lawfully be given on Sunday. But if the return day had been a juridical day, upon which a valid judgment could have been given, the subsequent judgment would have related to the return (essoign) day, and been good, notwithstanding the death of the vouchee on the return day; Swann v. Broome, 3 Burr. 1596. In these cases, there was an impossibility that the judgments should have been given on the first day of the term, the vouchees not appearing gratis, and upon that impossibility the judgments turned. Tidd's prec. 376. These are the only adjudged cases I have met with, in which exceptions have been allowed to the general rule; and they are founded upon obviously good reasons, that might 279 very well apply to all cases, in which it appeared that the plaintiff's case could not be matured for judgment on the first day of the term. There is a dictum of lord Holt in 3 Salk. 212, repeated by counsel arguendo, and admitted by the court, in Miller v. Bradley, 8 Mod. 190, that the relation does not exist, if there is a memorandum to the contrary; as where there is a continuance of the cause until another day in the same term. But the occasion or circumstances, under which this dictum fell from lord Holt, or the purpose to which it was applied, is not stated by Salkeld. It is hardly sufficient to overturn the common law doctrine, applied particularly to the lien of judgments, that the whole term is in law but one day, and that the first day.

Our legislature, in incorporating into our statutes, such of the English statutes as it thought fit to adopt, and abrogating all others, has omitted the provision of the statute 29 Car. 2, in respect to the effect of judgments as to purchasers, probably for this reason, that the chief mischief intended to be remedied by it, the confession of judgments upon warrants of attorney when no previous suit was depending, could not exist here, because our statutes had long prohibited such judgments.

Our statutes directing the daily proceedings of the courts to be signed by the presiding judge or justice, declare the purpose of that requisition to be, to prevent errors in entering up judgments, and can hardly have intended to abrogate, incidentally, the rule of the common law, which considers the whole term as one day. I think, we ought to adhere to the decision in The Mutual Assurance Society v. Stanard.

The interests of P. Coutts, and of the purchasers from him claiming under the deeds of the 28th February 1821, were purely equitable, the legal title being in the trustee under the marriage settlement of 1799, who held it upon such terms, for the use of the appellant and the others interested in the property, that his right to retain the possession and controul, and to receive the profits of the property, necessarily continued, until the proportions of the per-

280 sons *entitled thereto, after the death of the grantor, were ascertained, and their due shares of the charge of the annuity payable to the appellant, were also ascertained, and properly charged upon their respective proportions of the property. This was not such a trust as could be taken under our statute subjecting trusts to legal executions; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 30, p. 370. That was taken from a similar provision in the statute of frauds of 29 Car. 2, but is more extensive in its operation, including trusts of personal as well as real property, whilst the english statute only embraces trusts of real property; and our statute binding the trusts to all intents and purposes, as if they were legal estates, from the date of the judgment, whilst the english statute bound them only from the date of the execution. Hunt v. Coles, 1 Com. Rep. 226. But in respect to the quality of the estate there is no difference between the effect of the statutes; and in England, their statute has been held not to extend to an equity of redemption. Plucknet v. Kirk, 1 Vern. 411; Sawley v. Gower, 2 Id. 61; Plunket v. Pen-son, 2 Atk. 290, Sudg. law vend. 337, nor to a trust to sell and pay debts, Sudg. 339, and, a fortiori, not to such a trust as this, not for the debtor only, but for him and another entitled paramount to him.

But although this equity of P. Coutts could not be taken in execution at law, it was, upon the general principles of a court of equity, bound in equity, as it would have been bound at law, if it had been a legal title; and the judgment creditor has a right to insist upon the execution of the trust for the satisfaction of his judgments, precisely as the debtor would have had a right to have it executed for his own benefit, if there had been no judgment. Thus a judgment creditor has a right to redeem a mortgage, or any other incumbrance. And amongst incumbrancers, where all having nothing but equities, and none the legal title, their equities being equal, they are entitled to satisfaction according to the priority of their incumbrances in point of time, upon the maxim qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure. Churchill 281 v. Grove, Nels. *Ch. Rep. 89; 1 Ch. Ca. 35; 2 Ch. Rep. 180; Mackreath v. Symmonds, 15 Ves. 353; Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh, 140.

It only remains to inquire, whether, admitting that judgments relate to the first day of the term, and overreach intermediate conveyances at law, in cases where they can be executed without the aid of a court of equity, the same rule ought to be applied to the case of a judgment creditor, who is under the necessity of resorting to a court of equity for its aid? It is said, that relations are not favoured in equity, and never allowed to operate to the prejudice of third persons. It is true, that fictions of law operating to the prejudice of third persons, are less favoured in courts of equity than of law; yet the same maxim, that relations ought not in general to be allowed to prejudice third persons, prevails at law, but it was never applied there to restrain the operation of a judgment upon the debtor's property, in favour of a purchaser, until that was done by statute. And a court of equity, considering a judgment as operating a lien in equity upon the equitable rights of the debtor, as it would operate upon them at law if they were legal, seems to have followed the law in all its consequences; unless in cases of purchasers of the equity together with the legal estate, without notice of the judgment; in which case, the equity being equal, and the purchaser having the advantage of the legal title, a court of equity leaves the parties to their legal rights. I think the judgment overreached the conveyances in equity, as they would at law, if the estate of P. Coutts in the property in question, had been legal.

But that did not authorise the court to sell P. Coutts's interest in the property, out and out, subject to the annuity, as was directed by the chancellor's decree in this case. It is true, that there being two contemporary judgments, the whole of his interest was bound; a moiety by each: and, if there had been a previous mortgage or other incumbrance, under which the creditors entitled to them could have had the property sold, the appellee could have 282 insisted upon such sale, *and the satisfaction of the prior incumbrances out of the proceeds, and of his judgment out of the surplus, that being the effect of his right to redeem the prior incumbrances. But the annuity charged in this case, upon the property, not only did not charge it so as to subject it to sale, being payable out of the profits of the property only, but was in its nature irredeemable, for the annuitant could not be compelled to take a gross sum in lieu of the annuity. The only course, therefore, left for the court, was to decree that the trustee M'Craw, or a receiver appointed by the court, if that should appear to be proper, should take possession of the whole property, and receive the rents and profits thereof, and out of the net proceeds, first pay Mrs. Coutts her annuity of 500 dollars as it shall accrue, and the arrears thereof if any; next pay whatever may be found justly due to the trustee M'Craw, if any thing, for his fees, commissions and necessary expenditures as trustee under the marriage settlement of 1799, not by force of the deed of trust of the 28th February 1821, but of his original rights under the deed of 1799; then, dividing the surplus according to the rights of the parties entitled under the deed of 1799, pay the proportion thereof ascertained to belong to P. Coutts, to the appellee Walker, from time to time, until his judgments with interest and costs, and his costs in this suit, shall be fully satisfied; and, lastly, the residue to the parties who may be entitled thereto. And to this end, all persons entitled to claim any interest in the property under the deed of 1799, should be made parties.

In the deed of trust for the benefit of the appellant, one of the purposes is stated to be, to indemnify her against a bond executed by her with P. Coutts, and as his surety, to Burton, for the amount of an execution of ca. sa. in his favour against P. Coutts, and which had been executed. And it is suggested that the lien of the decree upon which the ca. sa. issued, and which had precedence of Walker's judgments, should be considered as still subsisting as to her, and that she should, by substitution to Burton's rights, have the 283 *benefit of it as against the appellee. But no such claim is set up in the bill; and if it were, I do not think it could be supported. The very act by which she became bound as surety, destroyed, and was intended to destroy, the lien of the decree, and from that moment the plaintiff could take no further execution upon it, or enforce it in any other way. It is like the case of a surety engaging as such, upon condition of the creditor's releasing a lien upon the debtor's property, and such a release executed contemporarily with the instrument by which the surety becomes bound. This is not at all like the case of Fox v. Rootes (decided in this court, Dec. 15, 1828, MS). There a ca. sa. was executed upon a decree against an administrator, who swore out of jail surrendering nothing: the surety in the administration bond paid the debt, and procured an assignment of the decree, and was substituted to the original lien of the decree against other creditors, who had a deed of trust of a subsequent date upon the debtor's land, before he swore out, but that very deed of trust provided for the satisfaction of the decree, together with other debts: and the court held, that the decree creditor ought not to lose his original preference over the deed of trust, by his unavailing effort to procure satisfaction out of other property of the debtor, and thus to benefit the other creditors provided for by that deed. No such reason exists in this case, for reviving in equity, the lien of a judgment or decree extinct at law, and barred by matter of record, and that at the instance and with the privity of the surety, and the intended consequence of the very act of becoming surety.

Case Overruled.—The question in Jackson v. Helskell, 1 Leigh 257, reconsidered in a full court, and decided contrary to the decision in that case.

Ca. Sa.—Elegit—Priority of Liens.*—Case at Bar.—Several creditors recover judgments against N. and sue out writs of ca. sa. upon which he is taken and charged in execution: then F. recovers judgment against the same debtor, and sues out an elegit, on which his lands are extended, and a moiety delivered to F. and then the debtor is regularly discharged from custody under the writs of ca. sa. as an insolvent debtor, putting into his schedule the whole of the lands which had been extended under F.'s elegit: HELD, the lien of the writs of ca. sa. executed, given by the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 10, does not overreach and avoid the extent under F.'s elegit.

In the circuit court of Berkeley, at May term 1821, Loyd recovered three judgments against Nadenbousch, upon which he sued out writs of capias ad satisfaciendum in July following, and Nadenbousch was taken and held in custody under them. The Bank of the Valley recovered a judgment against the same debtor, at the August term of the county court of Berkeley, and immediately sued out a ca. sa. which was served upon him. And, at the October term of the circuit court of Berkeley, The Bank of Conococheague recovered a judgment against him, and sued out a ca. sa. in November following, which was likewise served upon him. Afterwards, at May term 1823 of the same circuit court, Foreman recovered a judgment against Nadenbousch; and, in June following, he sued out an elegit thereupon, on which a moiety of a house and lot in Martinsburg was extended and delivered to Foreman. Nadenbousch had remained in custody from the time he was arrested at the suit of Loyd, till the execution of Foreman's elegit, and was then in custody, charged in execution at the suit of Loyd, of The Bank of the Valley, and of The Bank of Conococheague. And in July 1824, while he yet remained in custody, he confessed a judgment (as it seemed) to Janney, upon which he was prayed in custody and charged in execution; whereupon he delivered in a schedule of his effects, and was regularly discharged as an insolvent 285 debtor. The house and *lot, which had been extended on Foreman's elegit, was mentioned in his schedule, without any reference to Foreman's interest therein. The sheriff of Berkeley, claiming the moiety of the house and lot, extended in Foreman's elegit, as part of Nadenbousch's estate, subject to the claims of the creditors at whose suit the debtor had been held in execution, at the instance of the ca. sa. creditors, proceeded to advertise the whole tenement for sale, to satisfy the debts due them.

Foreman exhibited his bill in the superior court of chancery of Winchester, stating the facts, claiming priority over the ca. sa. creditors, and praying an injunction to restrain the sheriff from selling the moiety of the house and lot which he claimed and held as tenant by elegit. And the injunction was awarded, on the ground that the case presented a question of novelty and difficulty, which it was important to settle, in order to prevent the sacrifice of the property and loss to all parties concerned, which might result from the sale of a doubtful title. But the chancellor, afterwards, holding that Foreman's elegit, and the extent under it, gave him no rights, as against Loyd and the other ca. sa. creditors, at whose suit Nadenbousch had been previously taken and was then held and charged in execution, dissolved the injunction. Foreman appealed to this court.

The case presented the same question, which was decided, by a court consisting of only three judges, in Jackson v. Heiskell, 1 Leigh, 257, as to the construction and effect of the 10th section of the statute concerning executions, introduced at the late revision, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, which provides, "That every sale, conveyance and transfer of any lands or tenements, made by any person charged in execution for any debt or damages, shall be absolutely null and void, as to the creditor or creditors at whose suit he is so charged in execution, unless such sale, transfer or conveyance be absolute and bona fide, and be made for the payment of the debt land damages due to such creditor or creditors, and the proceeds of such sale, conveyance or transfer, *be paid or secured to be paid within a reasonable time to such creditor or creditors: and that all executions of capias ad satisfaciendum, levied after the commencement of this act, shall bind the real estate of the defendant from the time when they shall be levied."

*Ca. Sa.—Elegit—Priority of Liens.—As overruling Jackson v. Heiskell, 1 Leigh 257, the principal case is cited in Rogers v. Marshall, 4 Leigh 432; Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 159; Charron v. Boswell, 18 Gratt. 226. In this last case, it is admitted that the principal case settles the law as to the question therein discussed.

The principal case was also cited in Findlay v. Tomcra, 2 Rob. 877, 880; Erskine v. Staley, 12 Leigh 426, and distinguished in Charron v. Boswell, 18 Gratt. 226.

The question now came before a full court; and Leigh for the appellant, and Johnson for the appellees, referring to their respective arguments on the point, reported in Jackson v. Heiskell, submitted it without farther discussion.

CARR, J. This case brings under review the decision in Jackson v. Heiskell, as to the extent of the lien given to a capias ad satisfaciendum executed, by the 10th section of the revised statute of executions of 1819. The court decided in that case, that the provision contained in that new section of the statute, was not restricted merely to settling priorities between ca. sa. creditors, but was general in its operation: in so much, that if A. levy a ca. sa. on B. and while he is in execution under it, C. gets a judgment against him, and extends his land, and then B. is discharged as an insolvent debtor; the lien of A.'s ca. sa. overreaches C.'s elegit, and takes the land. But that case being decided by a court of three judges, and the question being new and important, we declared that we should be willing to hear it reargued before a full court, if any subsequent case should bring it up. In the case now before us, the point was not re-argued; but we were referred to the former argument, now in print; and to a more abundant source of light we could not have been referred, for it is an argument which exhausts the subject. I have again read it, both in the printed form, and in my notes, and have re-examined my former opinion, with my best care, and with the advantage of conferring with my brethren, and hearing their opinions: still I have found nothing to change, in the view before taken. The law, however harsh, however unwise, is, to my understanding, expressed in terms too plain to be changed by *construction, or judicial action in any form. I must, therefore, adhere to my former opinion on the question, to which I refer.

GREEN, J. This case presents precisely the same question, in respect to the lien of an executed ca. sa. upon the lands of the debtor, which was lately decided in a court of three judges; and it is peculiarly fit for a reconsideration in a full court. But, upon reconsideration, my opinion remains unchanged, and I have but little to add to the observations I formerly made on the question.

The main object of the new section, introduced into our statute of executions at the late revision, was, obviously, to secure the property of the debtor for the satisfaction of the creditor at whose suit he was in execution; a preference certainly not unjust in respect to subsequent judgment creditors, who, if no ca. sa., had been executed, would have been postponed. And the only question is, Whether the provision was intended to give this preference to the ca. sa. creditors, only as against the alienations of the debtor, or as to all others who had not acquired a right of some sort in the debtor's property, anterior to the execution of the ca. sa.? The declaration at the end of the section, as to the binding force of a ca. sa. executed, is in its terms unlimited, and would have effected the object in both its branches, without any thing more; overreaching not only all alienations of the debtor, made after the service of the ca. sa. and all judgments against him subsequent to the same period, and giving priority to the creditors at whose suit he was in execution, according to the dates of the service of their respective executions. It is, therefore, difficult, and, indeed, impossible, to ascertain for what purpose the previous provision of that section was introduced: for if the effect of the ca. sa. was frustrated by any means (the death or escape of the debtor) that provision would not in any degree strengthen the rights of the creditors, since they would have been remitted to the original lien of their judgments, precisely as *if the writs of ca. sa. had never been executed.

If, on the other hand, the ca. sa. was consummated by the debtor's taking the oath of an insolvent, the last provision of the section would effect every thing embraced in the former, and more; as it would determine the priorities among the creditors, which the former part of the section would not. If we say, that it was the whole purpose of the last clause of the section, to determine those priorities, then, in effect, we frustrate intirely the design of the whole section; and the debtor will be enabled to give a preference to his creditors, other than those at whose suit he is in execution, to the whole extent of this property, not indeed by direct conveyances, but by confessing judgments to them, and thus enabling them to take his whole property in execution, to the exclusion of those creditors at whose suit he is in custody; and this, in opposition both to the letter and spirit of the statute. How it happened, that this new section of the statute of executions, terminated with a provision which rendered all that preceded it nugatory, we cannot know. I conjecture, however, that it was introduced as an amendment in the senate, with a view to extend the operation of the clause, according to the literal import of the terms of the amendment, without adverting to its effect upon the previous provisions.

COALTER, J. In construing a remedial statute, the rule is to see how the law stood before, then what was the mischief, and, finally, what remedy has been enacted.

At common law, the execution of a ca. sa. was a satisfaction of the debt, unless indeed the debtor escaped, in which case, it seems, even before the statute 8 and 9 Will. 3, ch. 26, a scire facias lay to have execution against him. 2 Bac. Abr. Escape, C. p. 515, and the cases there cited. It was intirely reasonable, that this act of the debtor should not deprive the plaintiff of his remedy. But if he died in jail, the remedy was at an end, until it was provided,

against the lands, goods and chattels, in the same way as if he had never been taken in execution, provided that such execution against the lands shall not extend to charge any lands, which shall, at any time after the judgment, be sold bona fide for the payment of any of his creditors, and the money paid or secured to be paid to any of his creditors, with their privity and consent. A similar provision was made here, by act of 1748, ch. 12, § 3, 4, 5 Hen. stat. at large, 531, with this difference, that in the proviso, the subsequent sale and conveyance which are to be protected, are to be made bona fide for the payment of any of his creditors at whose suit he shall be in execution, and the money paid or secured to be paid to any such creditors, with their privity. This was re-enacted, by act of 1792, (edi. of 1794, ch. 5, § 7, 8,) and forms the 8th and 9th sections of the revised statute of executions of 1819. We have no provision similar to that of 8 and 9 Will 3. But, I presume, the common law rule, existing before that statute, would be fortified here, by the policy which runs through all our acts, viz. to continue to give executions until complete satisfaction is made. Even when a party, so far from escaping, surrenders all his estate, execution may afterwards be obtained, in case he shall again acquire property. So, too, when he dies in prison. Besides, the sheriff here, is not liable except for a voluntary or negligent escape. It would be out of the question, then, to suppose, that a tortious escape should prejudice the creditor, or that a voluntary one should deprive him of all remedy except against the sheriff, who may be insolvent. I take it, then, that either where the debtor escapes, or dies in jail, the plaintiff may have any new execution which he could have had if the ca. sa. had never been executed. If the debtor, before he escapes, has sold his lands, to pay his creditor at whose suit he is in execution, which the creditor has assented to and received the money; of course, such purchase would be protected, even without a provision by law similar to that "provided in the case of his dying in jail. 290 It would be, in either case, a sale, in fact, by the creditor.

Thus stood the law, as it appears to me, when the legislature took up the subject in the year 1819. The mischief which existed, and was intended to be provided against, was this: the debtor might sell his lands for their value; and might prefer to remain in the prison bounds or in jail, until he had spent the money, and then obtain a discharge as an insolvent debtor. In this case, if he lived to be so discharged, and did not escape from jail, the creditor would be deprived of his original lien by the judgment on his lands. The object of the 10th section, was to prevent this. By that section, every sale, conveyance and transfer of any lands or tenements made by any person charged in execution, &c. shall be null and void, as to the creditor or creditors at whose suit he is charged in execution, unless it be absolute and bona fide, and made for the payment of the debt or damages due to such creditor or creditors, and the proceeds be paid, or secured to be paid, within a reasonable time, to such creditor or creditors. In this clause, the words, with their privity, used in the preceding section, are dropped. It may be, that the legislature intended, that a debtor, intending to take the oath of insolvency, might be able to make a better sale, especially on a reasonable credit, than could be made by the sheriff; and if he did this, bona fide, and secured the proceeds to the creditors, so as to pay more of his debts, than by a sale made by the sheriff for cash, subject too, to his commissions, he might do so, without consent of the creditors. But, unless done in this way, the sale, it is said, is void, and the title to the property would pass to and vest in the sheriff, whether it was put into the schedule or not, in the same way, as though no sale had been made. But, if the debtor had sold before he was charged in execution though after the judgment, suing out a ca. sa. being (except so far as this statute provides) an abandonment forever of the creditor's right to charge the land, in case the debtor should not die or escape 291 (as before *mentioned) but should take the oath of insolvency, such intermediate sale (it is said, and I have no doubt) would stand good.

But there is also another case, in which, it is said, the creditor cannot, under this clause, affect his debtor's lands, though not aliened by him: the case of a subsequent judgment creditor taking an elegit, and having the lands extended subsequent to the execution of the ca. sa. It is contended, that, in such case, the ca. sa. creditor, or the sheriff for him, can only take the other moiety, and the moiety extended subject to the extent. There is no doubt, I believe, that this would be the case, if the extent was before ca. sa. levied. Thus, if A. recovers a judgment against B. and afterwards C. recovers a judgment against him, and has his lands extended; and then A. sues his ca. sa. which is executed, and B. swears out; the schedule will only convey to the sheriff the moiety that is unextended, and the other moiety subject to the extent. But if B. dies in jail, or escapes, then A. can resort to his elegit, and will have half the land extended; and if, in doing this, he necessarily interferes with C. he will only be displaced until A. receives his debt, and will then hold until his is paid also. This, it seems to me, would be the inevitable consequence, because the last clause of the section, which declares that all executions of ca. sa. shall bind the real estate of the defendant from the time they shall be levied, could not have the effect to alter the course. This, I believe, is not contended for by any one. But, if A. had levied his execution of ca. sa. before C. had obtained his judgment, and extended the lands; then, if B. the debtor, had either escaped or died in prison, A. could resort to his elegit as aforesaid, and, in that way, no doubt he could affect C.; but, it is said, if B. is discharged as an insolvent, the schedule will convey to the sheriff the whole land clear of C's tenancy by elegit, and the sheriff must sell the whole as though no such extent had taken place.

This, I presume, no one will contend could be done under the first member of the section. That is intended, according to its words, merely to avoid conveyances by the debtor, so as to obviate the mischief above noticed. It says not a word about avoiding liens created altogether by law. If that had been the object, is it to be supposed, that, when the debtor died in jail, or escaped, they would only give the prior judgment creditor an elegit, which at most could only displace the subsequent judgment creditor for a time, and frequently not at all, the other moiety being still there, and subject to be extended, but that when the debtor swore out, the ca. sa. creditor would be permitted to sell the whole, and forever disappoint the other creditor? His want of power to do this, it seems to me, never could have been considered by the legislature as an evil; and, therefore, there is no provision in the first member of the section in relation to such a case. Does the last member of the section necessarily produce this effect?

This, as it seems to me, would be to construe the first member as something in the nature of a preamble, and the second as the enacting clause, extending beyond the principal mischief recited in the preamble. Had the legislature intended by that clause, that liens created by law, as well as sales &c. made by the party, should be avoided, I think it would not only have used more appropriate and explicit words, but would have made some provision for the subsequent judgment creditor, who is thus put in a situation so much worse than he would have stood, had the prior creditor taken his elegit in the first instance. There would have been some provision to give him the residue of the purchase money; so as to place him at least in as good a situation as though he also had sued a ca. sa. To give the law the construction contended for, seems to me not only to hold out a premium to creditors to imprison their debtors, but to impose a penalty on those who will not do so. This is precisely the reverse of the common law. Its original rigour against a creditor suing out a ca. sa. has been relaxed in the cases above noticed, and still further by the provisions in the first member of the section: but, surely, there was no mischief which required the legislature to go farther: and if the latter member of the sentence can receive a construction, which will satisfy its terms, without producing such consequences, I think we ought to give it.

It seems to me, that it is a mistake to suppose, that this member of the section was intended to create a lien in favour of the creditor, on the land. Every man who took a debtor in execution, had, ipso facto, and before this act, so far a lien on his land, as well as personal estate, that if he conveyed them in any way, fraudulently, or otherwise contrary to law, so as unlawfully to defeat the creditor, the property, though not in the schedule, passed to the sheriff for the benefit of the creditor. Fraudulent conveyances, for instance, being void as to the creditor, the title accrued to the sheriff. So here, when the statute avoids conveyances by the first member of the section, it was unnecessary to go farther, in order to vest the title in the sheriff for the benefit to the creditor or creditors. So it was as to personal property sold, however bona fide, after a fi. fa. delivered to the sheriff. It is the declaration of the law, that the sale is void, which gives the right to the creditor. Whether the last member of the section, then, was intended merely to declare the time, after which sales made by debtors in execution should be void, so as to remove any doubt which might exist on that subject under the first member, or to establish a priority, unknown before, between creditors, where their debtor swore out, I do not think it material, nor is it proper, perhaps, to decide at this time, inasmuch as if it was intended either for the one or the other, or both, I think the clause in question merely related to that kind of lien or disability, which was created by the first member of the section.

The question as to the preference between the ca. sa. creditors is not before us. If it was, it might be said, that the debtor whose sale was made under the 9th section, although formerly it would be protected, if made for the benefit of any of his creditors, would not now be protected, if made for the benefit of any of them except in the order of priority now insisted on; and also, that although formerly (and under precisely the same words as are now found in the statute) when a debtor swore out, all the creditors shared pro rata, they should now be paid according to priority; and that even similar words in the clause under consideration, which protects a sale made for the payment of the debt due the creditor or creditors, and paid or secured to be paid to him or them, shall be exercised subordinate to the priorities supposed to be established by the latter clause of this section. That may, however, have been its intention. All I mean to say at present, is, that I do not think it necessary or proper to decide that point.

The section says, that all executions of ca. sa. shall bind the real estate of the defendant from the time when they shall be levied. It is not even the beginning of a new sentence. If we can, therefore, fairly construe it to mean, that they shall bind the land, because no sale can be made, after the world has notice by a ca. sa. levied, that the party is in custody, unless made bona fide to pay the creditor or creditors, it seems to me, every mischief which existed is remedied.

If it be said, that it was unnecessary to enact this clause, in order to fix the time when the disability to convey should begin, because the first part of the section declares, that every sale &c. made by any person charged in execution, means any sale made by him after he is taken in execution; still I say this may not have been considered intirely clear. Some may have doubted, whether, after execution delivered to the sheriff, though the party had not then been taken, he might not be considered, in some sense, as charged in execution, so as to be unable to convey, should he afterwards be surrendered or surrender himself in execution (something like the case of a fi. fa. delivered to the sheriff) and so the legislature. ex abundante cautela, may have thought proper more explicitly to declare what might have been a fair inference from the preceding words; or it may have been intended also to establish the priorities supposed. Be this *as it may, however, I am not satisfied, that the legislature intended to create a lien by the ca. sa. so as to overreach rights acquired otherwise than as specified in the preceding member of the sentence. I can see no reason for extending it farther; no mischief to be obviated; but many which will be the consequence of such construction, evidently calling for legislative interposition: and being enabled, as it seems to me, to confine the construction as above, I think we ought to do so.

CABELL, J. The question decided by a court of three judges in Jackson v. Heiskell, is now presented for the consideration of a full court. The counsel who argued that case, are the same who are retained in this, and they have referred us to that argument for their full views of the subject. I was one of the judges who decided that case; and although I acquiesced, after the best consideration I could give to the subject, in the opinions delivered by the other judges, yet it is manifest, from the manner in which I expressed my assent, that my mind, even then, was not intirely free from doubt. The publication of Mr. Leigh's first volume of reports, exhibiting the able argument of the bar, on both sides, much more fully than my own brief and hasty notes had done, has enabled me to estimate their force more correctly; and I have had the benefit of a conference with the other judges who did not sit in that case. The effect of these advantages has been to convince me that I was in error; and I take pleasure in acknowledging it.

It was admitted by the judges who decided Jackson v. Heiskell, that the construction given to the 10th section, as to the lien of a ca. sa. executed, would have, in practice, a harshness of operation, which was probably not foreseen, and, therefore, not intended by the legislature. It was also admitted, that that section could apply only to those cases where debtors should be voluntarily discharged under the insolvent laws. I think the circumstance, that the section was probably intended only to operate on such cases, affords 296 *a clue to its true construction. Before the introduction of this provision, there was no limitation to the debtor's power of alienation previous to his discharge, except that it should be an honest alienation. He might not only give a preference to one out of many creditors, at whose suit he was in execution, but he might apply the proceeds of sale to those who had not sued at all. And it was to creditors of the latter description that the preference was most frequently given. Moreover, the power of alienation by the debtors, was frequently perverted to the most fraudulent purposes. It was the object of this 10th section to remedy these evils. That section declares, "that every sale, conveyance and transfer of any lands or tenements, made by any person charged in execution for any debt or damages, shall be absolutely null and void, as to the creditor or creditors at whose suit he is so charged in execution, unless such sale, conveyance and transfer be absolute and bona fide, and be made for the payment of the debt or damages due to such creditor or creditors, and the proceeds of such sale, conveyance and transfer, be paid, or secured to be paid within a reasonable time, to such creditor or creditors." It is obvious, that if the section had gone no farther, the debtor, although his power of alienation was much curtailed, might still have aliened for particular ca. sa. creditors, to the exclusion of the others; or, at least, that he might have aliened for the benefit of them all, pari passu. But even these were evils which the legislature determined to prevent. They determined, that whether the lands were sold by the debtor himself previous to his discharge, or by the sheriff after his discharge, the proceeds should be applied to the satisfaction of the creditors, according to the time at which their respective writs of ca. sa. should have been levied. They, therefore, added to that part of the 10th section, already quoted, the clause with which it is concluded, viz. "and that all executions of capias ad satisfaciendum, levied after the commencement of this act, shall bind the real estate of the defendant from the time when they shall be levied." I 297 think the sole *object of this declaration as to the lien of a ca. sa. levied, is to regulate the order in which the creditors are to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of an insolvent debtor's lands, whether the sale be made by the debtor before his discharge, or by the sheriff afterwards. This inference seems to be irresistible, when we advert to the place and manner in which the declaration is made by the legislature: in the member of a sentence, which speaks of nothing else but of the sale of an insolvent debtor's property, and of the application of the proceeds. If the legislature had intended it to have a more general operation; if it had intended it to overreach rights acquired by act of law, it would, I think, have made it the subject of a separate and independent section. In construing a remedial statute (such as this evidently is) we are bound to construe it liberally, so as to advance the remedy, and suppress the mischief; but we are not at liberty to construe it so as to go beyond that object, and by doing so, to introduce new mischiefs which will call for new legislation to remove. In construing this section so as to overreach only the voluntary alienations of the debtor, and to apply the proceeds of a sale by the debtor or the sheriff to the payment of the different creditors according to the order of the respective levies of their executions, we remove all the evils which the legislature intended to remove. But in giving it a more extensive operation we go beyond the mischiefs which the legislature designed to remove, and we give rise to new ones which it is admitted they did not foresee, and therefore could not intend.

I am of opinion that the rights acquired by Foreman, under his elegit, are unaffected by the 10th section of the statute of executions; and consequently, that the order of the chancellor dissolving the injunction ought to be reversed.

BROOKE, P. Waiving the question of jurisdiction, the controversy turns on the construction of the 10th section of the statute concerning executions. In construing a statute, the first object is so to construe it as to make it work a 298 *remedy for the mischief intended to be prevented. If all its words can be satisfied by such a construction, we need not carry them farther, however general they may be; especially, if by so doing we are met by inconveniences which we cannot be sure were overlooked by the legislature. The words in the first clause of this section, certainly do not, in terms, embrace the case before us: they make void all sales, conveyances or transfers of the lands of the debtor, after he shall be in execution by the service of a ca. sa. These terms "sales, conveyances or transfers," certainly do not embrace judgments, though if by confession with a view to defeat the object of the statute, they might be brought by construction within the mischief intended to be prevented. That mischief was, that debtors, to defeat the claims of their creditors at whose suit they were in execution, either fraudulently or bona fide as to others, sold, conveyed away, or transferred their land, the lien of the judgment of the creditor being released by suing out the ca. sa. That this was the mischief intended to be remedied, is made more manifest by the succeeding words of the section viz. "unless such sale, conveyance or transfer shall be absolute and bona fide, and be made for the payment of the debt or damages due such creditor"), thereby, I think, limiting the operation of the first member of the clause; in terms, to sales, conveyances or transfers, made by the debtor himself, and excluding involuntary judgments &c. Nor, though the words of the last clause of the section are still more general, do I think they were intended to do more than to effectuate the intention of the first clause. The terms of the last clause are, "Every execution of ca. sa. levied after the commencement of this act, shall bind the real estate of the defendant, from the time that it shall have been levied;" that is, the real estate so sold, conveyed away, or transferred, by the defendant, contrary to the provision in the first clause of the section. To carry it farther, would extend it to real estate subjected to the payment of the debts of other creditors, without any act of the debtor in execution, against 299 *which only it certainly was the object of the first clause to provide. It would carry the remedy greatly beyond the mischief, which does not consist with any sound rule of construction; especially, in a case, in which, I think, it clearly appears, that the provision in the first clause against sales &c. by the debtor, would have been ineffectual, without the aid of the last clause, empowering the officer to seize and sell the real estate sold &c. by the debtor in execution, contrary to the provision in the first.

In this view of the section, I can see nothing to justify the opinion, that its last clause was intended to settle priorities among creditors, at whose suit the debtor was in execution. There is certainly nothing in any part of the statute, to which to refer for this construction. Though the clause may have that effect, I cannot perceive that that consideration was in the view of the legislature, and much less that it alone was the object of the clause.

I concur in the opinion, that the decree of the chancellor be reversed, and the injunction perpetuated.

Decree reversed, injunction reinstated and perpetuated &c.

June, 1830.

Instrument of Emancipation—Ineffectual Until Full Probate Be Made*—Case at Bar.—A feme sole, owner of slaves, makes a written instrument of emancipation of them in November 1798, to take effect in futuro: this instrument is attested by two witnesses; it is partly proved by one of them, and continued for further proof, in April 1799, in the county court of Fluvanna, where the emancipator then resided: in November 1799, the emancipator, holding the persons named in her instrument of emancipation in her possession, marries T. who is ignorant of the execution of the instrument: then, T. removes with his wife to Albemarle, carrying the persons named in the instrument of emancipation with him as slaves: the wife dies in 1811; the husband continues to hold the persons in question, as his slaves: in 1819, the instrument of emancipation is fully proved by the other attesting witness, in the county court of Fluvanna; and, afterwards, the persons therein named, bring a suit against the husband, to recover their freedom: HELD, under the statute of Virginia, an instrument of emancipation is ineffectual to confer freedom, till full probat thereof be made according to law, and takes effect only from the date of the complete probat: and, as the rights of the husband, in this case, attached to the property long before full probat was made, the subsequent full probat did not divest or affect those rights or give any right to freedom.

Same—Where It May Be Proved—Case at Bar.—Semble, an instrument of emancipation being partly proved in the court of the county where the emancipator resides at the time, may be fully proved in the same county, though before full proof made, the emancipator removes to another county.

This was a suit in forma pauperis, brought by Hannah and Kate against Thrift, in the county court of Albemarle, to recover their freedom. The pleadings were in the usual form, and the issue joined on the question, whether the plaintiffs were bond or free. The parties, at the trial, agreed the facts of the case:

Rachel Magruder, on the 25th February 1796, being then a feme sole, residing in the county of Montgomery in Maryland, and holding the plaintiffs as her slaves, executed the following instrument of writing:

"To all to whom these presents shall come: Know ye, that I, Rachel Magruder, of Montgomery county and state of Maryland, for divers good causes and considerations me hereunto moving, have manumitted, enfranchised and set at liberty, and by these presents do manumit &c. one negro girl named Hannah, from and after the 1st March 1807; and all the increase whatever, male or female, issuing from her during the said time, I hereby declare to be manumitted &c. as they severally shall attain to the age of twenty-five years, both mother and children, from me, my heirs, executors and administrators, and from all persons whatsoever. In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and seal this 25th February 1796.

Instrument of Emancipation—Ineffectual Until Full Probate Be Made.—To the point that an instrument of emancipation is ineffectual to confer freedom, till full probat thereof be made according to law, the principal case and Givens v. Manns, 6 Munf. 191, were cited in Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 710. The principal case was also cited in Wood v. Humphreys, 12 Gratt. 357; Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 697, 704, 706, and distinguished in Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 707, 717.

Rachel Magruder, [seal]

Signed sealed and delivered in presence of William Smith."

This instrument of writing was, on the day of the date, acknowledged by her as her act and deed, before William Smith, a justice of the peace of the county of Montgomery, Maryland, and, the next day, admitted to record there.

At the time this instrument of emancipation was executed, there was a statute of Maryland in force, enacted in 1752, the provisions of which, so far as they affect this case, were in the following words—"Be it enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons within this province, by any verbal order, or by his, her or their last will and testament, or by any other instrument of writing in his, her or their last sickness, whereof he, she, or they shall die, to give, or grant freedom to any slave or slaves: and in any person, after the time aforesaid, shall, by any verbal order, or by his, her or their last will and testament, or by any other instrument, in his, her or their last sickness, whereof he, she or they shall die, give freedom to any slave or slaves, such order, will, or other writing, shall be void and of no effect, so far as relates to such freedom or emancipation only. And to the end, that hereafter there may be an uniform and regular manner of granting freedom to slaves, Be it likewise enacted, that where any person or persons, possessed of any slave or slaves within this province, who are or shall be of

302 healthy constitutions, and sound in mind *and body, capable by labour to procure sufficient food and raiment, with other requisite necessities of life, and not exceeding fifty years of age, and such person or persons, possessing such slave or slaves as aforesaid, and being willing and desirous to set free and manumit such slave or slaves, may by writing under his, her or their hand and seal, evidenced by two good and sufficient witnesses at least, grant to such slave or slaves, his, her or their freedom; and that any deed in writing, whereby freedom shall be given or granted to any such slave, which shall be intended to take place in futuro, shall be good to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever, from the time such freedom or manumission is intended to commence by the said deed or writing, so that such deed and writing be not in prejudice of creditors, and that such slave at the time such freedom or manumission shall take place or commence, be not above the age aforesaid, and be able to work and gain a sufficient livelihood and maintenance, according to the true intent and meaning of this act; which instrument of writing shall be acknowledged before one justice of the peace of the county wherein the person or persons granting such freedom shall reside; which justice shall indorse on the back of such instrument, the time of the acknowledgment, and the party making the same, which he or they, or the parties concerned, shall cause to be entered among the records of the county court, where the person or persons granting such freedom shall reside, in six months after the date of such instrument of writing."

After the execution of the above recited instrument of emancipation, in December 1796, the legislature of Maryland passed another statute, repeating the provisions of the statute of 1752, with some alterations and additions: it enacted, "That where any person or persons, possessed of any slave or slaves within this state, who are or shall be of healthy constitutions, and sound in mind and body, capable by labour to procure to him or them sufficient food and raiment, with other requisite necessities of life, and not exceeding 303 *forty-five years of age, and such person or persons possessing such slave or slaves as aforesaid, and being willing and desirous to set free or manumit such slave or slaves, may by writing under his or their hand and seal, evidenced by two good and sufficient witnesses at least, grant such slave or slaves, his, her or their freedom; and that any deed or writing, whereby freedom shall be given or granted to any such slave, which shall be intended to take place in futuro, shall be good to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever, from the time that such freedom or manumission is intended to commence by the said deed or writing, so that such deed and writing be not in prejudice of creditors, and that such slave, at the time such freedom or manumission shall take place or commence, be not above the age aforesaid, and be able to work and gain a sufficient livelihood and maintenance, according to the true intent and meaning of this act; which instrument of writing shall be acknowledged before one justice of the peace of the county wherein the person or persons granting such freedom shall reside; which justice shall indorse on the back of such instrument, the time of the acknowledgment, and the party making the same, which he or they, or the parties concerned, shall cause to be entered among the records of the county court where the person or persons granting such freedom shall reside, within six months after the date of such instrument of writing; and the clerks of the respective county courts within this state, shall, immediately upon the receipt of such instrument, indorse the time of his receiving the same, and shall well and truly enrol such deed or instrument in a good and sufficient book in folio, to be regularly alphabeted in the names of both parties, and to remain in the custody of the said clerk for the time being, among the records of the respective county courts; and that the said clerk shall, on the back of every such instrument, in a full legible hand, make an indorsement of such enrolment, and also of the folio of the books in which the same shall be enrolled, and to such instrument *set his hand, the person or persons requiring such entry paying the usual and legal fees for the same."

And in 1810, another statute of Maryland was passed, concerning servants and slaves, so much of which as affects the present case, was in the following words: "Be it enacted that any deed heretofore executed for the manumission of any slave or slaves, who by law might have been manumitted or set free by deed, and which had been acknowledged and recorded in the manner directed by the act entitled an act relating to negroes, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned, shall be valid and effectual in law, to give freedom to any such slave or slaves and their issue, although such deed of manumission or writing as aforesaid may not have been evidenced by two or more good and sufficient witnesses. And be it enacted, that a copy of any such deed of manumission or writing as aforesaid, taken from the records of the county, and duly attested under the seal of the court, shall, at all times hereafter, be deemed to all intents and purposes, good evidence to prove such deed of manumission: provided always, that nothing in this act contained, shall be so construed as to affect or destroy the right of any person, who before the passage of this act, was a bona fide purchaser of any slave or slaves, claiming his, her or their freedom, under such deed of manumission; and provided also, that notwithstanding such deed of manumission, no slave shall be entitled to his or her freedom under the provisions of this act, who has heretofore been adjudged to be a slave, by any court of law in this state."

Rachel Magruder, being still a feme sole, and having the plaintiffs in her possession, sometime between the 26th February 1796, and the 25th November 1798, removed, and brought the plaintiffs with her, to the county of Fluvanna in Virginia, where she resided, with the plaintiffs in her possession, till her intermarriage with the defendant Thrift; upon which, she and her husband removed to the county of Albemarle, carrying the plaintiffs with them, and continued to reside there, till the death of Rachel, the wife, in 1811.

305 *But, on the 25th November 1798, before her marriage with Thrift, Rachel Magruder, then residing in Fluvanna, with the plaintiffs in her possession, executed the following instrument:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Rachel Magruder of Fluvanna county and state of Virginia, for divers good causes me thereunto moving, do set free, manumit and release from slavery, the following negroes at the periods hereafter mentioned, viz. negro Toney, one year from the date hereof; negro Pharo, one year from the date hereof; negro Hannah, eight years from the date hereof, and her future increase, males at the age of twenty-five, and females at the age of twenty-one years; negro Kate, nine years from the date hereof, and her increase, males and females, at the age of twenty-five years; and do hereby declare the said negroes named as above, as soon as the periods as above mentioned arrive, to be free, and released from all claims against them as servants, both from all persons claiming under them, or to claim by, from or under me, as well as from myself. As witness my hand and seal this 25th November 1798.

Teste, J. B. Magruder, T. D. Boyd."

This last instrument of emancipation was partly proved, by one of the subscribing witnesses, in the county court of Fluvanna, at April term 1799; and at June term 1819, it was further proved by the other; and was, thereupon, admitted to record.

The plaintiffs were the same persons mentioned in the deeds of emancipation, by the names of Hannah and Kate: and they were, and always had been, sound and healthy; capable, at the institution of this suit, of maintaining themselves by their own labour; and, on the 1st March 1807, not above forty-five years of age.

306 *The marriage of Rachel Magruder with the defendant Thrift, took place the 7th November 1799; she being still in possession of the plaintiffs, and having always continued in possession of them, as before stated. Thrift held continual possession of them, from the time of his marriage till the institution of this suit. And Thrift, at the time of his marriage, had no knowledge of either of the instruments of emancipation, unless notice of them may be imputed to him, from the previous proof of the Virginia instrument, by one of the subscribing witnesses, in the county court of Fluvanna, in April 1799.

This being the agreed state of the case, the counsel for the plaintiffs moved the court to instruct the jury, that the two instruments of emancipation of February 1796 and November 1798, were both good in law, and competent to give the plaintiffs their freedom. The county court was of that opinion, and so instructed the jury; and Thrift filed exceptions to the opinion.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; from which Thrift appealed to the circuit court of Albemarle, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellant, and by Johnson assigned counsel by the court, for the appellees.

I. The first question was, Whether the Maryland instrument of emancipation of 1796, was duly executed and perfected to confer freedom on Hannah, according to the laws of that state? Whether the statute of Maryland of 1752, did not require, that all instruments of emancipation, as well those intended to confer freedom in future as those which conferred it presently and immediately, should not only be acknowledged before a justice of the peace and recorded, but attested by two good and sufficient witnesses at least? See James v. Gaither, 307 2 Har. & Johns. 176, *which was decided in 1807, and probably gave occasion to the Maryland statute of 1810.

II. Then, as to the instrument of emancipation of 1798, executed in Virginia, Stanard referred to the statute, 1 Rev.

Code, ch. 111, § 53, p. 433,* and to Givens v. Manns, 6 Munf. 191, and Lewis v. Fullerton, 1 Rand. 15, as settling the construction of the statute, that the probat is essential to the perfection and efficacy of such instruments. He remarked, that the statute does not call these instruments of emancipation deeds, but only instruments in writing: neither were they nor could they be deeds, for they were not contracts; there could be no contract between master and slave; and as there was nobody capable to receive delivery, so there could be no delivery of them. The legislature, mindful of this, had appointed the court to receive probat of instruments of emancipation; had substituted the agency of the court to perfect them by taking the proof or acknowledgment of them, in lieu of the agency of the parties in perfecting deeds by making and receiving delivery. An instrument of emancipation, then, depending for its consummation, and for all its efficacy, upon the probat, could only take effect from the probat, and was not binding on the party who made it, till the probat: he might decline or refuse to acknowledge it, or let it be proved, in court; hold it in his own possession; revoke, cancel or destroy it, at pleasure; and if, in the mean time, the rights of third persons in any way attached to the subject as property, the subsequent probat could not divest those previously vested rights. It would be most 308 strange, and of most pernicious *consequence, if these instruments of emancipation might be held up for any indefinite period of time, and then, upon being proved, should be allowed to overreach rights accrued and vested in the interval; and the vested rights too of purchasers without notice. In the present case, the property of these slaves was vested in Thrift by his marriage with Rachel Magruder in 1799, and the instrument of emancipation, under which they claimed freedom, was never proved, and therefore never of any efficacy, till 1819. It was never proved till twenty years after the marriage, and till eight years after the death of the maker of it. And as her marriage, and her death, each, annihilated her power to acknowledge or have it proved in court, so they were, each, the most effectual revocation of it imaginable. In fine, the instrument was not proved, at last, before a court of competent jurisdiction to receive the probat; for the statute requires, that the probat shall be made in the court of the county where the party resides; and this instrument was finally proved in 1819, in Fluvanna, whence the party had removed twenty years before, and thenceforth till her death resided in Albemarle.

Johnson insisted, that though the probat of such instruments was essential to the efficacy of them to confer the right of freedom, that did not affect the question, what was the legal operation and effect of them after they were proved. It was not decided in Givens v. Manns, that such instruments take effect from the probat, but only that the probat must be in the county court; and Lewis v. Fullerton established nothing more than that a deed of emancipation executed in Ohio to operate in Virginia, must be perfected and proved according to our laws: neither of those cases touch the question in this case, which is, whether the act of emancipation, when duly proved, should take effect from the date of the probat, or from the date of its execution? The distinction attempted between deeds and instruments of emancipation, he said,

309 was too nice; there *was no policy of law that required any such rigour in regard to those instruments. In principle, they ought, like other deeds, to take effect the moment they were delivered to the party himself, or to any body else for him; the moment the maker of them put them out of his own possession, with intent to divest himself of all farther controul over them, and to have them proved according to the provisions of the statute. For, he said, the manifestation of the maker's will, was as complete by this act, as he could make it by any act. In this case, the owner of the slaves, having executed the instrument of emancipation in due form of law, delivered, or caused or allowed it to be delivered, into court, in order that it should be proved; and it was proved in part soon after it was executed: thenceforth, it was in the possession and custody of the court: she could in no manner recover possession of it: how could she revoke the act which put the instrument out of her hands, and gave it to the court? how could she cancel or destroy it? And if no express revocation of the act was possible, how could revocation be implied from her marriage? If the argument for the appellant were just, it would lead to strange consequences; it would prove, that after the owner of a female slave has executed a deed of emancipation, after he has delivered it to another to be delivered into court and proved, even after he has himself acknowledged it or had it proved, her children born between the execution and the probat of the instrument, are slaves. As to the probat being completed in Fluvanna, where it was commenced, though the party had long before removed to Albemarle, he said, if the statute required, that an instrument of emancipation, when proved by witnesses, should be proved in the court of the county where the party resides, (which he did not admit) still the proper court was that where the party resides at the date of the execution of the instrument, not of the probat: especially, when, as in this case, the probat has already been commenced, and properly commenced, it ought to be finished in the court where it was begun.

310 *CARR, J. The deed of emancipation of Hannah, executed in 1796, by Rachel Magruder, then a feme sole residing in Maryland, purports to give the slave her freedom not presently, but after some years. It was executed under a statute of

*The words of the statute are. "It shall be lawful for any person, by his or her last will and testament, or by any other instrument in writing, under his or her hand and seal, attested and proved, in the county or corporation court, by two witnesses, or acknowledged by the party in the court of the county where he or she resides, to emancipate and set free his or her slaves, or any of them: who shall thereupon be intirely and fully discharged from the performance of any contract entered into during servitude, and enjoy as full freedom as if they had been particularly named and freed by this act."—Note in Original Edition.

Maryland of 1752; a statute very darkly and clumsily penned. That statute speaks of deeds giving freedom in presenti, and deeds giving freedom in futuro; and, to my understanding, requires that the former shall be evidenced by two witnesses, but that the latter shall be good if acknowledged before a magistrate and recorded. The deed before us is so acknowledged and recorded. I, therefore, should have considered it good and valid, but that we find it decided by the court of appeals of Maryland, in James v. Gaither, that a deed giving future freedom, must be evidenced by two witnesses, as well as acknowledged before a magistrate, and recorded. Yielding my opinion to the construction given to this statute of Maryland by her own courts, I shall proceed to consider the next and much more important question, arising under our own laws, and affecting a numerous class of cases.

Was the county court right in its instruction to the jury, that the deed of emancipation of 1798, executed by Rachel Magruder, then a feme sole residing in Fluvanna, was good and effectual? Against the validity of this deed several objections were taken at the bar. It was insisted, that it was a nullity until it was fully proved in court: that it must take its date as a deed from the time of such final proof: that the delivery of the deed, if delivered to the witness or another, was no delivery in law, but a mere authority to have it recorded; an authority revocable by the grantor, at any moment before full proof in court; and revoked in this case, by her marriage and death before such proof was exhibited: and that the probat was not in the proper county. At common law, we know, the sealing and delivery of a deed make it binding at once on the grantor, and irrevocable by any after act of his; and this delivery may be either by word or act, and either to the grantee or a third person; *and any thing which amounts to evidence that the act or word was meant as a delivery, will constitute one. The delivery being the perfection and consummation of the deed, throws the proof of any restriction or condition upon it, on the grantor. All this will be admitted, as to deeds between parties capable of contracting; but it was insisted, that as slaves are not so, none of these rules apply to deeds of emancipation. But do not these rules apply to deeds of gift, and may not such deeds be executed to many who have a capacity to receive deeds, though not to contract? In truth, is not every deed, as a common law instrument under seal, governed by the same rules? Does not the execution of the deed, in all cases, take from the grantor the power of revocation? When the statute gives every owner the right to emancipate his slave by instrument in writing, under his hand and seal, it describes (to my mind) a deed; and to this deed we must annex (unless the statute forbid it, which it does not) the common law incidents and attributes of deeds, with the principles which govern them. As, then, slaves may be emancipated by deed, such deed may be delivered; for a delivery is necessary to its completion, and such delivery binds the grantor from its date; for such is the rule of the common law. It is true, this rule is so far controuled by the statute, that the deed is not effectual, unless proved by two witnesses, or acknowledged by the party in the court of the county where he resides; but when so proved or acknowledged, it is a deed from the date of its execution. And it will be remarked, that though in other cases, eight months are given, as the general period within which deeds shall be recorded, in deeds of emancipation no time is limited. It was contended at the bar, that there could be no delivery of this deed of emancipation, but to the court which received the final proof; and that, of consequence, it could not, till such probat, be consummated. But the statute itself shews that this is a mistake. It says, "the instrument may be proved in the county court by two witnesses." Now, 312 to what would they testify? *Why, that on some prior day, they saw the grantor sign, seal and deliver the deed, or heard him acknowledge the same. The delivery, then, in all such cases, must be out of court, and prior to the probat.

It was considered (in the argument) monstrous, that a deed should thus be held back for twenty years, and when at length proved, have relation to its execution, and thus intercept rights which had grown up in the meantime. But, 1. the law has limited no time within which, if the deed be not recorded, it shall be void; and 2. this tardiness of the second witness can hardly be charged to the paupers; for on their rights it has operated most injuriously. By the deed, one of them (if entitled at all) was entitled to be free in 1806; the other in 1807: yet they remained in slavery, and the deed unproved, till 1819; and if this last witness had died, they might have lost wholly the benefit of it. By this delay in the proof, then, they had every thing to lose; the appellant, every thing to gain.

But it was said, that the decisions of this court have settled the doctrine, that the deed is a nullity until fully proved according to the statute; and Givens v. Manns and Lewis v. Fullerton, were referred to. I have examined these cases, and do not think they go so far. In Givens v. Manns, all the court said on the point, is this: "the court is further of opinion, that the alleged deed of emancipation (made part of the record in this bill of exceptions) not being acknowledged or proved in the court of the county or corporation, as the law directs, was not so authenticated as to make it evidence in the trial, nor ought to be received as such evidence, until it shall be proved or acknowledged before the proper court."

Here we see, the deed, so far from being treated as a nullity, expressly considered as an existing deed; not so authenticated, to be sure, as to make it evidence; but still capable of being made so, by proof in the proper court. In Lewis v. Fullerton, the deed of emancipation was executed in Ohio, by Rogers, styling himself a citizen of Virginia: it looked to this state for 313 its operation and effect, *but was not proved according to our laws: and the court said, "In that case, it must, to have its effect, conform to the laws of Virginia. It is insufficient, under those laws, to effectuate emancipation, for want of a due recording in the county court, as was decided in Givens v. Manns, in this court." Thus we see, that in neither of those cases, was the deed pronounced null and void, but in each, the deed was treated as a deed defectively proved.

With respect to the third objection, that the deed was not proved in the proper county; the grantor resided in Fluvanna, when the deed was executed, and also when it was proved in the court of that county by one witness: and it is clear to me, that that was the proper court to receive the full proof.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the instruction of the county court was right as to the Virginia deed, and that both judgments should be affirmed.

GREEN, J. But for a decision of the court of appeals of Maryland in 1807, I should have thought that the deed of emancipation, executed and recorded in that state in 1796, would have effectually emancipated the appellee Hannah, from the time appointed by the deed; there being an obvious distinction in the authentication required by the Maryland statute of 1752, for instruments giving immediate freedom, and those giving it in futuro. The statute of Maryland of 1810, repudiates the decision of the court, by confirming all instruments authenticated as this is, saving the vested rights of strangers, and those affirmed by previous adjudications: and if this case was not to be decided by a Maryland court, Hannah would necessarily prevail by force of the instrument of 1796. But, as the Maryland statute of 1810 never attached upon this case, we ought to yield to the construction given to the statute of 1752, by the supreme judicial tribunal of that state.

The case turns, then, on the effect of the instrument executed in Virginia in 1798, which the appellant insists was 314 *not duly recorded, either as to the place or time where and when it was recorded.

If this paper could be recorded any where, so as to give it effect after the marriage and death of the owner who executed it, I think the county in which she resided at the time of its execution, was the proper place in which to record it, although she no longer continued to reside there. The literal terms of the section of our statute authorising the emancipation of slaves, do not require, that the instrument of emancipation, when recorded upon the proof of witnesses, shall be proved in any particular county or corporation court. It is only when it is authenticated by the acknowledgment of the owner, that it is required to be acknowledged in the court of the county in which he resides. According to those literal terms, in the first case of proof by witnesses, it is sufficient if that be made in the court of any county or corporation of the state. But this is probably not the true construction of the statute, as it might counteract its policy in requiring the instrument to be proved or acknowledged in a court: whatever was the object of that requisition, it will be best promoted by confining the proof or acknowledgment to the county, in which the owner resided at the time of the attestation of the witnesses, or of the acknowledgment of the owner in court; for that is the place, in which all who have any interest in the existence of the instrument, would most probably look for it; especially in the cases where the emancipation was to take effect immediately; which, indeed, were the only cases in the immediate contemplation of the legislature, as is manifest from the concluding terms of the section, "who shall thereupon be intirely and fully discharged &c." And although when the emancipation is to take effect in futuro (as in this case) which has been repeatedly held to be valid, some other rule, as to such a case, in the event of the removal of the owner, or of any one claiming under him, with the slave, to another county in the state, might be more desirable, the court cannot prescribe such a rule as it may

Did the full proof of the instrument, made after the marriage and death of its author, give it validity? Such an instrument has no effect in giving freedom, until it be proved or acknowledged, in the manner prescribed by the statute, as was held by this court in Givens v. Manns: and it is therefore insisted, by the appellant's counsel, that not being a contract between parties capable of contracting, and a pure emanation of the will of the owner, he may revoke it at pleasure, at any time before it shall be consummated and take effect by the proof or acknowledgment required by the statute; and that in this case, the instrument was revoked by the marriage, and especially by the death, of its author. It is not necessary to inquire, whether the party might, under such circumstances, actually revoke such an instrument with effect, since there has not been any such actual revocation, either by the original owner or her husband, after her marriage, or death; and, in the absence of any evidence of an intention to revoke it, the question is, whether the marriage or death of the owner executing the instrument, has that effect? This depends upon the common law doctrines of relation, according to which, when several acts are necessary to the consummation of any purpose, and all are done, the last act relates to the first, and the whole takes effect from the date of the original act; especially, when the object of the transaction would be frustrated by a contrary construction—ut res magis valeat quam pereat. And this being the chief object of such relations, they are generally confined to that object, and not allowed to operate to the prejudice of third persons, and not even of a party beyond the necessity of preventing the total frustration of the main purpose of the transaction. Without going at large into the cases on this subject, I refer, generally, to those cited in Viner's title Relation. Thus, to give only one instance, an escrow delivered upon condition, does not become the deed of the party, even as between the parties

316 *themselves, until the performance of the condition and the second delivery, and only operates from the latter period. 13 Vin. Abr. Faits, O. 3, pl. 1, p. 29. Yet if it be made by a feme sole, and she marry before the condition performed or the second delivery, or if the grantor or obligor die in that interval, the deed is valid, by relation to the first delivery as an escrow. 18 Id. Relation, E. pl. 1, 2, p. 290. I can see no distinction between those cases and that at bar, the relation being resorted to in each, for the sole purpose of giving effect to the intention of the party. And this could prejudice no stranger to the transaction, if it was not allowed to extend (as I think it ought not) to affect the creditors of or purchasers from either the wife or husband. But there is none such in this case. A husband is not a purchaser of his wife's property by the marriage: he only thereby acquires the marital rights of a husband, and takes her property as she held it, to all intents and purposes, unless something has been done in contemplation of the marriage, in fraud of those rights. In this case, there is nothing of that sort. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

CABELL, J. The requisites to an instrument of emancipation, under our statute, are, that it be "under the hand and seal" of the party making it, and that it be "attested and proved in the county or corporation court, by two witnesses, or acknowledged by the party in the court of the county or corporation, where he or she resides." It is not necessary that it should be by deed. If the legislature had intended it to be by deed, it would have been so declared, either by speaking of it expressly as a deed, or by the use of equivalent expressions. Thus we find, in the first section of the statute of conveyances, (1 Rev. Code, p. 361,) where it was meant to declare, that the title to lands shall not pass but by deed, the expressions are, as follows; "no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than five years, in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by writing, *sealed and delivered." And even if the instrument of emancipation be accompanied with all the forms and requisites of a deed; be in writing, signed, sealed and delivered; yet it is manifest, that the law attaches no importance to the circumstance of its being a deed; for it would be just as effectual without being delivered as a deed, as it would be when delivered in the most solemn form. The statute nowhere calls it a deed: it speaks of it only as the instrument of emancipation.

But it is important to consider the analogy between a deed at common law, and an instrument of emancipation under the statute. A deed is a writing sealed and delivered. All these requisites, writing, sealing and delivery, are essential to give it efficacy as a deed. Although it be attended with all the requisites, except the final one, delivery, it is no deed; and the party who has signed and sealed, does not thereby impose on himself any obligation to complete it by delivery: he retains full power over the instrument: he may withhold its delivery, or may obliterate and destroy it. He retains, moreover, full power over the subject of the instrument, and may make any other disposition thereof he may think proper. And even when a deed is completed by delivery, the delivery has no relation back, so as to give it effect from the time when it was written, or when it was signed, or even when it was sealed. It operates as a deed only from the time when it was delivered. Let us apply these principles to the case before us.

An instrument of emancipation, like a deed at common law, has many requisites; writing, signing, sealing, attestation and proof or acknowledgment in the court of the county or corporation where the party resides. Proof or acknowledgment in court is to an instrument of emancipation, what delivery is to a deed at common law. It is the final requisite, without which all others stand for nothing. This is established by Givens v. Manna and Lewis v. Fullerton. And I think it perfectly clear, on principle, that this final requisite, proof or acknowledgment before the proper court, can no more have relation back to 318 the date of *the instrument of emancipation, than the delivery of a deed at common law, has relation back to the date of the deed; for the party has, at all times before this final act, the same power over the instrument and its subject, that the party to a writing signed and sealed but not delivered, has, at common law, over the instrument, or the subject of the instrument. He has even greater power; for, in some cases, a writing signed and sealed, but not delivered, may operate as a contract, although it may have no effect as a deed. But an instrument of emancipation, not completed by proof or acknowledgment in court, can never operate as a contract: there can be no contract between master and slave.

By the marriage of Rachel Magruder, in this case, she ceased to be owner of the slaves, which thereby became the property of her husband; and as that event happened before the proof of the instrument, and of course before it had taken effect as an instrument of emancipation, it could not take effect as such afterwards; since none but the owner of slaves can emancipate them.

The silence of the legislature, as to the time within which an instrument of emancipation may be recorded, affords a strong argument against its having relation back to any period prior to the probat. If it had intended any such relation, it would not have permitted the party to hold the instrument up to an indefinite period, to the destruction of rights intermediately acquired.

Upon the question, what is the proper court in which to record an instrument of emancipation, I give no opinion; it not being necessary to be decided in this case.

I think the county court erred in giving the instruction excepted to by the appellant.

COALTER, J., concurred in this opinion.

BROOKE, P. The construction given to the law of Maryland by the decision of the court of that state, puts the Maryland deed of emancipation out of the case. The only question, then, is as to the validity 319 of the Virginia "deed of emancipation; and that depends on the construction of our own statute authorising emancipation of slaves, and prescribing the mode.

I do not think, that, in considering this question, any light is to be borrowed from the doctrines of the common law, applicable to deeds of conveyance of property, to which the party has a perfect right, and over which he has full dominion. Such deeds are consummated by delivery alone, and they take effect from their date, unless there is something in them to the contrary. Independent of the statutory provision, an instrument of emancipation of a slave, from its nature, from the relation in which the grantor and grantee stand to each other, could confer no right, though delivered to the grantee or to some one for him: he is still a slave and incapable of receiving such right, if the grantor had the power to convey it, which is not admitted, since it is one of the highest acts of sovereignty, to elevate a slave from his degraded state to the rank of a freeman. Although it had been the practice of owners to emancipate their slaves, before the act of 1691 forbidding such emancipation except on certain conditions, that practice gave no perfect right to owners, of their own will, to emancipate their slaves; nor did the permission under that act, or the subsequent statutes down to the present time, to emancipate slaves, confer more than an imperfect right, to be exercised by the owners in the manner prescribed by those laws. No equivalent for the requirements of the statutes, no constructive proof of the recording or delivery, of the deed of emancipation, founded on any supposed right in the owner or his grantee, could be resorted to. This was the principle which governed the decision in Givens v. Manns. The question of emancipation, is a question of statutory law, and can only be dissolved by referring to the terms of the statute. The statute, after prescribing the mode of emancipation, with great particularity, provides, that the persons so emancipated, "shall thereupon" (from the time the requirements of the statute shall have been complied with, in all its particulars,)

320 "be intirely and fully *discharged &c. and enjoy as full freedom, as if they had been named in this act:" that is to say, by force of the specific provisions of the statute, and not by virtue of any general, undefined power or right, supposed to exist in the owner, independently of the statute, to emancipate them. Therefore, there can be no relation to the date of the deed to fix the period of emancipation: until the terms of the statute be complied with, they are slaves to all intents and purposes: they cannot be emancipated by a fiction of the common law invented to protect existing rights. The statute having made no provision for the proof and recording of deeds of future emancipation, such deeds ought, perhaps, never to have been established; yet as they have been sanctioned by the decisions of this court, in this spirit of humanity, rather than in the spirit of the law, I do not mean now to question them. But if such deeds as the one before us, are brought within the statute, they must be subject to all its requirements, like deeds of present emancipation. They cannot be put on higher ground.

In the present case, the grantor in the deed had married, removed from the county, and was dead, before the deed in question, was attempted to be consummated by proof in the court of the county in which the grantor had formerly resided. The marital rights of her husband, had attached upon the property in her slaves. His will and not her's was to be consulted. His right to the slaves could not, without his own consent, be overreached by the proof and recording of the deed, even if it were a question of property merely. But it is enough, that the grantor had, by her marriage, lost her power to emancipate the slaves before the requirements of the statute had been complied with; that she was dead before the deed was proved and recorded; and that, in either view, the requirements of the law could not be complied with.

Both judgments are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, in which no such instructions as those excepted to, are to be given to the jury.

*Thompson v. Cumming.

June, 1830.

Bills of Exchange*—Action against Indorser—Proof of Notice of Dishonor Necessary.—In an action, by holder against indorser, on a bill of exchange, whereof the drawee has refused acceptance when it was presented, and afterwards refused payment when demanded at maturity: Held, not enough, to charge the indorser, to prove protest for non-payment and due notice thereof to the indorser: it is necessary to prove due notice to him of the dishonor of the bill by the non-acceptance.

Appellate Practice—Instructions—Bill of Exceptions Indefinite.—Where a bill of exceptions to an instruction of a court to a jury, states the instruction so vaguely and imperfectly, that its import and bearing on the case cannot be ascertained with precision, it is the course of this court to reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial.

Declaration—Failure to Show Good Cause of Action—Statute of Jeofails—Quere—If plaintiff omits to aver in his declaration matter necessary to shew good cause of action, and defendant, instead of demurring, pleads the general issue, whether, upon the construction of the new statute of Jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 103, p. 512, the plaintiff is bound to prove the matter at the trial of the issue, which he has not averred in his declaration.

Debt under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 126, § 2, p. 485, brought by Thompson, the holder of a foreign bill of exchange, against Cumming, the last indorser thereof, in the circuit court of Petersburg.

The declaration set forth, that the bill

Bills of Exchange.—See monographic note on "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 632.

Appellate Practice—Bill of Exceptions Indefinite.—It has been held repeatedly that when a bill of exceptions is so indefinite as not to show whether an instruction or evidence was proper or not, the judgment should be reversed. Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 264, citing principal case; Barrett v. Tazewell, 1 Call 215 (see also, foot-note to this case); Beattie v. Tabb, 2 Munf. 254; Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106; Bowyer v. Chesnut, 4 Leigh 1. To the same effect the principal case was cited in Bowyer v. Chesnut, 4 Leigh 4; McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 368; Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 22. But see monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887, where it is shown that the later decisions sustain the rule that a bill of exceptions must clearly and distinctly point out the error complained of, otherwise the exception will be unavailing.

The principal case was also cited in Danks v. Rodeheaver, 26 W. Va. 278.

was drawn by Benj. Tucker, in favour of John & William Bell, upon William & John Bell & Co. of London, for £400. sterling, payable sixty days after sight; that the payees, John & William Bell, indorsed the bill to Cumming, and Cumming indorsed it to Thompson; that the bill was presented to the drawees, William & John Bell & Co. of London, for acceptance, and they refused to accept it; and that in due time after the presentation of the bill for acceptance, namely, the 26th October 1811, it was again presented to the drawees for payment, and payment being refused, it was thereupon duly protested for non-payment; of all which Cumming had notice: without averring any protest of the bill for non-acceptance, or any notice to Cumming of such protest and dishonor of the bill. Plea, nil debet.

Several points of law arose at the trial; and upon one of them, which arose upon the peculiar circumstances of the 322 *case, as they appeared in evidence, the circuit court gave an instruction to the jury, under the influence of which a verdict was found for Cumming: the court gave judgment for him, and Thompson appealed to this court. But the opinion of the circuit court on the point decided in favour of Cumming, was so imperfectly stated in the record, that this court could not ascertain, with precision, its import or bearing on the case; and the judgment was for that reason reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial. The only point, which it is necessary to state here, since it was the only point decided by this court, was one which the circuit court decided in favour of the appellant Thompson. It was this: Cumming's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that it was incumbent on Thompson to prove, that he had used due diligence in giving Cumming notice of the non-acceptance, as well as of the non-payment of the bill; but the court instructed the jury to the contrary, that notice to Cumming of the non-acceptance of the bill, was not necessary to sustain the action, though due notice of the protest for non-payment was.

Spooner and Leigh, for the appellant, endeavoured to sustain the judgment of the circuit court upon this point, as being in conformity with the custom of merchants in this country, recognized and settled by judicial decisions. They mentioned the case of Stott & Donaldson v. Alexander & Co., 1 Wash. 331, which, they owned, was decided upon the construction of our statute of 1748, ch. 33, § 2, (6 Hen. stat. at large, p. 85, 6,) which was repealed in 1792. They relied on the cases of Brown v. Barry, 3 Dall. 365; Clarke v. Russell, Id. 415; Read v. Adams, 6 Serg. & Rawle, 356. These, they said, were decisions on the law merchant of the country not influenced by any statutory provision; and they were direct authorities for the opinion of the circuit court on this point.

322 *The Attorney General, contra, shewed, that, in England, the law was settled by a train of authorities, that protest for non-acceptance, and notice of such dishonor to the drawer and indorsers, were necessary to charge them; that the same rule prevailed in most of the states of the Union, and those the most commercial; and that all the reasons for requiring notice of dishonor require notice of the first dishonor of bills by refusal of the drawees to accept them.

CARR, J. As to the instructions given by the circuit court to the jury, which were excepted to by the appellant, and of which he complains, there has been much difference of opinion among the members of this court as to the meaning of them; and, without discussing the grounds of this difference, or stating the interpretation to which I incline, I concur with my brethren, that instructions which have so perplexed and divided us, must be too ambiguously and imperfectly expressed to be submitted to a jury. For this defect, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial. And here, I think, we might very well stop. But my brethren think we ought to give an opinion on the point, which the circuit court decided for the appellant, as to the necessity of protest of the bill for non-acceptance, and due notice of such dishonor to the drawer. The doubt with me was, whether this question was regularly before us, since the verdict was in favour of Cumming, against whom this instruction was given, and the appeal taken by Thompson, in whose favour it was given. I will, however, as briefly as possible give my impression on the subject.

It is doubtful, whether the court meant to say, that protest and notice of non-acceptance of a foreign bill of exchange, are in no case necessary to be proved in an action against the indorser, or not necessary in this action, under the particular pleadings. It was discussed at the bar, upon the hypothesis, that the court meant to declare the general law on the subject, and several cases were cited in sup-

324 port of *the opinion. The cases were Stott & Donaldson v. Alexander & Co. in this court, Brown v. Barry, and Clarke v. Russell, in the supreme court of the United States, and some others which I shall not notice. The first of those cases this court decided expressly under the act of 1748, which declares, that "no person shall pay more than 18 months interest from the date of any bill, to the time it shall be presented protested, to the drawer or indorser." The court said, that the legislature, contemplating the circumstances of the parties, and the countries between which the exchange was to be made, "seemed to have thought eighteen months a reasonable time for the negotiation, and for the giving of notice, by allowing full damages if the notice be given within that time." This the court considered, under that law, a general rule, to be departed from only when particular circumstances rendered it reasonable and proper. We know that the circumstances, the relations and the facilities of intercourse between us and England, are wholly changed since the statute of 1748; and this no doubt was the reason that, in the revision 1792, this clause of the statute of 1748, on which this court decided, was omitted, and the subject left to stand upon the general law merchant. The case of Brown v. Barry originated in the circuit for the district of Virginia, and was carried by writ of error to the supreme federal court. It was an action of debt on a bill of exchange, brought on the statute of 1748. That it was brought on that act, and decided under it, is evident from one of the grounds assigned in the circuit court, in arrest of judgment, viz. that the action was founded on a statute not in force, when the bill was drawn. Chief justice Ellsworth, in considering this point, states, that the bill was drawn in February 1793, that an act passed at the session of 1792, repealing the act of 1748, but that at the same session, another act passed suspending the repealing act till October 1793; and, as these two acts being of the same session, must be supposed to speak at the same time, they only amount to this, that the act of 1748 should stand repealed

325 *from October 1793. Another exception to the declaration, taken in arrest of judgment, was, "that there was no averment of a protest for non-acceptance of the bills." To this the chief justice answered, 1. "that it does not appear, that the bill was not accepted, so that there could have been such protest;" and this certainly seems to be a satisfactory answer to the exception; but, not contented with that, he added 2. "as to bills drawn in the United States and payable in Europe, of which this is one, the custom of merchants in this country, does not ordinarily require, to recover on a protest for non-payment, that a protest for non-acceptance should be produced, though the bills were not accepted." This remark seems to have been thrown out carelessly, and is very loosely and indefinitely expressed. We have no authority cited, no case referred to, no ground stated, on which the assertion rests. Whence did the chief justice derive the information he gives us, as to the custom of merchants? And what did he mean by the custom of merchants in this country? Did he mean the United States? I apprehend there is no custom of merchants of the United States. The law merchant is a part of the common law; and, like that, must prevail in each state, just so far, and with such modifications, as each state has established. By this country, did the chief justice mean the place where he delivered the opinion, Philadelphia? If so, their custom of merchants does not bind us. And if he meant Virginia, whence the cause he was deciding came, he spoke of a custom influenced by our statute of 1748, which, we have seen, was changed, with the change of times and habits, in 1792. Thus, I think, there is nothing binding us to this exploded state of things; but we are free to follow, the rule of the law merchant, as long settled in England, and in most of the states of the Union. That the rule, as thus settled, requires protest and notice of non-acceptance, I will not cite cases from the english books to shew: they are every where to be found. In New York, 326 see Miller v. Hackley, *5 John. Rep. 375, in Massachusetts; May v. Coffin, 4 Mass. Rep. 341; Maryland, Philips v. M'Curdy, 1 Harr. & John. 187; North Carolina, 1 Hawk. Rep. 195; South Carolina, 1 Bay's Rep. 177; 1 Rep. Const. court

100; Kentucky, 2 Marsh. 264. These are a few of the states, to whose reports I have had an opportunity of referring. I doubt not, there are many others. The rule too, is in itself most just and reasonable. In commercial affairs, every thing depends on punctuality and dispatch. A drawer or indorser may have thousands in his power to-day, by which he could save himself, with notice, but which to-morrow, may pass from his hands. Another consideration is, that it is due to our merchants, to place them on equal ground with the rest of the mercantile world.

But if the court below meant to say, that though protest and notice of non-acceptance, be generally necessary to be proved, yet it was not necessary here, because there was no such averment in the declaration, and you cannot hold a party to prove what you have not held him to aver; then (as some of my brethren think) it would give rise to an important question under our statute of jeofails. I do not think myself, that such a question can arise: but, however that may be, we waive it at present, as not being necessary to the decision of this case.

GREEN, J. After pointing out the ambiguities of the exception taken by the appellant, Thompson, to the instruction of the circuit court, and shewing the difficulty and impossibility of collecting the import and bearing of the opinion complained of, with sufficient certainty to enable this court to judge of its merits, and concurring with Carr, J., that the judgment should for that reason be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, proceeded to consider the point which the circuit court decided against the appellee, Cumming, viz. that notice to Cumming of the non-acceptance of the bill, was not necessary to sustain the action, though notice of the protest for non-payment was.

327 *He said: The declaration stating the refusal of the drawees to accept the bill, does not aver, that it was protested for non-acceptance, or that notice thereof was given to the defendant. It does not appear, whether the instruction on this point proceeded upon the abstract principle of law, as to the necessity of a notice of non-acceptance in general, to entitle the holder of a bill which was not accepted to recover, or upon the opinion that it was unnecessary to prove such notice in this case, because the fact was not alleged in the declaration.

If the instruction proceeded upon the first ground, it was in conformity with the decision of this court in Stott & Donaldson v. Alexander & Co. of the supreme court of the U. States in Brown v. Barry (a case arising under the laws of Virginia) of the same court in Clarke v. Russell (a case arising under the laws of Rhode Island) and of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Read v. Adams; but contrary to the settled doctrine in England, New York, Massachusetts and Maryland, which requires not only a notice of, but also a protest for, non-acceptance. It is to be remembered, that the two cases occurring under the laws of Virginia, above mentioned, arose under our act of 1748, which limited the recovery of interest on a protested foreign bill, to eighteen months from the date of the bill until it should be presented protested to the drawer or indorser thereof. This was construed by this court as giving a general, though not inflexible rule, that notice of the protest of a bill was sufficient, if given within eighteen months of the date; and, consequently, if notice of a protest for non-payment was given within that time, a case could not arise where notice of non-acceptance within the same time could be of any value. This provision of the act of 1748, was dropped and repealed at the revival of 1792; and the rule of the law merchant as to protest and notice, both in cases of non-acceptance and non-payment, left to operate uninfluenced by any statutory provision. I think we are at liberty and ought to adopt the settled rule prevailing in England, *and in the most commercial states of the Union, not only in justice to our merchants, and to put them on the same footing with others, but because every reason which leads to the requisition of a protest and notice of non-payment, applies with equal force to the case of non-acceptance; the great object, in both cases, being to enable the parties responsible, to guard, by timely measures, against the consequences of the dishonor of the bill.

If the circuit court proceeded upon the ground, that, although, in the abstract, notice of the non-acceptance of a foreign bill was necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover, yet that no proof of such notice was necessary, or could be required, to enable the plaintiff to recover in this action, as he had not averred it in his declaration; it brings into view an important question, as to the effect of the provision of our late statute of jeofails (which prohibits the arrest of judgment in any case after verdict, for any defect in the pleadings, which might have been taken advantage of by demurrer, and was not) in respect to the proofs necessary to be given, to support the action or defence at the trial. As this question may not again occur in this case, I think it is better to pass it by for farther consideration in a full court, whenever a case shall occur in which it may be necessary to decide it.

COALTER and CABELL, J., concurred.

329 *Chapman v. Doe, e. d. Bennett.

October, 1830.

(Absent BROOKE, P.,* and COALTER, J.)

Ejectment—Error in Patent—Evidence—Case at Bar.—In ejectment for land in Wood county, lessor of plaintiff claims under grant of land described in the patent as lying in Monongalia; defendant shews by the statute of 1784, dividing Monongalia and establishing Harrison county, and other evidence, that the land described in the patent, at the date of the patent, lay not in the then county of Monongalia, but in that of Harrison, and that no part of the present county of Wood was then part of Monongalia; HELD, competent to plaintiff to prove, that the land in Wood was the same land granted by the patent, notwithstanding the error of the patent as to the county it lay in.

*He was prevented by sickness from taking his seat at the beginning of this term.

*Ejectment.—See generally, monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tabscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

Same—Defendant Claims under Tax Sale—What He Must Show.—Defendant in ejectment claims under a sale made by a sheriff in 1815, under the statute of 1814, for taxes in arrear, and shews the return of the land as delinquent, and the sale made by the sheriff, without shewing that the sheriff had strictly pursued the statute in the steps preparatory to the sale: HELD, this is not enough to divest the title of the original owner. Tax Sale—Who May Make.—Under the statute of 1813-14 for sale of lands forfeited for non-payment of taxes, the deputy sheriff as well as the high sheriff is competent to make such sales.

Ejectment by Bennett against Chapman, in the circuit court of Wood, for 500 acres of land in that county. At the trial, Chapman took three exceptions to opinions of the court:

1. Bennett adduced in support of his title, a grant from the commonwealth, dated the 21st April 1785; founded on a survey of the 2d August 1784, granting the land in question to Smith Slaughter, under whom Bennett claimed, and describing it as lying in the county of Monongalia. Whereupon, Chapman offered to prove, by the act of assembly of the 24th June 1784, for dividing the county of Monongalia and establishing the county of Harrison, and the subsequent act for establishing the county of Wood, and other evidence, that, at the date of the grant of April 1785, no part of the present county of Wood lay within the boundaries of the then county of Monongalia. But the court allowed the grant to be read in evidence to the jury, being of opinion, that it was competent to Bennett to shew by evidence, that the land claimed was the same land thereby granted to Slaughter, though it did not lie within the boundaries of the county of Monongalia as established by the act of June 1784, but within the boundaries of the county of Harrison as established by that act, and within the county of Wood, after that county was laid off and established. Chapman excepted.

2. The grant to Slaughter having been read in evidence, Bennett shewed a conveyance of the land by Slaughter to him, dated the 1st August 1797. And then Chapman shewed, on his part, that the land had been returned as delinquent, in the name of Bennett, for non-payment of the land tax in 1812 and 1813, and that, in the list of sales of delinquent lands and lots in Wood, made in 1815, under the act of assembly of the 9th February 1814, 499 acres of this tract of 500 acres were reported as sold to Chapman for one dollar and seventy-four cents; and he proved by Taverner, a deputy sheriff of Wood county for the year 1815, that he had sold the 499 acres to Chapman, he being the highest bidder, at auction, on a court-day, at the court-house; and, without offering any proof that the particular provisions of the act of February 1814, prepar-

Tax Sales—What Purchaser Must Show.—As holding that, under a sale made by a sheriff under the statute of 1814 for taxes in arrear, the one claiming under the sheriff's deed must show that the sheriff strictly pursued the statute in the steps preparatory to the sale, the principal case was cited in Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 629, 15 S. E. Rep. 229. See, in accord, foot-note to Wilsons v. Bell, 7 Leigh 22. But see foot-note to Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Gratt. 421.

Same—Who Must Make Deed to Purchaser.—See, citing principal case, Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Gratt. 429, 430, 431. See also, foot-note to Wilsons v. Bell, 7 Leigh 22; foot-note to Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Gratt. 421.

atory to such sales had been complied with, Chapman prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if it should be satisfied, that the 499 acres were parcel of the tract of 500 acres granted to Slaughter and by him conveyed to Bennett, then Bennett's title to the 499 acres was divested by the act of February 1814, and the sheriff's sale to Chapman in 1815. But the court refused to give such instruction to the jury; and Chapman excepted.

3. Then Chapman, to shew title on his part, offered in evidence, a deed executed by Taverner, deputy of Spencer, sheriff of Wood for 1815, dated the 12th August 1815, and duly recorded in the county court 331 in September following; *whereby, Taverner, the deputy sheriff, reciting, that he had, on the 8th August 1815, being a court day, at the court-house, after advertisement duly made according to law, sold to Chapman 499 acres parcel of the tract of 500 acres, returned delinquent, in the name of Bennett, for non-payment of the land tax of 1812, and 1813, conveyed the 499 acres to Chapman. But the court would not permit this conveyance to be read in evidence to the jury, on the ground, that the deputy sheriff was not authorised by law to make such conveyance: to which opinion Chapman excepted.

Verdict and judgment for Bennett; from which Chapman appealed to this court.

R. G. Scott, for the appellant, made no objection to the opinions of the circuit court on the points stated in the first two exceptions; but he contended that the court erred in holding that the deputy sheriff was not authorised by law to make sale and conveyance of lands forfeited for the land taxes. He referred to the statute of February 1814, directing sales of delinquent lands, 2 Rev. Code, app. IV. ch. 24, § 20, 24, 25, p. 547, 9. And he said, that the proceedings being merely ministerial throughout, the deputy sheriff was as competent as the principal, to every act, and among the rest, to the making of the conveyance. 6 Bac. Abr. Sheriff. H. 3, p. 154, 5; Wroe v. Harris, 2 Wash. 126; Rockbold v. Barnes, 3 Rand. 473.

No counsel for the appellee.

GREEN, J. The opinions of the court below stated in the first two exceptions were unquestionably correct, and indeed are not seriously questioned by the appellant's counsel.

The third exception presents the naked question, Whether under the act of February 1814, a deputy sheriff was competent to sell and make a valid conveyance of lands, returned delinquent for the non-payment of taxes accruing in 1812 and 1813?

332 *In 1781, the first act was passed authorising the sale of land for taxes. 2 Rev. Code, app. IV. ch. 1, p. 508. That act authorised the sheriff or collector appointed in his place, under certain circumstances, to distrain and sell for all taxes, lands as well as slaves, goods and chattels. It continued in force until 1790, the mode of selling lands distrained for taxes, being variously modified and controlled by several subsequent statutes, the most material of which, and the only one that touches the question under consideration, is that of Oct. 1787, 12 Hen. stat. at large, ch. 42, p. 564, reciting that various oppressions had been practised in the sales of land for taxes, provided, among other things, that all such sales should be made by the high sheriff or collector in person, and not by deputy. In 1790 an act was passed repealing all laws authorising the sale of lands for taxes, and declaring all lands, upon which the taxes shall remain unpaid for three years, to be forfeited and vested in the commonwealth, and liable to be taken up as waste and unappropriated lands might be. 2 Rev. Code, app. IV. ch. 6, p. 517. This right to locate such lands, was taken away by the act of 1807 (Id. ch. 16, p. 530,) by which, and various other acts, both before and after, time was given for the redemption of such forfeited lands, up to the end of the session of assembly of 1813-14. By an act passed in that session, (Id. ch. 24, § 45, p. 553,) the sheriffs were directed to collect all the arrearages of taxes upon lands, due before 1814, and to proceed therein, by distress, by sale of the land, and in every respect whatever, to perform the same duties as if they were part of the arrearages of the year 1814, changing only the form of his advertisements and returns, so as to suit the case. The same act (§ 23, 24,) directed, that, in the year 1815, and in every year thereafter, the sheriff of each county should be charged with the collection of the delinquent land taxes of the preceding year, and that he should advertise the sale of all delinquent lands, at the May, June and July courts, to take place on the first day of the succeeding August court. The act gives the literal terms of the advertisement, thus: "Notice is 333 hereby *given, that &c. I shall sell" &c. to be signed, "A. B. sheriff of — county, or A. B. deputy for — sheriff of — county." And it directs that the sheriff shall, on behalf of the commonwealth, execute a deed to the purchaser &c. This act also repeals all other acts coming within its purview.

If the question depended upon this last act only, I think there could be no doubt but that the sale and conveyance of such lands might be made by deputy. Such was the practical construction of the former laws, giving the power, in such cases, to the sheriff or collector by those names only, to sell and convey, which occasioned the provision of the act of 1787, requiring the sheriff or collector to act in person and not by deputy upon such occasions. And the construction was in conformity to the rule properly laid down by the court in Wroe v. Harris, that all ministerial duties of the sheriff (of which this is one, as much as the execution of a writ of elegit or of ad quod damnum, both of which require the seal of the sheriff, as well as his conveyance under a sale for taxes) may be executed by deputy, while his judicial duties can only be exercised in person, they being incapable of deputation. Besides, the act of February 1814, obviously contemplated, that the deputy is authorised to sell, and consequently to convey, by giving the terms of an advertisement of sale to be made by him as deputy.

Then, the only inquiry is, Whether the effect of the act of 1814 is controlled by the general provisions of the act of 1787? I think not. The act of 1787 was virtually repealed by that of 1790, which repealed all laws authorising a sale of lands for taxes; or, if not by that act, by the act of 1814, which conflicts in this particular with it, and repeals all prior acts coming within its purview.

The rejection of the deed mentioned in the third exception, upon the ground therein stated, was erroneous, and the judgment ought for this cause to be reversed.

The other judges concurring, judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial &c.

Norris v. Hume.

October, 1880.

[21 Am. Dec. 631.]

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Chancery Jurisdiction—Relief against Judgment—Defence Available at Law.—In an action of debt, defendant pleads, a special plea in bar, and the issue joined thereon is found against him, and judgment rendered for plaintiff: then defendant exhibits bill in chancery, stating, that though he was unable to prove the matter of his plea on the trial at law, he is now able to prove it, without suggesting fraud, accident, mistake, or other circumstance which prevented him from establishing his defence at law, and praying relief against the judgment: HOLD, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to grant relief in such a case.

The appellant, Norris, executed his bond for 112 dollars, to one Polly Threlkeld, then a feme sole; and she, while yet single (as it appeared) assigned the bond to the appellee Hume, and two days after the assignment, intermarried with one Davis. Norris paid the full amount of the bond to Davis, the husband, and took an acquittance thereof from him; but Davis not having the bond in his possession to deliver up, Norris, by public advertisement posted in the neighbourhood, forewarned all persons from taking an assignment of it, stating that it had been discharged. During all the time of these transactions, all the parties, Norris, Davis and his wife, and Hume, resided in the county of Culpeper. Davis and wife afterwards removed to Kentucky; and, many years after their removal, Hume, claiming as assignee of the bond, instituted a suit upon it against Norris, in the county court of Culpeper. To this action Norris pleaded, 1. that he had paid the debt to Davis, before notice of the assignment thereof to Hume; and 2. that the assignment to Hume was in fact an assignment to him in trust for the assignor, to whose husband the debt had been fully paid. And issues having been taken on these pleas, the jury found a verdict for Hume upon both, and judgment was rendered for him accordingly.

Hereupon, Norris exhibited his bill to the county court in chancery, against Hume and Davis and wife, praying an injunction to stay farther proceedings at law, 335 and relief *against the judgment.

But the grounds laid in the bill for relief in equity, consisted in the denial of any notice of the assignment of his bond to Hume, before the payment of the debt to Davis, and the allegation, that Norris was unable, at the trial at law, to prove his plea that the bond had been assigned to Hume in trust for the assignor; but that he had it now in his power, as he verily believed, to prove, that the assignment, if ever actually made to Hume, was made without any consideration whatever passing from him, in trust for the use of Polly Threlkeld, the assignor; and that, independently of Davis's right, as her husband, to receive the debt, he expected to prove the wife's assent to the payment made to Davis. But no reason was assigned in the bill, why Norris was unable to prove, the alleged trust upon which the assignment was made to Hume (of which his plea shewed he was apprized) or any of the other facts alleged in the bill, at the trial at law; or why he could not then command that evidence of the facts, which he alleged he had in his power at the time he exhibited his bill. Neither was there any suggestion in the bill, that a discovery from Hume, or from Davis and wife, was necessary to enable him to establish those facts, or any of them.

Hume, in his answer, admitted, that the bond had been assigned to him by Polly Threlkeld, in trust for herself, and in order to preserve the money to her separate use, after her intended marriage with Davis; but he alleged, that this assignment was made with the privity and approbation of Davis, and that Norris had early notice of the assignment, and of the motive that induced it: he also questioned the fairness of the payments made by Norris to Davis: but he mainly insisted, that the whole controversy had been tried and determined in the action at law, where Norris had pleaded the very same matters in his defence, which he now presented for relief in equity; and that, therefore, the case was not properly relievable in equity.

As to Davis and wife, the bill was taken pro confesso.

*There were several depositions taken and filed on both sides; but the cause turned, eventually, on the question of jurisdiction alone.

The county court perpetuated the injunction. Hume appealed to the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, which reversed the decree, dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill with costs. And then Norris appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Stanard for the appellant, and by the Attorney General for the appellee, upon the merits, as well as on the question of jurisdiction, Whether this was a case properly relievable in equity?

GREEN, J. As the bill does not state,

*See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425; monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

Bill of Discovery—Time of Filing.—In Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125. It was decided that a bill of discovery to obtain evidence which might have been useful in a trial at law, must be filed pending the suit at law, unless some sufficient excuse is shown why it was not filed at that time. JUDGE CARR said that the bill must be filed as soon as the party discovers the necessity of appealing to the conscience of his adversary. In Green v. Massie, 31 Gratt. 300, it is said that JUDGE GREEN, in the principal case, expressed his entire concurrence with the views of JUDGE CARR.

that a discovery from Hume or from Davis and wife, was necessary to enable Norris to establish the facts relied on in his bill, as the ground of relief, the question does not arise. Whether such a suggestion, well founded, would give jurisdiction to a court of equity, after a trial at law upon issues involving those very facts? That is a question, therefore, which it is not necessary now to discuss: if it were, I should strongly incline to concur in the views taken of it by my brother Carr, in Faulkner's adm'rx v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125. The present case is nothing more or less than an appeal from the judgment of a court of law, to a court of chancery for a new trial there of the same issues that had been tried at law, without any suggestion of fraud, accident, mistake, or any other circumstance, which prevented the party from making his defence at law, upon exactly the same proofs which he now exhibits in chancery. Upon this ground, I am of opinion, that the chancellor's decree ought to be affirmed.

The other judges concurred. Decree affirmed.

Ewing v. Ewing.

October, 1830.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Bill of Exceptions—Certification of Evidence—Reversal of Judgment.—A bill of exceptions to an opinion of a court, overruling a motion for a new trial, sets forth all the evidence adduced by both parties; but the evidence thus set forth, shews that there was no conflicting evidence, and that excluding all the evidence of the party against whom the verdict was found, and admitting the truth of all the evidence adduced for the party for whom the verdict was found, the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and to justice: HELD, such exceptions, in such a case, are well taken, to enable an appellate court to review and reverse the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

Same—Same—Cases Approved.—The principle of Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125, and Carrington v. Bennett, 1 Leigh. 340, explained and approved.

Bill of Exceptions—Certification of Evidence—Reversal of Judgment.—In Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125, a motion was made in the lower court for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the motion being overruled, a bill of exceptions was taken which certified all the evidence given to the jury, instead of the facts which appeared to the court of trial to be established by the evidence. The evidence, as it appeared on the record, was conflicting and contradictory. It was held by the appellate court that the bill of exceptions was not properly taken, that it ought to have stated only the facts appearing to the court to have been proved, and that the judgment of the lower court refusing a new trial could be reversed only upon a certificate of the facts proved. The principle upon which this decision was based is that an appellate court will not undertake to decide on the credibility of witnesses. While this principle has been approved by subsequent cases, the rule laid down in Bennett v. Hardaway has, to a great extent, been modified. Thus, in the principal case, while the decision in Bennett v. Hardaway is approved, it was held that though a bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court overruling a motion for a new trial spread the whole evidence, instead of the facts, on the record, yet, if the evidence is not conflicting, the bill is well taken and will enable the appellate court to review the judgment of the inferior court; for no question as to credibility of witnesses can arise. But it is further laid down that the appellate court will not reverse the judgment of the lower court unless after excluding all the (parol) evidence of the exceptor and admitting the truth of all the evidence of the adverse party, the judgment still appears to be wrong. Other cases have gone even further than the principal case and held that the appellate court will review the judgment of the lower court on a bill of exceptions certifying the evidence even though the evidence is conflicting; but the rule laid down in the Gift of Personality—Delivery.—A verbal gift of a chattel, without any actual delivery, does not pass the property to the donee.

Debt, in the county court of Prince Edward, by Mary Ewing, assignee of C. Woodson and S. Venable, executors of her deceased husband, James Ewing the elder, against James Ewing the younger, upon a bond for £100, executed by the defendant and one Baldwin (since dead) to James Ewing the elder, in his lifetime. The declaration set forth the execution of the bond, and the assignment thereof by the executors of the obligee to the plaintiff, in usual and regular form. The defendant pleaded four pleas in bar: 1. that he had paid the debt to the plaintiff; 2. that the obligee, in his lifetime, for a good and legal consideration, gave the bond to the defendant; 3. that, for a like consideration, he gave him the money secured by the bond; and 4. that, for a like consideration, he gave him the money and the bond. Issues were made up, on these pleas. The jury found a verdict "for the defendant," in general terms. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, on the ground, that the verdict was contrary to evidence. The court overruled the motion, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court refusing the new trial, and appealed to the circuit court; which reversed principal case as to when the appellate court will reverse the judgment on a bill certifying the evidence, seems to have been. In the main adhered to. The modification of Bennett v. Hardaway which is effected by the principal case and the rule therein laid down as the one observed by the appellate court in reversing the judgment of the lower court where the evidence is certified has been approved by a long line of subsequent cases. See, citing the principal case, Jackson v. Henderson, 3 Leigh 214; Green v. Ashby, 6 Leigh 141, 142, 143, 145, 146, 148, 150; Rohr v. Davis, 9 Leigh 30, 33, and foot-note; Fatteson v. Ford, 2 Gratt. 80; Pasley v. English, 5 Gratt. 28; Willard v. Overseers of the Poor, 9 Gratt. 30; Bell v. Snyder, 10 Gratt. 353; McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 387; Pryor v. Kuhn, 12 Gratt. 618; Vaiden v. Com., 13 Gratt. 726; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 431; Gimmi v. Cullen, 20 Gratt. 453; McClung v. Ervin, 22 Gratt. 528, 529; Read v. Com., 22 Gratt. 528; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 475; Payne v. Grant, 81 Va. 169; Goodman v. R. & D. R. Co., 81 Va. 583; Cloverius v. Com., 81 Va. 864, 865, 866, 868; Moses v. Old Dominion, etc., Co. 82 Va. 24, 25, 26, 28, 29; Muse v. Stern, 82 Va. 36, 37; Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 197; Morgan v. Fleming, 24 W. Va. 194; State v. Flanagan, 26 W. Va. 19; Travis v. Ins. Co., 38 W. Va. 600; Glimmer v. Sydenstricker, 42 W. Va. 57, 24 S. E. Rep. 568.

The rule laid down above as to when the appellate court will reverse the judgment of the lower court on a bill of exceptions certifying the evidence is known as the "old rule" in Virginia. Pol. Sup. § 3484, provides that the rule of decision in the appellate court, where the evidence and not the facts, as certified "shall be as on a demurrer to the evidence by the appellant." See further, foot-note to Gimmi v. Cullen, 20 Gratt. 439; foot-note to Vaiden v. Com., 13 Gratt. 717; foot-note to Dean's Case, 32 Gratt. 913; monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887.

Though a bill of exceptions is in form a certificate of the evidence, yet, if there is no inconsistency or conflict in the evidence thus certified, the appellate court will regard and treat it as the equivalent of a certificate of the facts. Morgan v. Fleming, 24 W. Va. 196, citing the principal case and Green v. Ashby, 6 Leigh 135.

Gift of Personality—Delivery.—It is now and always has been held by the courts, that, to make any gift of personality valid, delivery of possession is absolutely necessary. Until such delivery, the gift is inchoate and revocable; indeed a mere nullity. There is no difference in this respect between donation mortis causa and inter vivos. The same kind of delivery of possession which is necessary to make good the one, is necessary to make good the other. To this effect, the principal case was cited in Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 183, 185, 186, 188, and foot-note; Yancey the judgment, and remanded the cause 338 to the county *court, for a new trial to be had therein. And then the defendant appealed to this court.

The bill of exceptions to the opinion of the county court overruling the motion for a new trial, purported to set forth all the evidence adduced at the trial by both parties, in the words of the witnesses. Of the payment to the plaintiff, alleged in the first plea, there was no evidence at all. And as to the gift alleged in the three other pleas, the evidence on the part of the defendant, taking it alone and discarding the conflicting evidence adduced by the plaintiff, amounted to this: That the defendant was the nephew of the obligee, James Ewing the elder, and has been taken, in his boyhood, to live with his uncle "at his home house," and continued to live with him there many years, labouring on the farm; and afterwards lived on another farm of his uncle, receiving wages. That, after the defendant's attainment to full age, and before the execution of the bond in question, one Morgan having lent him some £50. or £60. to help him to pay for a piece of land he had bought, the defendant told him, his uncle had promised to let him have £100. to help him to pay for his land, and drew an order on his uncle, in favour of Morgan, for the money borrowed of him: this money the uncle paid to Morgan, but first asked him, how his nephew came to owe it to him: Morgan told him, he had lent the money to the defendant to help him to pay for his land, and then asked, whether he did not mean to give his nephew the money: the uncle said, no: Morgan said, he thought he ought to do so; upon which the uncle said, he never intended to make him pay it, but he did not wish him to know his intention, lest it might make him lazy. That, after the execution of the bond, the uncle, in several conversations, at different times, said, he had let his nephew have £100. to help him to pay for the land he had bought, and had pretended to lend it to him, and had taken his bond with surety for it; but he never intended to ask him for it; he never intended, from the first, to make him pay it; he intended to give it to him, though he did not 339 wish him to know *this, for fear it would make him lazy; it was not well to give a young man too much, for it would make him proud and lazy. That the bond was executed in 1810, and the obligee lived till 1817, without taking any measures to enforce payment of the money: and, to account for the fact, that the bond had never been given up to the defendant by his uncle, or destroyed by him, proof was adduced, that in two conversations between him and his wife (the plaintiff in this action) she had informed him that the bond was lost or mislaid; that she had searched for it among his papers in vain; that she had inquired of an agent, (who had some of his bonds to collect) whether he had this bond, and found he had it not; but she expected on a more diligent search it would be found. It did not appear when the bond was found, whether before or after the obligee's death: it was assigned by his executors to his widow, in part of the share of the estate left to her.

Leigh for the appellant, insisted, that it was not competent to an appellate court, to review the opinion of the court before which the cause was tried, overruling a motion for a new trial, upon such a bill of exceptions as this, which, instead of stating the facts proved at the trial to the satisfaction of the court, detailed all the evidence in the words of the witnesses, and thus presented a sort of demurrer to evidence after trial and verdict rendered. He cited Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125; Carrington v. Bennett, 1 Leigh, 340.

Daniel for the appellee, said, that the reason of the opinion expressed by the court in Bennett v. Hardaway, was, that the appellate court could not be as competent as the court which tried the cause and heard the testimony and saw the witnesses, to weigh conflicting testimony, and determine on which side the truth lay; and the principle was, that an appeal cannot be taken upon a mere question of fact, in the form of exceptions to an opinion overruling a 340 *motion for a new trial. But, in the case now before the court, if all the evidence adduced by the plaintiff in the county court, were disregarded; if all the facts testified by the witnesses for the defendant, were taken as true; allowing withal, the utmost conceivable latitude of inference from those facts; it was plain, that the defendant had not made out a case in proof, which supported any one of his four pleas; and that, therefore, the verdict was palpably contrary to evidence.

CARR, J. In the argument here, the appellant's counsel relied solely on the doctrine held by this court in Bennett v. Hardaway, that a bill of exceptions to the opinion of a court, overruling a motion for a new trial made on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence, must contain the facts only which the court considered proved, and not a statement of the evidence given to the jury. In Carrington v. Bennett, I have given my view of that case, in which I was overruled by my brethren: I inclined to think, that under its authority, a bill of exceptions, which in a motion for a new trial, detailed all the

v. Field, 85 Va. 761, 8 S. E. Rep. 721; Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 471; Miller v. Neff, 38 W. Va. 206, 10 S. E. Rep. 381; foot-note to Barker v. Barker, 2 Gratt. 344. And though a host of witnesses prove that the donor declared he had given the thing in question, it will be of no avail, without some proof of delivery. See, citing principal case, Yancey v. Field, 85 Va. 766, 8 S. E. Rep. 721; Chambers v. McCreery, 106 Fed. 384.

There is no distinction between gifts causa mortis and gifts inter vivos except that in the former case, the gift does not take effect until the death of the donor, in the latter it takes effect immediately. To this point the principal case was cited in Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh 338.

In a foot-note to Miller v. Jeffress, 4 Gratt. 472, it is shown that while the rule as to the requisites of a gift causa mortis is the same as it is in respect to gifts inter vivos, the evidence of the delivery is necessarily different: for, while, in the former case, the gift occurring in extremis and taking effect only upon the death of the donor, the acts, acquiescence, and subsequent conduct of the donor can never be relied on as evidence of the delivery, in respect to gift inter vivos the subsequent conduct of the donor is often most potent evidence of the complete execution of the gift.

evidence, would be rejected by the appellate court, without considering, particularly, the nature or amount of that evidence: they thought the only effect of that case was, that it is not competent to a party, by way of exception to the refusal of a new trial, to refer to the judgment of the appellate court, the credit of the witnesses; and that, therefore, the exception should contain the facts which the trying court considered as proved, not the evidence by which they were proved; that this rule applied to cases, where there is conflicting evidence; but that where the facts are not directly proved, but must be inferred, the appellate court must have the facts proved, in order that it may make the inferences. I cannot but think, that this construction rather curtails of its fair proportions, a case which was very solemnly considered by this court: but waiving my own impressions, till the point can 341 be settled by a full court, I have taken up the bill of exceptions in the *present case, and given the defendant, who succeeded with the court and jury, the full benefit of all his evidence, by throwing out of the case all the evidence given for the plaintiff, and considering every thing stated by the defendant's witnesses, as proved. And taking the facts testified by the defendant's own witnesses, as facts proved, it seems to me impossible to say, that they support either of his pleas; and yet the jury has found all the issues for the defendant. That they do not prove payment, or any thing from which payment may be inferred, is most manifest. Neither, to my mind, do they prove a gift, but the direct contrary, that the testator had not given, but merely intended to give. There is no promise even, no conversation between the parties. The uncle, expressly, to the question, have you given the money, answered, no. And, in the other conversations, he merely expressed his intended kindness and bounty to his nephew; never what he had done, or was then doing; always what he intended to do at a future day: and he gave reasons (which no doubt were weighty with him) why he delayed his intended bounty; that it was not well to give a young man too much, for it would make him proud and lazy. There is no gift, then, or any thing from which it can be inferred. But if a host of witnesses had proved, that the testator declared he had given the bond or the money to his nephew, it would have been of no avail, without some proof of delivery. A verbal gift of a chattel, without actual delivery, does not pass the property to the donee. This is the settled doctrine of the modern decisions. In Irons v. Smallpiece, 2 Barn. & Ald. 552, chief justice Abbott said, "that by the law of England, in order to transfer property by gift, there must either be a deed, or instrument of gift, or there must be an actual delivery of the thing to the donee." The rest of the court agreed in taking this as the settled doctrine. The same point is decided in Bunn v. Markham, 7 Taunt. 224; 2 Eng. Com. law. Rep. 81. That, to be sure, was a case of a donatio mortis causa; but with respect to the gift inter vivos. Bryson v. Brownrigg, 9 Ves. 1; Antrobus v. Smith, 12 Id. 39, (with other cases) contain the same doctrine. Here it is expressly proved, that the bond never was delivered, nor any written transfer made; but that the testator retained the bond, which came regularly to the hands of his executors, and was distributed as a part of the estate. Proceeding, then, upon the ground that we may look into this bill of exceptions at all, I think it furnishes as strong a case as can well be imagined, of a verdict found contrary to evidence; and I shall not dissent from my brethren in affirming the judgment.

GREEN, J. It was insisted, that the exceptions in this case were not well taken, that they cannot be looked into by the court, and that the case stands, as if it came up upon a general verdict, and motion for a new trial, without any thing upon which to found the motion; and this upon the authority of Bennett v. Hardaway. I have already, in the case of Carrington v. Bennett, stated what I consider as the true principle and effect of that case, which I intirely approve of. It is that a party shall not be permitted so to frame a bill of exceptions, as to refer the credit of the witnesses to the appellate court. In that case, the testimony of the witnesses conflicted, and the just decision of the case depended upon the degree of credit due to the witnesses, respectively, of which the appellate court had no criterion, such as the trying court had, upon which to form any judgment. But, in the present case, there is no such difficulty: for, crediting or discrediting all or any of the witnesses ad libitum, there is no evidence whatever which justifies the verdict. The jury found, that the defendant had paid the debt in question to the plaintiff, without a scintilla of proof or presumption to sustain the finding. If they had found truly upon that issue, then it would have been open to the plaintiff to move the court, if the other issues had been found against her, for a judgment non obstante verdicto, upon the ground that the last three pleas, if true, presented no legal bar to her action. This right, whether it would have availed her or not, she has lost by the false finding upon the first plea; and she ought not to have lost it in that way. Again, crediting or discrediting all or any of the witnesses at pleasure, there is no evidence whatever of any good, legal or valuable consideration for the alleged gift; and without such proof, it was impossible to find truly, that either of the last three pleas was true; for they alleged such considerations, and the defendant was bound to prove them, to entitle him to a verdict on the issues involving the truth of that allegation. Nor was this mere surplusage. If these strange pleas were good with these averments of consideration (of which I doubt very much, since an obligation could be dissolved at common law, only by cancelling, obliterating or surrendering it, or by some equivalent act, or by a strict performance of the condition, or by a release, and the statutes have given no additional plea, but that of payment to be proved by parol evidence) yet, without such averments, the pleas were unquestionably bad, and might have been demurred to; or, after a verdict finding them true, a judgment might have been given against them, non obstante veredicto. Finally, (treating the evidence in the same way) there is none whatever to support these pleas, even without the averment of consideration; none whatever to establish a valid gift, having any effect, at law or in equity, either to release the obligation, or to vest in the appellee the property of the bond, or of the money due upon it, or any right of action, at law or in equity, in respect to it, against the donor or his representatives. No parol gift, without an actual delivery of the thing given, can vest in the donee any right or title in or to the thing given, or divest the right or title of the donor. This is unquestionably settled as the common law. There was, indeed, formerly, some difference of opinion, upon this point: but all doubts are settled by the recent decisions in the English courts, 344 both of law and equity; in the "Common Pleas, in the case of Bunn v. Markham; and in the court of King's Bench, in that of Irons v. Smallpiece; in which all the former authorities were considered, and both courts were unanimous. In the one case, the donor (if he may be so called) had written upon the parcels containing the property, the names of the person for whom they were intended, and requested his son to see the property delivered to the donees. In the other, a father, twelve months before his death, had given his son two colts: six months after, the son having been to a neighbouring market, to purchase hay for the colts, and finding it to be very dear, mentioned it to his father, who agreed to furnish what they might want at a stipulated price, but furnished none until three or four days before his death; the colts remaining all the time in the father's possession. And both these gifts were held to be invalid for the want of actual delivery. For the cases in equity, see Bryson v. Brownrigg, 9 Ves. 1; Antrobus v. Smith, 12 Ves. 39; Hooper v. Goodwin, 1 Swanst. 485, and note on Walter v. Hodge, 2 Id. 106, and the cases of donatio causa mortis, in which delivery is held to be necessary to the perfection of the gift, and passing the right and title. Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. sen. 439. The only difference between the donation causa mortis and inter vivos, is, that the latter is absolute and unconditional, the other is in contemplation of death, and therefore subject to the implied condition, that the thing is to be restored if the donor recovers; but to give a right to the donee, the gift must be perfected alike in both cases, by delivery. If the subject of the gift be incapable of delivery, it cannot be given by parol, but must be transferred by some writing, and a delivery of that writing. In the case before us, neither the bond in question, nor the money due upon it, could be effectually given, or forgiven, or released to the obligor, but by the obligee's cancelling or destroying it with that avowed intention, or surrendering it to the obligor, or to some other for him, or by some instrument in writing to that effect; be maintained upon such an imperfect gift, it being nudum pactum. The strongest case for the defendant, which he could have asked the court to certify, upon the evidence, was that the defendant had proved that the obligee verbally gave him the bond and the money due upon it, without delivering it to him; and that this was the only fact proved in the case: and then we should have held, that a new trial ought to have been granted. I am of opinion, that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

CABELL, J. The principle decided in Bennett v. Hardaway, is, that this court, not possessing the means of deciding correctly, will not undertake to decide at all, on the credit of witnesses; and, consequently, that if a bill of exceptions to the judgment of an inferior court, granting or refusing a new trial, be so framed as that this court cannot get at the right of the case, without deciding on the credit of the witnesses, the exception shall be considered as incorrectly taken, and the judgment shall be affirmed. Hence it has become a general rule, that a bill of exceptions ought to state the facts which the inferior court considered as proved, and not merely the evidence, or what the witnesses testified. The case to which this rule was applied in Bennett v. Hardaway, was a case of contradictory testimony; for judge Roane, who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, expressly said, that "the evidence, as it appeared on the record, was conflicting and contradictory." But the principle is equally applicable to a case, where there is no conflict in the testimony; as in the case of Carrington v. Bennett. And I will here take occasion to observe, that although I did not sit in that case, I have attentively considered it, and approve of the decision. But, though a bill of exceptions may have violated the general rule, and may have stated the evidence given, instead of the facts proved, it does not necessarily follow, that the judgment

346 if the evidence *stated be such, that, excluding all adduced by the party against whom the court decided, and admitting the truth of all adduced by the other, the judgment of the inferior court would still be wrong, then the principle decided in Bennett v. Hardaway, would not prevent this court from reversing such judgment; because, in such a case, this court would not have to decide on the credit of the witnesses; it would proceed on the admission of their credit. To permit such a judgment to stand, merely because the bill of exceptions had not complied with the general rule, which requires the statement of facts, and not of evidence, would be to stretch the rule beyond its principle, and to sacrifice justice to the forms intended for its protection. And such would be the case, if the judgment of the county court, now under consideration, were to be affirmed: for, if all the evidence adduced by the plaintiff at the trial were expunged from the record, and if the truth of every word said by the defendant's witnesses be admitted, nothing is clearer, than that the verdict ought to have been for the plaintiff; and, consequently, that the county court ought to have granted a new trial.

The judgment of the circuit court, reversing that of the county court, and remanding the cause for a new trial, is affirmed.

Sale of Slaves—Retention of Possession by Vendor—Case at Bar.—H. makes a bill of sale of slaves to C. without any consideration, and notwithstanding the deed, remains in uninterrupted possession for 25 years, and dies in possession; after his death, his widow claims these slaves as her own property, and holds adversary possession of them for more than five years; then administration of H.'s estate is committed to the sheriff, who gets possession of the slaves, and a creditor of H. who had recovered judgment against the sheriff administrator, levies an execution on one of them, which is sold so satisfy the same: in detinue by the widow against the purchaser.

Same—Same—Same—Statute of Limitations*—When It Begins to Run against Administrator.—HELD, 1. that the statute of limitations did not enure to give the widow a title to the slave, since it did not begin to run till an administrator of her husband's estate was appointed.

Same—Same—Same—Liability of Slaves to Execution at Suit of Vendor's Creditor.—And, 2. that though H.'s bill of sale to C. was good as between the parties, yet being fraudulent as to H.'s creditors, and the subject having come to the hands of H.'s administrator, it was liable to execution at the suit of a creditor of H. and the levy of such execution and the sale under it may be pleaded in bar of any claim set up by C. the fraudulent grantee under the fraudulent bill of sale.

Upon the trial of an action of detinue, brought by Sarah Hardiman against John Clark, for a slave named Charles, in the circuit court of Charles City, the jury found a special verdict, stating, in substance, the following case:

Francis Hardiman deceased, who was the husband of the plaintiff, in the year 1790, received in right of his wife, in the distribution of her father's estate, a parcel of slaves, of which the slave Charles was one. And in June 1794, he executed a bill of sale to William Christian, purporting, in consideration of £300. to sell and convey those slaves to him, then thirteen in number, of which Charles was one, and sundry articles of furniture, plantation utensils, and stock: this bill of sale was proved in the county court of Charles City, by one witness in December 1794, and by another in February 1796, and thereupon ordered to be recorded. No part of the consideration expressed in the bill of sale was paid by Christian to Hardiman; and Hardiman, notwithstanding the deed, retained and held uninterrupted *possession of the whole subject. In 1803, all of the slaves mentioned in the bill of sale, were taken in execution to satisfy a debt due by Hardiman to William Christian; when one of them was really sold to Henry Christian, and the proceeds applied to the debt; and the same Henry Christian purchased the slave Charles now in question, and John Christian purchased all the other slaves; but neither Henry paid any money for Charles, nor did John pay any money for the other slaves bought by him; and the slave Charles, as well as the others, were returned to the possession of Hardiman, and remained in his possession till his death. In the year 1811, Hardiman gave Henry Christian a bond for the hire of Charles for that year. In 1812, he took the oath of insolvency, rendering a schedule of his effects, in which none of these slaves were mentioned. He died in 1816, leaving all the slaves, Charles among the rest, upon a plantation in Charles City, which he died in possession of. His family at his death, consisted of his widow, the plaintiff, and four children, who lived on the plantation, and (excepting two of the children who had since left the family) continued still to reside upon it, cultivating the land in common, and employing the slaves in the cultivation of it. But from the time of Hardiman's death in 1816, his widow, the plaintiff, always claimed the slaves as her own property, and it was the understanding of the neighbourhood, that she did so claim them. About the year 1817, Henry Christian claimed the slaves under the bill of sale thereof to William Christian, of June 1794 (whether he claimed under that deed, as the administrator of William, or how, was not found in the verdict), and he demanded a bond of Mrs. Hardiman for the hires of them, which she refused to give, saying that her husband had squandered all the rest of her property, and she meant to hold the slaves. It was expressly found, that Henry Christian never claimed the slaves or any of them for himself, but took the part he did in these transactions, out of friendship for Hardiman and his family. A suit

349 had been *brought by Benjamin Ladd against Hardiman in his lifetime, for debt; but, in consequence of Hardiman's death, the process therein was not executed upon him, and the suit was not farther proceeded in till 1823, when it was revived against Benjamin Harrison, sheriff of Charles City, to whom administration of Hardiman's estate was committed in May 1823; the estate having till then remained unrepresented. Soon after the administration was committed to the sheriff, one of his deputies took possession of the slaves left by Hardiman on his plantation at his death. Ladd prosecuted his suit to judgment against the sheriff administrator, and sued out execution, which was levied on Charles, the slave in question, who was sold to satisfy the execution: the defendant Clark was the purchaser. Mrs. Hardiman, claiming the property as her own, had forbidden the sale; and she brought this action to recover this slave from Clark. And the question referred to the court, was, Whether or no, upon the whole case, the plaintiff was entitled to recover?

The circuit court held, that the law upon the special verdict was for the plaintiff, and gave judgment for her accordingly; from which Clark appealed to this court.

The attorney general, for the appellant, said he was at a loss to discover the ground upon which the circuit court held that the appellee was entitled to recover: it seemed to him, that the law upon the case found in the special verdict, was clearly for the appellant. The bill of sale of Hardiman to William Christian of June 1794, and the sales under the execution sued out against Hardiman in 1803, in respect to the slave Charles sold to Henry Christian, and the other slaves sold to John Christian, were all, upon the face of the transactions, grossly fraudulent, and under the circumstances of the case, merely void: and Hardiman having held undisputed and uninterrupted possession, without any real claim being set up under those pretended sales, for so many years, and having died in actual possession of them, they devolved to his personal representatives: the right of *property vested in the sheriff, so soon as administration of Hardiman's estate was committed to him, and upon his taking possession of the subject, it became assets in his hands, subject to the debts of the intestate. Neither could the statute of limitations avail to convert Mrs. Hardiman's possession into a title, as against the administrator; because the statute did not begin to run till the estate of her husband, to which the property belonged, was represented; and the sheriff claimed and took the possession, shortly after administration of the estate was committed to him.

Leigh, for the appellee, said, that supposing the bill of sale of June 1794, and the sales of the slave Charles to Henry Christian, and of the other slaves to John Christian, under the execution in 1803, were fraudulent transactions, (which not being expressly found, it is not the province of the court to infer from the facts found,) yet those sales were not, on that account, merely void: the bill of sale, and the sales under the execution in 1803, were only void as against Hardiman's creditors, and purchasers from him; they were good as between the parties; they vested the title in the vendees, not only as against Hardiman himself, but against his executors or administrators. Neither Hardiman himself in his lifetime, nor his administrator after his death, could have claimed the property, nor defended his possession of it, against the vendees claiming under those sales, on the ground, that they were fraudulent, and the vendees as well as Hardiman parties to the fraud. See the statute of frauds and perjuries, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 101, § 2, p. 372, and Starke's ex'rs v. Littlepage, 4 Rand. 368. The title then, as against Hardiman at his death, and as against his personal representatives afterwards, was in the Christians: and, as against them, Mrs. Hardiman's adversary possession of more than five years, from her husband's death in 1816, till the administrator took possession in 1823, gave her a good title to sustain her action of detinue. Newby's adm'r v. Blakey, 3 Hen. & Munf. 57; Elam v. Bass's ex'rs, 4 Munf. 301; Hudsons v. Hudson's adm'r, 6 Munf. 352. The appellant claimed the slave in question, under an execution levied upon him in the hands of Hardiman's administrator; he claimed under the administrator; and, as the administrator had no title, which he could have made good against Mrs. Hardiman, so neither had the appellant.

CARR, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The circuit court, in giving judgment for the appellee, upon the case found in the special verdict, must, I presume, have gone upon one of two grounds; either, 1. that the possession of the widow more than five years, claiming right, gave her a title against all the world; or 2. that as the deed to William Christian, and the sale under his execution in 1803, though unquestionably fraudulent as to the creditors of Hardiman, were good between the parties and those claiming under them, the sheriff could not take the slaves, and administer them as the assets of Hardiman. As to the first of these points: the reason on which it has been decided, that five years peaceable possession of slaves gives title, is that such possession affords a complete bar under the statute of limitations. This is the language of the court in Newby's adm'r v. Blakey, where this point was first determined; but it is added, that this bar can only be raised in those cases where the statute runs. In this case, it is expressly found, that from the death of Hardiman to the year 1823, his estate was unrepresented. During this time, then, there was nobody in whom Hardiman's title to the slaves vested; nobody who could demand them, or prosecute such demand; nobody who was in default; and, consequently, nobody against whom the statute could run. No possession, therefore, during this interval, with whatever claim it might be accompanied, could give any title against the representative of Hardiman, whenever such might be appointed. Then, as to the second point, it is clear, that at Hardiman's death, his title was good against all the world, except those *claiming under the deed to Christian, and the sales on his execution in 1803; and these (as I have said) were palpably fraudulent as against his creditors. The sheriff, therefore, when the estate was committed to him, rightfully as to all but those claimants, took possession of these slaves. Nor could Mrs. Hardiman have maintained an action against him for them, as she, so far from claiming under the deed or sale, claimed in direct opposition to them. If, when the judgment was obtained against the sheriff as Hardiman's administrator, and the execution delivered to the officer, these slaves had been in the adverse possession of any claimant under the deed or sale, the execution could not have been levied upon them, for the technical reason, that they would not have been, in that case, the goods and chattels of Hardiman in the hands of the sheriff to be administered. But it is clear, from the finding, that the execution was levied on the slave Charles in the possession of the sheriff as Hardiman's representative. And this levy the sheriff could not have prevented by any defence founded on the fraudulent deed or sale; for the creditor finding his debtor's property in the hands of his representative, had a perfect right to take it by his execution. And this levy protects the representative of Hardiman from the claimants under the deed and sale, though, but for this, he would have held the slaves subject to their claims: for he might effectually plead this seizure and sale against such claim. This is expressly decided in the case of Hawes v. Loader, Yelv. 196, as may be seen in the 4th resolution of that case. The judgment must be reversed and entered for the appellant.

*Little & Telford v. Brown.

October, 1880.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Sale of Land—Lien for Purchase Money—Right to Profits—Case at Bar.—J. & D. W. purchase lands of B. and to secure the purchase money, payable in instalments, convey same lands to a trustee, upon trust to permit J. & D. W. to take the profits thereof to their order, use and benefit, till the time appointed for payment of the last instalment, and then in default of payment, to sell the subject, and apply proceeds to satisfaction of the debt; afterwards, and before the last instalment of the debt to B. falls due, J. & D. W. mortgage same lands, and all yearly rents, issues and profits thereof, and all their right and interest therein, to L. & T. to secure a debt due them: Held, that L. & T. are entitled, in preference to B. to all profits accruing prior to the time when the last instalment of debt to B. falls due.

Vendor's Lien—Effect Thereon of a Mortgage for Purchase Money.—A vendor, taking a mortgage of the subject sold to secure the purchase money, can only claim under the mortgage, and according to its terms: the mortgage supercedes the implied equitable lien for the purchase money, which but for the mortgage would have attached to the subject.

Same—Right Thereunder to Profits.—The implied equitable lien of a vendor upon the subject sold, for the purchase money, does not give the vendor asserting the lien, any claim for the profits of the subject.

This was an appeal from a decree of the superior court of chancery of Staunton, in two suits, one brought by Little & Telford against John, David, and William Willson, and the other brought by William Brown against Little & Telford and the three Willsons; both causes having resulted in a contest between the appellants Little & Telford and the appellee Brown (both parties being creditors of John & David Willson) for priority of satisfaction out of rents and profits of certain real estate of their common debtors, which had accrued pending the first suit, and were at the disposal of the court. The case was thus:

By deed of bargain and sale, dated the 11th March 1819, Brown sold and conveyed to J. & D. Willson four lots in the town of Waynesborough; and the Willsons executed a deed of trust, dated the 30th day of the same month, whereby they conveyed the four lots to a trustee, in trust to secure the payment of the purchase money to

Brown in instalments. This deed of 354 trust, reciting that the Willsons owed Brown 3250 dollars, to be paid as per bonds, by the 25th February 1827, conveyed the lots to the trustee, upon trust, "that he should permit the said J. & D. Willson to remain in quiet and peaceable possession of the property, and take the profits arising from the same to their order, use and benefit, until default should be made in the payment of the said sum of 3250 dollars; and that, upon such default happening in the year aforesaid" (namely, in 1827,) the trustee should sell the subject to satisfy the debt.

And by another deed of trust, dated the 9th October 1819, the same J. & D. Willson, in order to secure a debt of 1509 dollars due to Little & Telford, conveyed the same lots which they had bought of Brown, and the yearly rents, issues and profits thereof, and all their right, title and interest therein, to a trustee, upon trust, that he should sell the same to satisfy the debt, as soon after the 9th October 1821, as conveniently he could, or as Little & Telford should require.

The trust subject having been abandoned by the Willsons, and left to be disposed of among the creditors, was, upon the motion of Little & Telford, soon after the commencement of their suit, put into the hands of a receiver of the court, to let out and receive the rents. And the subject itself proving insufficient to pay the debt of 3250 dollars due to Brown, and secured by the first mentioned deed of trust; and all the rents accruing prior to the 1st January 1823, and part of the rents of that year, having been expended in repairs under orders of the court; the question arose, between the appellants Little & Telford, and the appellee Brown, which was entitled to the rents accruing afterwards down to the 25th February 1827?

The chancellor held that Brown was entitled to them, and decreed that they should be paid over to him; from which decree Little & Telford appealed to this court.

Daniel, for the appellants, said the decree was clearly erroneous. It gave to 355 Brown that which the deed of trust of the 11th March 1819, under which he claimed, expressly reserved to the Willsons; and it took from Little & Telford that which, as it belonged to the Willsons, exempt from Brown's lien, they had a right to mortgage and which they did mortgage, in express terms, to Little & Telford.

There was no counsel for the appellee.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The deed of trust to secure the debt to Brown, expressly stipulated, that the Willsons should enjoy the rents and profits until the 25th February 1827, and Brown could not have acquired the possession, nor consequently received the rents and profits until after that day, either by an action at law or a bill in equity; and the deed of trust to secure the debt to Little & Telford, expressly conveyed the rents, issues and profits accruing from the 9th October 1821. That is, the Willsons conveyed by the last deed, the very right which they had reserved by the first. The circumstance, that the debt secured by the first deed of trust, was for the purchase of the property, has no effect upon the question as to the rents. For, 1. the implied lien for the purchase money, which would have existed if the deed of trust had not been given, was utterly destroyed by the execution of that deed, and whatever effect that implied lien might have had upon that question, it is superseded by the express stipulation in the deed: expressum facit cessare tacitum. And, 2. such an equitable lien gives no right at law or in equity, to claim rents and profits. Certainly the creditor could not maintain a suit at law for them; and such a claim has never been allowed or even made in equity. The decree so far as it affirms the right of the appellee and disaffirms that of the appellants to the rents in question, must be reversed.

*Vendor's Lien—Effect Thereon of a Mortgage for Purchase Money.—When a vendor takes a mortgage of the subject sold to secure the purchase money, his implied equitable lien for the purchase money is superseded, and he can claim only under the mortgage. To this point, the principal case was cited in Wilson v. Davidson, 2 Rob. 400; Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 176; Blair v. Thompson, 11 Gratt. 444; The Ann C. Pratt, 1 Fed. Cas. 951.

Wills—Construction—Use Created by Devise—Effect.—Testator devises and bequeaths real and personal estate to trustees, in trust for the equal use and benefit of testator's four sisters, (naming them) and their heirs forever, to be managed as the trustees should think most conducive to the interest of each of the parties; two of the sisters being femes covert:

Same—Same—Same—Same.—HELD, 1. that each of the sisters took a fee simple as to the real, and the absolute property as to the personal subject, in her share of the trust estate.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—And, 2. that the legal title remains in the trustees. In order that they may manage the part of the subject intended for the use and benefit of each sister. In such manner as the trustees shall think most conducive to the interest of each respectively.

Virginia Statute of Uses—Application—Uses Created by Devise.—It seems that the statute of uses of Virginia, does not apply to uses created by devise, and transfer such uses into possession of the cestui que use.

Charles Farmer, by his last will and testament, after making provision for his debts, and bequeathing one specific legacy, devised and bequeathed the whole of the residue of his estate to his brother Nelson Farmer, upon condition, that he (Nelson) should convey the whole of his own estate, real and personal (except that which he acquired by his wife) to trustees, to be disposed of as the testator should by that his will afterwards direct. And then he devised and bequeathed one fifth of the estate, so to be conveyed by his brother to trustees (named in the will) to be disposed of according to his will, to Marshall Farmer, Judith Waddell and Sally Farmer (to be equally divided among them) and their heirs: and he devised and bequeathed the residue thereof, to trustees, "in trust for the equal use and benefit of his (the testator's) sisters, Betsey Farmer, Kitty Farmer, Polly Bass and Patience Radcliffe, and their heirs forever, to be managed as the trustees should think most conducive to the interest of each of the parties."

Nelson Farmer accepted the devise and bequest of the testator's estate to him, upon the condition on which it was *given; and, in performance of the condition, conveyed the whole of his own estate, except what he had acquired by his wife, to the trustees named by the will, to be held to the uses thereby declared. As to the one fifth of this subject, which was given by the will, to Marshall Farmer, Judith Waddell and Sally Farmer, the trustees had no difficulty; but they doubted how they were to act in regard to the other four fifths, which the will directed them to hold in trust and manage for the equal use and benefit of the testator's four sisters above named, and, therefore, hesitated to execute their trust.

Whereupon, Christopher Bass and Polly his wife, John Radcliffe and Patience his wife, Betsey Farmer and Kitty Farmer exhibited their bill, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against the trustees, and Marshall Farmer, Judith Waddell and Sally Farmer, insisting that the four fifths of the subject given to them, real and personal, ought, simply, to be divided among them in equal shares, and conveyed to them, respectively, in fee simple and absolute property; and praying the court to direct the trustees so to divide and convey the subject to them. The defendants, in their answers, submitted it to the court to determine and direct, whether they should divide and convey the subject according to the prayer of the bill? or, whether the trustees should retain the title, and hold and manage the property, as they should think best, for the use and benefit of the testator's four sisters to whom it was given? or, how they ought to dispose of the subject, so as to fulfil the intentions and purposes of the testator?

The chancellor was of opinion, that it was the intent and effect of the will, that the trustees should retain in themselves the legal title of the four fifths of the subject given to the testator's four sisters, and hold and manage their respective shares thereof, as they should think most conducive to their interests, and this too in exclusion of the husbands of such of them as were married; and, to the end that the

358 *property might more certainly be preserved for their heirs, that the sisters ought to have only life estates in the use of their respective shares, which at their deaths should be conveyed to their respective heirs. And he decreed, that the whole subject should be divided into five equal parts; that one fifth part should be allotted to Marshall Farmer, Judith Waddell and Sally Farmer, and divided among them in equal parts; and that the remaining four fifths should be divided into four equal parts and those fourth parts allotted in severalty to the trustees; and that one fourth part should be held in severalty, and managed, by the trustees, for the use and benefit of each of the testator's four sisters, during

*Virginia Statute of Uses—Application—Uses Created by Devise.—There seems to be a material difference between the English statute of uses and the Virginia statute. Bass v. Scott, 2 Leigh 356. The Virginia statute has not yet been judicially construed, except that in the case just cited, it was considered as not extending to a devise. Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 733; Ocheltree v. McClung, 7 W. Va. 244; Bell v. Humphrey, 8 W. Va. 25. To the point that the Virginia statute of uses does not execute uses created by will, there being no general statute of uses, the principal case was also cited in Carney v. Kain, 40 W. Va. 807, 23 S. E. Rep. 665.

See the principal case also cited in Dunlop v. Harrison, 14 Gratt. 258.

Chancery Practice—Trust Estate—Directing Trustee to Convey Legal Title to Beneficiary.—In Carney v. Kain, 40 W. Va. 810, 23 S. E. Rep. 667, it is said: "A court of equity may direct the trustee to convey the legal title to the cestui que trust whenever by the language of the instrument, or in contemplation of the settler, such management and control ought to come to an end. But this power of the chancellor is to be exercised according to a sound discretion; and the court ought to refuse to exercise it when, as in the present case, it was manifestly the intention of the testator that the control and management of the property should remain with the trustees. Bass v. Scott (1880) 2 Leigh 356." See also, the principal case cited on this point in note to Thom v. Thom, 3 Va. Law Reg. 733, 733; Carney v. Kain, 40 W. Va. 821, 23 S. E. Rep. 661; Armistead v. Bart, 97 Va. 321, 33 S. E. Rep. 616.

her life, and at her death conveyed to her heirs.

From this decree, the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

The attorney general, for the appellants, and S. Taylor, for the appellees, submitted the case without argument.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. There is nothing in the will of Charles Farmer, to restrain the legal effect of the word "heirs," so as to make his sisters take an estate for life only, and their children or next of kin to take by purchase. The sisters took a fee simple in the real estate, and the absolute property in the personal estate, devised and bequeathed to their use. The decree is, therefore, erroneous, so far as it restricts the interests of the sisters to their lives only, and gives it to their children afterwards.

But, although it was the intention of the testator to give his sisters an interest equivalent to a fee simple, he did not intend to vest in them the legal estate, nor to give them the actual management of the property: he chose to vest the legal title in the hands of trustees, and to give them the management of the property, according to their discretion, for the use and benefit of his sisters. This is a disposition which the testator had a right to make: and it ought not to be wantonly broken in upon.

Our statute does not execute 359 uses created by will; we having no general statute of uses. It is true that a court of equity may, on its own original principles, direct a trustee to convey the legal title to the cestui que trust, when-

*This general proposition advanced by the learned judge arguendo, though founded on the words of our statute of uses, yet seems somewhat questionable: and as it may, in its application to other cases very different in their circumstances from this, be found inconvenient, it may not be improper, with all defence, to state the doubt. The words of the statute are: "By deed of bargain and sale, or by deed of lease and release, or by covenant to stand seized to use, or deed operating by way of covenant to stand seized to use, the possession of the bargainor, releasor, or covenantor, shall be deemed heretofore to have been, and hereafter to be, transferred to the bargainee, releasee, or person entitled to the use, for the estate and interest which such person hath or shall have in the use, as perfectly as if the bargainee, releasee, or person entitled to the use, had been enfeoffed with livery of seisin of the land intended to be conveyed by such deed or covenant." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 29, p. 370. A devise of lands is a conveyance, but not one of the conveyances specified by the statute: nor do its words embrace a conveyance by feoffment, any more than a conveyance by devise, to use. Then, suppose the case of a feoffment, or a devise, to one to the use of another, simply and generally, without any discretion or control entrusted to the feoffee or devisee to use, the question would be, whether the statute would not execute the use, and give the legal estate to the cestui que use directly, without any formal conveyance to him by the feoffee or devisee to use? or would the estate of the cestui que use be only an equitable estate, so that he could not assert his right in an action at law, in his own name, upon the strength of the feoffment or devise alone? If such a case be not within the letter, is it not within the equity, of this remedial statute? If it be not, it will be for the legislature to consider, whether it will be wise to make the statute more comprehensive. As to personal estate, the statute certainly has no application to that; but, in the case of a gift or bequest of a chattel to one for the use of another: if nothing is required to be done with the subject by the trustee; if his intervention be nowise necessary to accomplish the declared purposes of the gift; the cestui que trust, I apprehend, is entitled to the possession, and the gift of the entire absolute use of a chattel, in whatever form, is equivalent to a gift of the thing itself.—Note in Original Edition.

ever it may be proper that that shall be done; as in the case of a naked use. But this power is to be exercised according to a sound discretion; and the court ought to refuse to exercise it, when, as in the present case, it was manifestly the intention of the testator, that the management of the property should be at the discretion of the trustees, and not of the cestui que 360 trust. The decree *should, therefore, have directed a division of the property, and an assignment of one fourth part of the four fifths of the subject, intended by the testator for his four sisters, in severalty, to the trustees, to be held by them for the use and benefit of each of the four sisters, respectively, and their heirs forever, and managed by them as they shall think most conducive to the interest of the cestui que trust; reserving a right to the parties to apply to the court, from time to time, for farther directions, which future events may render necessary or proper; for it would be premature to give any opinion, at present, as to the powers, which the testator's sisters, or their husbands, may have over their equitable interests.

So much of the decree as conflicts with this opinion is to be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court of chancery to be farther proceeded in according to the principles here declared.

Executions on Decrees—Control of Equity Courts Over.*

—The statute giving common law executions on decrees in chancery, gives the courts of chancery the superintendence and control of all such process, and power to correct irregularities and abuses in it.

Same.—Same.—The courts of chancery may quash executions irregularly sued out on their decrees, and forthcoming bonds taken under them, on motion made on notice, in a summary way.

Executions—Construction of Statute—Right to Second Execution When First Not Returned.—Construction of the 3d section of the statute of executions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 184: it authorises a party who has sued out one execution, to sue out other executions: if the first be not returned and be not executed: if the first be executed though not returned, the party is not entitled to sue out any other execution.

Ca. 3a.—Discharge of Debtor by Order of Creditor—Effect.—If a debtor be arrested on a ca. sa. and discharged by order of the creditor or his agent, no other execution can be had on the same judgment or decree.

*Executions on Decrees—Control of Equity Courts Over.—When the statute law authorized the issuing executions on decrees, it clothed the courts of chancery with the power of watching over such process and correcting any abuses arising under it, to the same extent and by the same means that courts of law use. And in deciding upon all questions in respect to executions on decrees, the courts of chancery are bound to abide by the common law and statutes respecting executions at law. Snively v. Harkrader, 30 Gratt. 492, citing the principal case.

Ca. 3a.—Discharge of Debtor by Order of Creditor.—Effect.—It has undoubtedly been established, by a series of decisions, that where a defendant in execution under a ca. sa. has been discharged from his imprisonment by the direction or with the consent of the plaintiff, no action will ever again lie on the judgment on which the execution is founded, the judgment being considered as satisfied. Nor can any new execution ever issue on that judgment, even though the defendant was discharged on an express understanding on his part, that he should be liable again to be taken in execution, on his failure to comply with the terms on which the discharge took place. Noyes v. Cooper, 5 Leigh 187, citing the principal case.

Same—Escape of Debtor—Rights of Creditor.—If debtor in custody under a ca. sa. be permitted to escape, the creditor is entitled to another execution against the debtor as well as to an action against the sheriff for the escape; per GREEN, J.

A fieri facias was sued out of the superior court of chancery of Richmond, by Windrum against Parker, upon a decree of that court, for 254 dollars; and the execution having been delivered to the sheriff of Southampton, and levied by him on property in Parker's possession, Parker gave a forthcoming bond with Goodwyn his surety, for the delivery of the property at the day and place of sale. And upon a motion made by Windrum in the court of chancery, upon due notice, for an award of execution upon the forthcoming bond, against Parker and Goodwyn, and a cross motion by Parker and Goodwyn, also upon due notice, to quash the fieri facias and the forthcoming bond taken upon it, the case appearing in evidence, was as follows:

Windrum had sued out a capias ad satisfaciendum against Parker, for the same debt, on the same decree, some twelve months before the suing out of the fieri facias in question. And the sheriff of Southampton deposed, that John Wyche, who was introduced to him as the agent or attorney of Windrum, by Mr. Claiborne (a member of the bar, whom he *knew to have been the attorney for Windrum, in another and recent case), delivered the capias to him, and desired him to execute it: that Parker was presently arrested, and carried to the sheriff's office: that Wyche asked the sheriff, to let Parker walk out with him for a few minutes, which being assented to, they retired together, and returning in a short time, Wyche told the sheriff he might release Parker: that the sheriff being about to make his return upon the capias, asked Wyche if he was the legally authorised agent or attorney of Windrum, to which he answered that he was, and putting his hand in his pocket was in the act of producing his authority, when the sheriff told him he was satisfied, and thereupon endorsed his return upon the process: "Arrested the within named Henry Parker, on the — day &c. and by the direction of John Wyche, attorney for the plaintiff, he was released:" that the capias with this return upon it, was handed by the sheriff to Wyche, with a request that he would return it to the clerk's office, which he promised to do: that some two months afterwards, the capias was again presented to the sheriff by Mr. Claiborne, who requested him to alter his return, saying, that it might be doubted, upon the terms of the return, whether Parker had not paid a consideration for his discharge, and after such a return upon such an execution, it would be impossible to get another execution, and indeed the clerk refused to issue another; but the sheriff refused to make any substantial alteration of his return, and only consented to add the words "therefrom" after the word "released," at the end of it; and then the process was handed back to Mr. Claiborne, who, as the sheriff thought, was acting in this business as the attorney of Windrum. It appeared, that Windrum had sued out another fieri facias against Parker, upon another decree of the superior court of chancery, for another debt, about the same time the fieri facias in question was sued out: that that other fieri facias was levied, by directions of the same John Wyche (professing, with Windrum's knowledge, to act as *his agent therein) on some property in Parker's possession, thought the sheriff doubted whether he was the owner of it, and demanded indemnity; that this property was actually sold, Windrum and Wyche both attending the sale, and Wyche, in Windrum's presence, assuming the entire direction and control of that proceeding, as Windrum's agent.

Upon this evidence as to the service of Windrum's capias ad satisfaciendum on Parker, for the same debt, and upon the same decree, upon which the fieri facias in question was sued out, and of the release of Parker from custody under the capias, by which directions of Wyche as Windrum's agent; the chancellor overruled Windrum's motion for award of execution on the forthcoming bond; and, on the cross motion of Parker and Goodwyn, quashed the fieri facias, and of course the forthcoming bond also. Windrum appealed to this court.

The attorney general for the appellant, objected, 1st. That even supposing the fieri facias was irregularly sued out, the motion to quash it was not the proper course, nor had the court of chancery any jurisdiction to correct any irregularity of the kind complained of in this case: the cause of relief being matter of fact, and disputed matter of fact, the true remedy was that which the common law provided and administered, namely, an audita querela. 1 Com. Dig. Audita querela. A. D. pp. 785-8. Or, if the chancellor could properly interfere at all, he could only do so by injunction. 2dly, He insisted, that the fi. fa. was regularly sued out. The previous ca. sa. had not been returned to the office: and the statute of executions (1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 3, p. 527,) provides, that "when any writ of execution shall issue, and the party at whose suit the same is issued, shall afterwards desire to take out another writ of execution at his own proper costs and charges, the clerk may issue the same if the first writ be not returned and executed;" that is, if it be not returned as well as executed: for the fact of the process having been executed *or not, can only be known by the return. 3dly, He said, the only ground on which Windrum's right to take out the fi. fa. could be denied, was merely technical: it was not pretended, that Parker had paid the debt, or that Windrum had intentionally released it, but only that the discharge of Parker from custody under the ca. sa. which had been previously served on him, by the directions of Wyche, was a bar to any other execution on the same decree. The authority of one person to discharge the debtor of another from custody under execution, without satisfaction of the debt, must be well ascertained by clear and decisive evidence, and strictly pursued. Crary & Morgan v. Turner, 6 Johns. Rep. 51. And he insisted there was no proof, that Wyche was Windrum's attorney at law, or his attorney in fact, or otherwise his agent authorised to give the directions under which the sheriff discharged the prisoner. The sheriff's return (according to his own account of it) seemed to import, that he regarded Wyche as Windrum's attorney at law; and if that was the nature of his authority, he certainly had no right to discharge his client's debtor from execution without satisfaction. Jackson v. Bartlett, 8 Johns. Rep. 281; Kellogg v. Gilbert, 10 Johns. Rep. 220. The sheriff, then, discharged Parker without any due authority; he permitted his prisoner to escape; and Windrum was entitled to his action against the sheriff for the escape, and to another execution against the debtor. 2 Bac. Abr. Execution, D. p. 719. And the case of Kellogg v. Gilbert shewed, that Windrum, in the present case, might have prosecuted his action against the sheriff for the escape at the same time that he pursued the debtor by a new execution.

Leigh, for the appellees, said, it had never been doubted, that the statute which gave the common law process of execution to enforce decrees in chancery, conferred on the court of chancery, of necessity, the power and duty to superintend the process; to do whatever may be necessary to give effect to its process, if regularly sued

365 out, and to correct any *abuse of it: and, as a motion for award of execution on forthcoming bonds, taken under executions sued out upon decrees in chancery, must be addressed to the chancellor, so also to him must be addressed all complaints of process irregularly sued out on his decrees, and all applications for redress against abuses of the process of his own court. And the motion was the proper course for the party aggrieved to obtain redress. An audita querela could not be prosecuted in the court of chancery; and a bill of injunction would be dilatory and expensive. Indeed, the audita querela was obsolete in our practice: the proceeding by motion to quash had been long since substituted for it, in the courts of common law. As to the construction of the 3d section of the statute of executions; he said the meaning and effect of that provision were, that a party having sued out one execution, may demand another of the clerk, if the first be not returned and be not executed; or, in the words of chief justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court in Peyton v. Brooke, 3 Cranch, 96, "the statute contemplates the case where the first execution is not returned nor executed; that is, where it is out and may be served." Where one execution has been sued out, but no return thereof has been made, the party may demand other executions of the clerk, at his own cost; but he must take them at his peril also; and if his first execution has been saved, his other execution will be quashed. In the present case, however, the first execution (the ca. sa.) had been executed, and returned executed, and then withdrawn from the office, and suppressed; as is manifest from Mr. Claiborne's application to the sheriff to alter his return, and the reason he assigned for the request. This was a gross abuse. Whether Wyche was the agent of Windrum, and acted by authority from him, in directing the sheriff to discharge Parker from custody under the ca. sa. was a question of fact, which the court would consider, and decide, upon the evidence. If he was, there could be no doubt of the legal effect of such a discharge of the debtor.

Vigers v. Aldrich, 4 Burr. 2482; 366 Jacques v. Withy, 1 T. R. 557; Clarke v. Clement*, 6 T. R. 525; Tanner v. Hayne, 7 T. R. 420; De Costa v. Davis, 1 Bos. & Pul. 242; Blackburn v. Stupart, 2 East. 243; Furman v. Gaskin, 2 Caine 369; Yates v. Van Ransellaer, 5 Johns. Rep. 364.

CARR, J. It was contended by the appellant's counsel, 1. that under the 3d section of our statute of executions, the ieri facias in question was properly issued, Windrum having a right to demand the same, because the first execution was not returned and executed: 2. that the court could not on motion quash the execution, the proper remedy being audita querela, or injunction: and 3. that if a motion was proper, the decree was wrong upon the facts. The words of the statute on which the first point rests, are taken verbatim from a statute passed in 1726 (4 Hen. stat. at large, p. 156), and there we find them immediately preceded by this preamble: "And for removing all scruples, which may be entertained among clerks, concerning the issuing of executions, Be it enacted and declared," &c. It is purely directory to clerks. We see from various cases, that, in practice, a plaintiff was permitted to take out several executions upon his judgment at the same time. Stamper v. Hodson, 8 Mod. 302; Miller v. Parnell, 6 Taunt. 370; 1 Com. Law Rep. 414, S. C. This was convenient, and productive of no mischief: for the process was always under the control of the court; and if the plaintiff proceeded upon one, he thereby determined his election, and could make no use of the other. It seems clear to me, that the clause in question was meant merely to regulate this practice; and applies solely to cases, where a party having taken one execution, wishes before that is returned, or acted upon, to take out another. In such case, he is permitted to do so, "at his own proper costs and charges." This is also the opinion of the federal court, as delivered by chief justice Marshall, in Peyton v. Brooke. It cannot be presumed, indeed it was not contended, that the law meant that a fi. fa. should issue, where in truth a ca. sa. had been levied and not discharged: but 367 it was said, the clerk *was not to judge of the fact, and could only know of the levy by the regular return; that, therefore, the clerk, in this case, as there was no return, was bound to issue the second execution. I do not think it material to discuss this question; for, admitting that the clerk committed no error in issuing the execution, the question still remains, could the plaintiff properly have it levied after what had taken place on the ca. sa. and if not, had not the court power to quash it on motion? That the levy of a ca. sa. and the release of the debtor from execution, by the plaintiff or his agent, is an extinguishment of the debt, I have considered to be as well settled as any point can be, by an unbroken series of decisions. I must, indeed, do the counsel the justice to say, that I did not understand him to controvert this position. But he contended, that the second execution could not be quashed (especially by a court of chancery) on motion, but there should have been an audita querela, or injunction. I consider that when our law authorised the issuing executions on decrees, it clothed the chancellor with the power of watching over such process, and correcting any abuses arising under it, to the same extent, and by the same means, that courts of law exercise. The adjudged cases on the subject shew, that where the debtor had been discharged on a ca. sa. and other execution afterwards taken out against him, it was quashed indifferently on motion, or on rule to shew cause, which in truth is a mere notice of a motion, such as the party has here. With us, the audita querela is intirely superseded in practice, the proceedings by motion being considered as the cheaper and more convenient mode. The cases of Taylor v. Dundass, 1 Wash. 94; Hendricks v. Dundass, 2 Wash. 50; Downman v. Chinn, Id. 303, suffice to shew, that it has been the constant and approved practice of our courts, to exercise the power of quashing process which has irregularly issued, or been abused in the execution of it, on motion. I will not inquire here into the power of an attorney at law to bind his client, by discharging his debtor from execution; because, from the evidence, I think Wyche acted in the combined 368 *character of attorney at law and attorney in fact; and I feel no doubt, that his direction justified the sheriff in the discharge.

GREEN, J. It is clear, that Wyche had authority from Windrum to control his executions on a decree in chancery against Parker. He was in possession of the ca. sa. delivered it to the sheriff, and directed his proceedings upon it. He afterwards attended the sale appointed under the subsequent execution in company with Windrum, and acted on that occasion, as having the management of the execution. The sheriff, after indorsing his return upon the ca. sa. to the effect that he had executed it, and discharged the defendant by order of Wyche, the attorney for Windrum, delivered it to Wyche; and there is good reason to believe, from the declaration of Mr. Claiborne, who seems to have acted as the counsel for Windrum, that it was actually carried to the clerk's office, but the clerk refusing to issue a new execution on account of that return, it was withdrawn. However this may be, the execution and return delivered to Windrum's agent, from whom the sheriff received the execution, have been suppressed by Windrum or his agent or attorney, after an unsuccessful attempt to prevail upon the sheriff to alter his return and make it false.

The chancellor has, I think, put the just construction upon the execution law. The clerk was justified in issuing the last execution, in consequence of the ca. sa. not being returned; for to make a technical return, it is necessary that the execution should be actually returned to the office, with an indorsement signed by the sheriff, shewing how he has proceeded on it. But the plaintiff took out his second execution at his peril. Knowing the fact of the ca. sa. having been executed, he imposed upon the clerk by suppressing the ca. sa. and got another execution, which could not have issued but for his fraudulent suppression of the ca. sa. and return. Every court has an undoubted power to superintend the execution of its own process, and especially 369 of executions, *and to correct abuses therein, on motion, in a summary way; and may inquire into the facts necessary to the exercise of that power, either by the aid of a jury, or otherwise; confining itself, in all cases, within the limits of a sound judicial discretion, according to the nature of the case. Nor is there any doubt, that the discharge of a debtor in execution, by order of the plaintiff, is a perpetual bar to a new execution on the same judgment or decree. This is the settled rule in the courts of law; and since all executions, which can be issued upon a judgment at law, have been allowed by our statute to issue upon decrees in chancery, the courts of chancery are bound, in deciding upon all questions in respect to them, to abide by the common law and statutes respecting executions at law.

The question raised at the bar in respect to the right of a plaintiff to take out a new execution in case of a voluntary escape, does not occur in this case; for here was no voluntary escape. The sheriff acted under the directions of one duly authorised to control it. If this be not fully proved, it ought to be presumed in odium spoliatoris: but I think it is sufficiently proved by the evidence: the very suppression of the return is proof that it was a true one, and known to be so; for if it had been false, there would have been no motive to suppress it, since it would have made the sheriff liable for the debt. If that question did arise, I should think, that in a case of voluntary escape, a new execution might be taken out; though the contrary was held, as far back as the reign of Elizabeth, Linacre's case, Le. 230, yet in the reign of Charles II. it was settled upon the principles of the common law, uninfluenced by any statute, that in such a case, a new execution may issue. Bassett v. Salter, 2 Mod. 136.

CABELL, J., concurred, and the order was affirmed.

November, 1880.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Equitable Relief—Excessive Distress for Rent.—A tenant complaining of distress made for more rent than was in arrear and due, not having resorted to an action of replevin for redress, nor shewing any reason for failing to resort to his remedy at law, is not entitled to relief in equity.*

Winfree exhibited a bill against Mayo, in the county court of Chesterfield in chancery, setting forth, that Winfree having rented a tenement of Mayo, for one year, at a stipulated rent of 130 dollars per annum, Mayo, during the year, sent him a notice that the rent in future must be 400 dollars per annum, payable quarter yearly; whereupon Winfree was preparing to quit the tenement, but meeting with Mayo shortly after he received the notice, he complained to him, that the rent he demanded for the future was too high, and Mayo agreed that Winfree might occupy the tenement for another year at the rent of 130 dollars per annum which had been stipulated for the first year; and upon these terms Winfree continued to hold the premises for a second year. But at the end of the third quarter of the second year, Mayo distrained for three quarters rent in arrear at the rate of 400 dollars per annum; Winfree gave a three months replevy bond for the rent so distrained for; and the rent not being paid according to the tenor of the bond, the county court of Chesterfield awarded execution thereon, under the statute concerning rents, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 1, 2, pp. 446, 7. And the bill prayed an injunction to restrain Mayo from proceeding on his execution for the excess of the rent claimed by him above the rate of 130 dollars per annum. The injunction was awarded.

Mayo in his answer, stated, that he had given Winfree written notice that if he continued on the tenement a second year, he must pay 400 dollars rent per annum, quarter yearly, and that Winfree continued 371 on the premises accordingly; *and he positively denied, that he had afterwards agreed with Winfree, that he might continue at the reduced rent of 130 dollars.

The case was removed by certiorari to the superiour court of chancery of Richmond.

There was proof, that the stipulated rent of the first year was 130 dollars, and that Mayo, during the first year, gave Winfree written notice that he should demand and expect a rent of 400 dollars per annum, payable quarterly, if Winfree should continue his tenancy. The question of fact, upon the merits, was, whether, after that notice was given, there was any agreement between the parties, that Winfree should continue to hold at the old rent of 130 dollars per annum? The chancellor upon the hearing, thought there was sufficient proof of this agreement; and he perpetuated the injunction as to the excess of rent demanded by Mayo, above the rate of 130 dollars per annum. Mayo appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by the attorney general for the appellant, and S. Taylor for the appellees, as well upon the merits, as upon the question of jurisdiction, whether Winfree's case, upon his own shewing in the bill, was a proper one for relief in equity?

BROOKE, P. This is an action of replevin in the disguise of a bill in chancery. The allegations of the bill, if all true, shew a case to which the remedy by writ of replevin is peculiarly adapted: neither is any reason shewn or pretended, why Winfree failed to resort to his legal remedy. To entertain such a bill as this, were to allow a tenant complaining of a wrongful distress, to evade all the provisions of the statute regulating the writ of replevin; the duty of giving bond and surety to perform, and satisfy the judgment of the court, if he be cast, and the penalty which the law in that case imposes upon him; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 23. The court of chancery had no jurisdiction of the case: and 372 *if it had, the court would reverse the decree upon the merits: the case set forth in the bill is not proved. The decree is to be reversed, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

Southall v. Garner.

(Absent BROOKE, P. and COALTER, J.)

Replevin—Pleadings—Common Law Rules in Force in Virginia—Avovery.*—The common law rules respecting the pleadings in replevin, and particularly in regard to the nicety and precision required in avowry, are in force in Virginia, unaffected by any statutory provision: therefore, an avowry, faulty according to the common law rules applicable to that pleading, was held bad on general demurrer.

In an action of replevin, brought in the county court of Albemarle, by V. W. Southall, claiming as trustee for James Leitch, against Mary Garner, for goods which she had distrained for rent due her from Peter Laporte, Southall, in his declaration, complained that the defendant, on &c. at the parish of — in the county aforesaid, in a certain dwelling house there, took the goods and chattels, to wit, two milch crows, three feather beds, &c. (enumerating sundry articles of furniture) of him the said plaintiff trustee as aforesaid, of great value &c. and unjustly detained the same &c.

The defendant filed an avowry of which the following is an exact copy: "And the said defendant by her attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when &c. and well avows the taking of the said goods and chattels in the said declaration mentioned, in the said dwelling house in which they are alleged to have been taken, because she says, that a certain Peter Laporte, for several months, to wit, for nine months next before the taking of the said goods and chattels, held and enjoyed the said dwelling house, in which the said goods and chattels were taken, with 373 the appurtenances, *as tenant thereof to the said defendant, by virtue of a certain demise thereof to him the said Peter Laporte theretofore made, to wit, on the 1st day of January 1820, at and under the yearly rent of 400 dollars, payable quarterly, to wit, on &c. by even and equal proportions; and because the sum of 100 dollars, parcel of the said rent, which had accrued during the quarter ending the 25th day of December 1820, was at the time when the said goods and chattels were taken as aforesaid, due and in arrear from the said Laporte to the defendant, the defendant well avows the taking of the said goods and chattels in the said dwelling house, for and in the name of distress for the said rent,

*See generally, monographic note on "Detinue and Replevin" appended to Hunt v. Martin, 8 Gratt. 578. The principal case was cited in Bargamin v. Pottiaux, 4 Leigh 421: Carter v. Grant, 32 Gratt. 778.

so as aforesaid due and in arrear to the defendant; and in this she is ready to verify &c."

To this avowry, the plaintiff pleaded in bar, that Laporte, the tenant, during the year for which the premises were let to him by the defendant, as stated in her avowry, executed a deed of trust, which was afterwards duly recorded, whereby he conveyed the goods now distrained to the plaintiff, in trust, to secure a debt then and still justly due to Leitch; whereby the goods passed to the plaintiff as trustee for Leitch, and were not liable to be distrained for the rent due from Laporte to the defendant.

And to this plea the defendant put in a general demurrer.

The county court gave judgment for the defendant; the plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

The case was argued here by Johnson for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee. The parties, in the court below, apparently intended to present the question, upon the construction of the act of 1815, ch. 15, § 7, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 15, p. 450, whether goods mortgaged by a tenant, during his occupation of leased premises, and retained in his possession upon the premises, are liable to be distrained for the rent in arrear? In other words, whether, in such a case, the title of the mortgagee 374 is paramount to *the rights of the landlord? And that point was argued by Leigh with much earnestness; but Johnson said the court could not get to that question in this case, and declined the discussion of it: for,

He said, that upon Garner's general demurrer to Southall's plea in bar, the court must look back to the first fault in the pleadings; and it would find the avowry fatally defective: that this avowry was apparently framed upon the precedent, in 2 Chitt. Plead. 512, of an avowry under the statute of 11 Geo. II, ch. 19, § 22, but it did not pursue Chitty's precedent, and it would have been naught, even if we had any such statutory provision here, which we have not; much more was it faulty at common law, which is the law of Virginia on the subject. It was faulty, 1. Because it did not aver that the lease was continuing, or that the tenant was in possession and the landlord's title continuing, at the time of the distress. At common law, distress could not be made after the lease expired: our statute authorised distress afterwards, if the tenant continue in possession and the landlord's title continue; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 20, 21. 2. Because the demise and the landlord's title were imperfectly set out: neither the commencement nor expiration of the term, but only the date of the lease, is set out; nor who were the parties to the demise; nor the days of payment of the rent; nor what was the title of the avowant; nor that she or any body else was seized; nor that the property distrained was upon the demised premises; nor that it was the property of the tenant; which the 15th section of our statute concerning rents, certainly renders necessary. The common law required much strictness and nicety in avowries; and, in particular, it required the avowant to shew his title, and that the reversion is in him, and to set forth the demise with precision. Poole v. Longueville, 2 Wms. Saund. 282, 284, b., note 3; Hale's 2d exception to the avowry in Bennet v. Holbech, Id. 319, a.; Scilly v. Dally, 2 Salk. 562, 1 Bro. P. C. 525; S. C. 375 Reynolds v. Thorpe, *2 Stra. 766; Hawkins v. Eckles, 2 Bos & Pull. 359; Harrison v. M'Intosh, 1 Johns. Rep. 379, 383.

Leigh, contra, endeavoured to shew, 1. That the declaration was faulty in omitting to give any manner of description of the goods replevied, or of the place where they were taken. He did not contend, that an exact description of the goods, distinguishing them, with absolute certainty, from all other goods of the like kind, was necessary, for such description would be hardly practicable; but they might and ought to have been described and identified with all practicable certainty; they might and should have been described, as goods then in possession of Laporte, and at the house by him occupied. If it was right on general demurrer to the plea, to go back to the faults of the avowry, it was right to go a step farther back, and look to the faults of the declaration. 2. That the defects in this avowry, if they would have been fatal in a controversy between a landlord and his tenant, who has an interest to contest the avowant's title and right to distrain, were immaterial in this controversy between the landlord and a stranger to the lease, who had no interest to contest the landlord's right which the tenant did not dispute. All the cases cited by Johnson, were cases between landlord and tenant. 3. That though the avowry might be bad on special demurrer, it was not so on general demurrer. In the cases cited, the avowries were specially demurred to. The plaintiff cured the defects of the avowry here, by pleading to it; they were not such as would have been good cause in arrest of judgment; Freeman v. Jugg, 3 Salk. 307.

Johnson replied, that the declaration was as certain as in such a case was practicable, and at all events the faults alleged against it, were cured by the defendant's avowing. Bullythorpe v. Turner, Willes 476, note (a.) The avowry was bad on general demurrer; its defects were not cured by the pleading to it, and would have been sufficient cause in arrest of judgment. English v. Burnell, 2 Wils. 258; Bain v. Clark, 10 Johns. Rep. 435, 9. If in replevin be- 376 tween *tenant and landlord, the landlord must shew his title and his right to distrain the goods of his tenant, he ought to be held to equal strictness, at least, when he avows the taking of the goods of a stranger in distress for rent.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The question which the parties intended to submit by their pleadings, is not brought up in such a way as that it can be judicially settled by the judgment of the court in this case. The demurrer leads us up to the first fatal error in the pleadings. Upon the authorities cited at the bar, the declaration, if not good against a special demurrer, is good upon general demurrer, and cured by the pleading over. But the avowry is fatally defective in many of the particulars stated at the bar. This avowry was imperfectly copied from the form in Chitty's Pleadings, framed upon the provisions of the english statute of 11 Geo. II, ch. 19, § 22, which, in cases of distress for rent, greatly relaxed the strictness necessary in avowries by the common law; but we have no such statute, and none which at all affects the rules of the common law applicable to the pleadings in replevin.

The judgment is to be reversed, the demurrer overruled, and the cause sent back, with a direction to award a writ of inquiry as to the damages sustained by the plaintiff.

377 *Madden v. Madden's Ex'ors.

November, 1830.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Interlocutory Decrees—Appeal.—Upon appeals from interlocutory decrees in chancery, only so much of the cause is before the appellate court, as the court of chancery has acted upon.

Wills—Construction—Life Estate in Personality.—Testator bequeaths, that "all his moveable property after the death of his wife, shall be sold, and the proceeds divided among his five daughters: after all his debts paid, all his moveable property should be at the intire disposal of his wife: on her decease, the same to be disposed of as above mentioned." HELD, that the wife took only a life estate in such of the moveables as were capable of being used and returned in kind; and, therefore, the wife's gift of a slave to one of her daughters, passed only the wife's life estate therein to the donee.

Same—Same—Same—Liability of Life Tenant for Personality Consumable in Use—Quære.—Whether the wife, or her estate after her death, was accountable to the legatees in remainder, for such of the moveables as were consumable in the use, such as grain, or for the proceeds of crops left on hand by the testator, or for money or debts collected?

Mabra Madden the elder, of Frederick, by his last will and testament, inter alia, bequeathed as follows: "I desire the moveable property of every description, after the death of my wife, shall be sold, and the proceeds thereof equally divided among my

Cook*, 77 Va. 816; Ballard v. Chewning, 49 W. Va. 508, 39 S. E. Rep. 172.

†Wills—Construction—Life Estate in Personality—Liability of Life Tenant.—Where chattels are given to a person for his life, without any limitation over in remainder, the legatee for life has not absolute property in such chattels, but his estate is accountable to the estate of the testator for such chattels as the legatee, in his lifetime, sold and converted to his use, or his administrator, after his death, sold and converted to the use of such legatee's estate; but such is not the case with such chattels as are consumed in their use (quæ in usu consumuntur) in which the legatee for life has an absolute property. Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. Rep. 21, 22. In delivering the opinion of the court, JUDGE BRANNON said: "There is no question but a life-estate to one with remainder to another in personality may be given, as recognized in an infinite number of cases. Houser v. Ruffner, 18 W. Va. 258, and cases cited; Frazer v. Bevill, 11 Gratt. 9; Chisholm v. Starke, 3 Call 25, and cases below. In Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 377, it was held that under the will the wife took an estate for life in such of the moveables as were capable of being used and returned in kind, and a quære was left whether the wife or her estate was accountable to the legatees in remainder for such of the moveables as were consumable in their use, such as grain or money or debts." five daughters, Nancy, Susan, Mary, Jane and Elizabeth: after all my just debts are paid, my desire is, that all my moveable property shall be at the intire disposal of my wife, Jane Madden: on her decease, the same to be disposed of as above mentioned." The testator's widow, Jane Madden, and his son Mabra Madden the younger, were his executors. The moveable property, bequeathed by the above recited clause of his will, appeared, from the inventory and appraisement of his estate, to have consisted of household furniture, farming utensils, stock of horses, cows &c. and one male and one female slave; and it was alleged, that he also left a crop on hand and some debts due him, which were included in the same bequest. The female slave died in childbed, soon after the testator's death, leaving an infant child, a girl, afterwards called Lucinda, then only

378 two or three weeks old *feeble, sickly and unlikely to live; and the testator's widow Mrs. Madden, promised her daughter Nancy, that if she would give her care to this child, and should succeed in rearing it, she would give it to her. Nancy Madden, accordingly, took charge of the child, and by the most humane and constant care, succeeded in rearing it. And, some years afterwards, her mother Mrs. Madden and James Bulger, the husband of her sister Elizabeth, and John Thomas, the husband of her sister Jane, joined in a deed, conveying to Nancy Mad-

In Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 75, 10 S. E. Rep. 22. It is said that, in the principal case, JUDGE GREEN leaned strongly against the legatee for life having an absolute property even in specific bequests of articles consumable in their use.

Same—Same—Devise for Life with the Power of Disposal—Effect.—Numerous cases show that where a power of disposal accompanies a bequest or devise of a life estate, whether such estate be given expressly or by implication, the power is limited to such disposition as a tenant for life can make, unless there are other words clearly indicating that a larger power was intended. Miller v. Potterfield, 86 Va. 883, 884, 11 S. E. Rep. 496, citing, among others, the Virginia cases of Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 377; Johns v. Johns, 86 Va. 333, 10 S. E. Rep. 2.

Same—Same—Devise for Life with Absolute Power of Disposal—Effect.—It is settled, that if a testator gives property to a devisee or legatee, to use or dispose of at his pleasure, that is to consume or spend, sell or give away, at his pleasure, such devisee or legatee has the fee simple or absolute property, even though his interest in it be called by the will a life estate; and there be a provision in the will, whereby what remains of the property at the death of a devisee or legatee, is given to another person. Milhollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 519, citing, among others, the Virginia cases, Riddick v. Cagwood, 4 Rand. 547; Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 377, 385; Burwell v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 348, 355; McLison v. Cooper, 4 Leigh 408; May v. Joynes, 20 Gratt. 662; Spink v. Hayworth, 26 Gratt. 384. See also, foot-note to May v. Joynes, 20 Gratt. 662, collecting many cases in point and discussing this subject at some length.

It was said by JUDGE GREEN in Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 377, in an able review of the cases on the subject, that it was settled law that, whenever there is an interest given, coupled with an absolute power of disposition in respect to all property of every description, real and personal, the first taker would have an absolute property, and that there was no distinction between a case of a gift for life, with a power of disposition added, and a gift to one indefinitely, with a superadded power to dispose of by deed or by will. HARRISON, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 435, 21 S. E. Rep. 810.

But in Milhollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 526, JUDGE GREEN, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "JUDGE GREEN in a dissenting opinion in Madden v. Madden's Ex'rs, 2 Leigh 380, denied (with some qualifications) that there was an established distinction between a case of a gift for life, with a power of disposition added, and a gift to one indefinitely.

den, in consideration of her care, trouble and expense in rearing the girl Lucinda, all their right, title and interest in her. Under this title, Nancy Madden claimed and held the girl in possession, till her mother's death, thirteen years after the deed was made.

Upon a bill exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Winchester, by Nancy Madden against Samuel Madden and John Rippler executors of Mabra Madden the younger, who was surviving executor of his father, the testator Mabra Madden the elder, the executor also of his mother Jane Madden, and James Bulger, and Elizabeth his wife, John Thomas and Jane his wife, Thomas Hunter and Mary his wife, and Thomas Jones and Susan his wife, the following questions of law arose: 1. Whether the will of Mabra Madden the elder, in giving his wife the intire disposal of his moveable property, did not, in effect, give her an absolute estate therein, so that her gift of the female slave in question to Nancy Madden, sufficed to pass a perfect title to the donee? Or, if not, 2. Whether, as Mrs. Madden was an executrix of that testator, her conveying of this slave was effectual to pass the legal title to the donee, leaving the executrix accountable for the value to the legatees in remainder? If neither, 3. Whether, considering the care, trouble and expense, incurred by Nancy Madden, in rearing this slave, she was not entitled to remuneration from the legatees in remainder?

Upon these points the chancellor was of opinion, that the testator's widow Jane

Madden, took under his will, only a 379. *life interest in the moveable property and could transfer no more to

with a superadded power to dispose by deed or will. He was apparently misled by the cases of Goodtitle v. Otway, 2 Wills, 6; Beachcroft v. Broome, 4 T. R. 441; Barford v. Street, 16 Ves. 135; Irwin v. Farrer, 19 Ves. 86, which are the only cases he cites to sustain his view.

All these cases we have examined and commented on. JUDGE GREEN seems however to have entertained this view but a brief time. He concurred in the decision in Burwell Ex'rs v. Anderson's Adm'r, etc., 8 Leigh 356, decided shortly afterwards. JUDGE TUCKER, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, says: "A devise to A. to dispose of at his will and pleasure, gives a fee simple; but a devise to a wife for life, and after her decease she to give the same to whom she will, passes but a life estate with a power. When such inconsistent life estate is given, the fee does not pass; for the whole matter rests upon intention."

"I conclude therefore, as stated by Sir William Grant in Bradley v. Westcott, 18 Ves. 453, and by CHANCELLOR KENT in Jackson v. Robbins, 16 Johns. 568, that the distinction, on which I have been insisting, is perfectly established; and that a devise or gift to A. and such persons, as he shall appoint, is a fee simple, or absolute property in A. without an appointment; but if it is to him for life, and an unlimited power of appointment is superadded, he has but a life estate. And if the superadded power was, to appoint a specified class of persons, it would a fortiori not enlarge his property life estate to a fee simple, or absolute property."

Same—Rule of Construction.—In the principal case, speaking of the will therein construed, CARR, J. said (at page 380): "There are no technical words or forms of expression used in the will. It is, evidently, the production of a plain man, who, though he understood very well what he meant to say, and was able to express himself quite intelligibly, knew nothing of legal forms or legal phrases. To ascertain his meaning, we must not look to treatises on wills, or to adjudged cases, but simply to the words he has used." These words of JUDGE CARR were approved by LEWIS, P., speaking for the court in Miller v. Potterfield, 86 Va. 878, 11 S. E. Rep. 486.

Nancy Madden, by any deed or gift made by her in her own right; that if the gift could be regarded as made by her in her executorial character, it would be void, since an executor cannot make a valid gift of his testator's property, though his sale to a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of fraud, it is good; that, therefore, Nancy Madden had no title to or right in the slave Lucinda, except as a legatee in remainder, and as assignee of the right of two others of the legatees; that her care and expense in rearing this slave from her childhood, could give her no claim for remuneration against the legatees in remainder, that being properly a charge against her mother, who, as the owner for life, was bound to take care of and support her; and that the court ought not to impede the sale of this slave by the executors, since she was a subject otherwise indivisible among the legatees in remainder, and since the testator expressly required all the property remaining at the death of his wife to be sold, and the proceeds divided among his five daughters, and the sureties in the administration bond are responsible to the parties, if the executors fail to account for the proceeds. And the chancellor made an interlocutory decree in the cause, grounded on these principles.

He also intimated an opinion on another point (though he did not decide it, or found any part of his decree upon it, because all the parties interested in the point, were not then regularly convened before the court) namely, that the bequest of the moveable property, to the testator's wife for life, so far as it affected articles the use of which consisted in the consumption of them (such as grain) with a power of intire disposal, was, according to the better opinions, absolute, and a limitation of them over in remainder, ineffectual; and though such a bequest of money might not, generally, fall within the same principle, yet the strong language of this will, that after the testator's debts should be paid, all his moveable property should be at the intire disposal of his wife, excluded the money, or indeed, for any articles except such as were susceptible of being used and returned in kind.

Nancy Madden appealed from the chancellor's interlocutory decree to his court, where the cause was argued by Nicholas for the appellant and Leigh for the appellees, upon the points above stated, and upon other points also presented by the decree, which it is needless to report, because, though they were the grounds on which this court reversed the decree, they depended on the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, and involved no general principle.

CARR, J. Upon these appeals from interlocutory decrees, so much of the cause only is before the court as the chancellor has acted upon: this, I think, has been the constant course of the court. The chancellor, then, has decided, in the first place, that Nancy Madden had no title to or right in the slave Lucinda, but as a legatee of her father and assignee of other legatees; that Mrs. Madden the testator's widow, took, under his will, not an absolute property in the slaves included in the moveable property thereby bequeathed, but only a life estate. The inquiry is as to the meaning of the bequest: it is a pure question of intention. There are no technical words or forms of expression used in the will. It is, evidently, the production of a plain man, who, though he understood very well what he meant to say, and was able to express himself quite intelligibly, knew nothing of legal forms or legal phrases. To ascertain his meaning, we must not look to treatises on wills, or to adjudged cases, but simply to the words he has used. There were but two slaves included in this bequest of the moveable property, one a man of trivial value, the other a female (the mother of Lucinda) who died shortly after the testator. If Lucinda was the property of Mrs. Madden, it is because her mother was given to her by the will. "I desire the moveable property of every description, after the death of my wife, shall be sold, and the money divided among my five daughters." This sentence it is impossible to misunderstand, or to have 381 "a doubt about: it expresses the clear will of the testator on two points, 1. that all his personal estate was to be sold for the benefit of his daughters, and 2. that this sale was to take place after the death of his wife. This (as lawyers know) would have given his wife a life estate in the personal property, by implication; but the testator probably had no idea, that a direction to sell after his wife's death, would imply an estate for life to her; and if he did know it, he chose not to rest it on implication, but to give it to her expressly. He therefore adds, "after all my just debts are paid, my desire is, that all my moveable property, shall be at the intire disposal of my wife." Now, is there any thing in this provision, incompatible with the first? If the testator had stopped here, does not every one see his meaning at a glance? At my wife's death this property shall be sold; but till then, she shall have the intire disposal of it. Is there any thing in these words "intire disposal" which, of necessity, and in the teeth of the preceding sentence, vests the absolute property in the wife? They are not technical words, to which a fixed meaning is attached, and that so well known, that we must suppose the testator so used them. They are such words as may well be explained, and their operation either enlarged or restricted, by the context. Thus, the direction being given to sell the property at the wife's death, the intire disposition given her, means the free use and enjoyment, the uncontrolled possession and ownership, until her death, but such a possession, ownership and disposal, as may leave the property to be sold at her death. This, I say, would seem to me the plain construction, if the testator had stopped at the sentence giving his wife the intire disposal: but he immediately adds, "On her decease, the same to be disposed of as above mentioned;" thus repeating his favorite wish of a sale and division among his daughters, and making, as he no doubt thought, "assurance doubly sure." Small indeed, would seem to be the worth of language, or the security of wills,

It is impossible to suppose, that the testator meant by the gift to the wife, to defeat and destroy the sale directed at her death; and yet he must so have meant, if he meant to give her the intire and absolute interest in the property. Indeed, it is not, I believe, contended that the testator meant to vest in his wife the absolute property, but that he intended to give her a life estate, with an absolute power of disposition, leaving only so much to be sold at her death, as should be undisposed of by her, and that, by consequence, this power of disposal vested in her the absolute interest in the whole, whether disposed of or not, and rendered the direction to sell at her death void, not by force of the testator's intention, but by operation of law. This argument concedes, 1. that the testator intended to give his wife only a life estate; and 2. that he intended a sale of the property left at her death. But, it is said, he meant to give her an absolute power of disposal of the property, and this converts the estate for life into an absolute estate, and destroys the intention to give it for life, and the direction to sell after her death. Thus, while we are looking for intention alone, we suffer one doubtful phrase, "intire disposal," a phrase having nothing technical, no settled meaning, but liable to be enlarged or restricted by the context, to overrule and destroy the settled wish and will of the testator, twice expressed in words as clear as light, viz. that his moveable property of every description should be sold at the death of his wife, and the money divided among his daughters. To such a construction I can never assent. I am clearly of opinion, that the testator meant to give his wife, and has given her, a life estate in the moveable property, with a power of disposal commensurate with that estate; and at her death the property to be sold, and the money divided among his daughters. I agree, therefore, with the chancellor, that the testator's widow Mrs. Madden, had only a life estate in the slaves in question, and could give no more by her deed to the appellant. His other positions, that an executor cannot make a valid gift of his testator's property, and that 383 the appellant can have no claim *to remuneration for her trouble and expense in rearing this slave, against her co-legates in remainder, seem to me indisputably correct; indeed, they have hardly been contested. And these are the only principles declared, the only points of law decided, by the decree.

GREEN, J. The provisions of the will of Mabra Madden the elder, directing that his moveable property of every description, after the death of his wife, should be sold, and the proceeds divided between his daughters, and that, after the payment of his debts, all his moveable property should be at the intire disposal of his wife, and on her decease the same should be disposed of as before mentioned, are so inconsistent, that they would, if taken literally, utterly destroy each other. Such a construction ought not to be admitted, if by any other, consistent with the probable intention of the testator, the provisions can be considered as each modifying the other, without destroying their whole effect.

The judgment of the court below upon this will, was 1. that it gave only a life estate to the widow: 2. that such a gift with a power of disposition of articles, such as grain, the use of which consists in its consumption, is absolute, and a limitation over ineffectual: 3. that although money may not, generally, fall within this principle, yet the strong language of this will, that after the debts were paid, all the testator's moveable property should be at the intire disposal of his wife, excluded the notion of her accountability for money, or for any articles except such as are susceptible of being used and returned in kind. And, upon these principles, the court thought, that neither the widow nor the executors of Mabra Madden were accountable to his daughters, for money received on account of outstanding debts due to the testator, or for the sales of crops on hand or growing at the time of his death. I infer also, from an expression in the decree, "since the testator expressly requires all the property remaining at the death of his wife, to be sold and the proceeds divided amongst his five daughters," *that the court was of opinion, 384 that the power of disposition given to the wife had the effect of restraining the testator's disposition in favor of his daughters, to such of the property only as remained at his wife's death undisposed of by her. And this, I am perfectly convinced, was the real intention of the testator.

The first sentence of his will, on this subject, by directing, that his moveable property of every description, should after the death of his wife be sold, gave her a life estate by implication in the whole: the second modified it, by subjecting the whole to her intire disposition, not with the intention of revoking the former in toto, but only so far as the widow should exercise that power of disposition: and the last was a mere repetition of the first, and modified alike by the second. This construction attributes to the testator a reasonable intention, and one not at all uncommon, to give to a favorite legatee the use of a fund for life, with a power to dispose of as much of it as might be necessary to the occasions of such legatee, to be judged of by the legatee, and with a desire, that so much of it as was not disposed of by the first taker, should go to the persons next in his affections; particularly, when the last are in the same relation to the first taker as to the testator, and likely to be as much in the affections of the first taker as his own. This construction too would leave every clause of the will to have some effect. If, on the contrary it is supposed, that the testator intended a power of disposition given to his wife, only co-extensive with the interest for life previously given, it would render that provision utterly nugatory; for the legatee would have had such a power of disposition as a necessary incident to her interest for life. And if such a construction could be put upon a power given in general terms, it is impossible to apply it to one given in such broad emphatic terms as "the intire disposal:" a power of disposition for life, is not a power of intire disposition. It would be still more extravagant to suppose, that the testator, when he gave the same power, in the same terms, as to all his 385 *personal property, intended, and had in his mind, that it should operate as to some articles, (such as would necessarily be consumed in use, money, debts and the proceeds of crops made for sale and sold) and give his wife an absolute right of property in them, and as to others (such as could be used and returned in specie) only a power of disposition of her interest for life. Whether such is or is not the legal effect of such a power, connected with a life estate, is another question, which will be attended to; but, surely, such an effect could not have been the intention of the testator.

If the court below, as I have supposed, entertained the same opinion which I have expressed as to the construction of the will, that the testator intended to give only a life estate in his personal property to his wife, with a power of absolute disposition over all or any part of it at her pleasure, and that only such part as was not so disposed of should be sold at her death, and disposed of according to his will, then it was wholly unnecessary to go any further, than to inquire whether such a disposition could be legally carried into effect? If it could, then the will of the testator controlled the disposition of the whole alike, without any discrimination. If it could not, because the limitation over in such a case would be void, as being contrary to settled rules of law, the limitation would be wholly frustrated, and the first taker, by virtue of such an absolute power of disposition, would have the absolute property in all, and not a part only of a peculiar description. And this is the settled law (wherever there is an interest given coupled with an absolute power of disposition) in respect to all property of every description, real and personal, as was decided in Riddick v. Cohoon, 4 Rand. 547, upon many authorities there collected. That case and those there cited, are all cases of gifts, indefinite, or expressly in fee; and it may be supposed, that the rule applies only to such cases, and not to those which are limited to an estate for life, either expressly or by implication, especially, as it was said

386 by the master of the *rolls in Bradley v. Westcott, 13 Ves. 452, that there was an established distinction between a case of a gift for life with a power of disposition added, and a gift to one indefinitely with a superadded power to dispose by deed or will. I am satisfied there is no such distinction, except so far as the character of the estate first given, may, in doubtful cases, influence the construction of the will, as to the extent of the power given; but when the will expressly gives a power of absolute disposition, the effect is the same in both cases. Thus, in Goodtitle v. Otway, 2 Wills. 6, a devise to one for life, and after death to her issue, but if none that she should have power to dispose of the lands at her will and pleasure, it was held, that she had an estate tail with a fee simple upon contingency, and not a mere power to dispose or appoint. And Beachcroft v. Broome, 4 T. R. 441, is to the same effect. It may be said, that there was in those cases, no limitation over upon the failure of the tenant for life to dispose of the subject, and that circumstance makes a difference: but it does not. In Barford v. Street, 16 Ves. 135, the devise was of real and personal estate, in trust to pay the rents, dividends &c. to a married woman for life, and after her death, to convey &c. according to her appointment, with a limitation over in case of her death without making an appointment: the master of the rolls held, that she had an absolute property immediately, and decreed the trustees to convey it absolutely to her in her life time. So, in Irwin v. Farrar, in the Exchequer, 19 Ves. 86, a sum of money was given to trustees to be invested in government securities, the dividends thereof to be paid to a niece of the testatrix for life, and after her decease, to such person or persons, or for such use or uses as she should appoint by will or otherwise, and empowering her to apply the fund, if she chose, to the purchase of an annuity, so that it was purchased and secured, with the approbation of the trustees, and that she should not have power to sell such annuity: it was held, that the legatee had an absolute power of disposition over the whole fund, and decreed, that the

387 trustees should pay over the legacy *to her for her own use, and to be at her own disposal. In the case above stated of Barford v. Street, the estate was limited in express terms, to the life of the first taker; it was vested in trustees; and there was a limitation over, in case she should fail to dispose of it by appointment: and in Irwin v. Farrar, the first taker had no power to dispose of it, according to the literal terms of the will, but by some act to take effect after her death. In our case, there is no limited estate in terms; no trustees are interposed; and the power is immediate and unlimited as to manner, object and subject. The observation of the master of the rolls, in Bradley v. Westcott, in respect to a settled distinction in such cases, between an indefinite interest, and an express life estate, given in the first instance, was made in reference to the effect of that circumstance, in determining the extent of the power. There, the testator gave all his personal property to his wife for life, "to be at her full, free and absolute disposal and disposition, during her natural life, without being in any wise liable to be called to any account of or concerning the amount, value of particulars thereof, by any person or persons whatever," and from and after her decease, he gave a certain specified part thereof, to such persons as his wife by her will duly executed should direct and appoint, and if she should make no such appointment, that part was to fall into the residue, which should remain undisposed of by his wife at the time of her decease; and all the rest, residue and remainder of his said personal estate, which should remain undisposed of by his wife at the time of her decease, he gave to a residuary legatee. The master of the rolls held, that the express estate for life, and power of disposition, for her natural life only, given in the first instance to the wife, were not enlarged by the subsequent declaration exempting her from account &c. nor by the subsequent disposition of the property remaining undisposed of by the wife at her decease; because that would allow an implication from equivocal terms to control an express limitation of the estate and of the power of disposition, to her life only; and,

388 especially, because a power of *appointment in absolute property by her will, was given to the wife, as to a specified part of the property, which contradicted the idea of a general power over the whole: and that the exemption from accountability &c. was also only intended to protect her from any trouble, in that way, during her life only. He admitted, that it was necessary to construe this to be either a mere interest for life (with the greatest power of disposition, which one having such an interest could enjoy) or to be property in the widow: that there was no medium: for he could not say, that she had a life interest, with a power to dispose of the whole, if she thought fit, but that the will shall operate upon what she should leave undisposed of. Upon that construction it would be property, as it would be absolutely uncertain what would be the subject of the residuary bequest. And, consequently, he held that she had only a life estate, even in that over which she had a power of appointment by will; and that her will giving in general terms all her property did not pass it to her legatee. In our case, we have no express estate for life, no express limitation of the power of disposition to the continuance of the life estate, and no particular power to dispose of a specified part of the property, to control, not an implied power to dispose of all, (as in that case) but an express power to that effect, in our case.

If it was the opinion of the chancellor, that the testator intended only to give a power of disposition co-extensive with the interest of the donee for life, and that, in such a case, the law controlled the intention of the testator, in respect to such articles as could be only used by consuming them, because incapable of limitation, and gave the absolute property of such to the donee; and that the existence of the power, though nugatory to all other purposes, would have the effect of enlarging the scope of that rule of law, so as to embrace other articles not necessarily consumed in use, such as money, debts collected, and the proceeds of crops sold: I cannot assent to either of these propositions. As to the last, the intent of the testator was, avowedly,

389 the *same as to his whole moveable property of every description; and if his intention was invalid as to a part, because contrary to a rule of law, and valid as to the rest, it would be because the law itself marks the line of discrimination contrary to the testator's will; and it would be extravagant to say, that the intention of the testator could operate either way, beyond the legal line of discrimination. If it could affect any thing beyond that line, it must of necessity affect all alike. As to the first proposition, I do not think that the doctrine is true, that an interest given for life in things quæ ipso usu consumuntur, confers, by operation of law, an absolute property, with or without a power of disposition, which, if connected with such an interest, must operate by its own force, and alike upon all descriptions of property given for life, either extending the life estate to an absolute property in all or none. The master of the rolls, in Randall v. Russell, 3 Meriv. 194, did indeed assert, that a specific bequest of such articles for life (without any express power of disposition) did vest an absolute property in the first taker, but admitted, that in case of a residuary bequest it did not, and that in such a case the limitation over would be valid. In the present case, the bequest was residuary, or of the same nature, being of things of all descriptions in mass, which is the only ground of discrimination between a specific and residuary bequest. It is therefore unnecessary, in this case, to examine the general question at large: but I must be permitted to say, that my opinion, made up on great consideration and given judicially in an important case, with this opinion of the master of the rolls before me, was, and is, that even in the case of a specific bequest of such articles for life with a limitation over, the limitation is good; that the intention of the testator, being in such case most obvious, that the legatee in remainder shall have the benefit of the subject after the death of the first taker, it ought to be carried into effect, if possible. And it may be effectuated by requiring the representative of the first taker, to deliver articles of the same kind and quality, or to pay their 390 *value to the remainderman. This is clearly the civil law, from which the principle of the common law now prevailing was taken, and is intirely just, and no way inconvenient in its execution.

If I am right in supposing, that the intention of the testator was to give a life estate in the whole of his personal property of every description to his wife, with an absolute power of disposition as to all, and that so much thereof as might be left undisposed of by her at her death, should be sold &c. then an absolute property in the whole was vested in her, whether disposed of by her or not, and the limitation over was void, not by force of the testator's intention, but by operation of law; and her conveyance of the slave in question passed an absolute property; for, though it may be that she believed that she only had a life estate, which she intended to pass by the deed, yet as that conveyed, in terms, all her right and title, it passed the absolute property to the grantee. Wiseley v. Findlay, 3 Rand. 361.

Suppose, however, that in such case an absolute property in the whole does not vest in the first taker, by force of a rule of law rendering the limitation over as to the part undisposed of by the first taker void, and that the intention of the testator in respect to the disposition of such part can be legally carried into effect; still the actual disposition of any part by the first taker, would vest an absolute property in the devisee or vendee, as the case might be, and effectually withdraw it from the operation of the will, directing only that such of the property as remains undisposed of by the first taker, shall at her death be sold &c. The gift or sale of the slave in question, when a sickly and motherless infant of three weeks old, by Mrs. Madden to the appellant, in consideration of her taking care of it and preserving its life, was an intire and absolute disposition of it, as was her subsequent conveyance of it by her deed, not as an executrix, but as a legatee for life with an absolute power of disposition. The suggestion, therefore, in the decree under consideration, that an executor cannot 391 give away his testator's *property, has no application to the case; but even an executor would have that power, if the intire disposition was given to him by the will.

CABELL, J. The controversy in this case depends upon the construction of the will of Mabra Madden, the elder; and the question is as to the testator's intention.

It is agreed, on all hands, that he intended his wife to have a life estate in his moveable property: but the controversy is, whether he did or did not intend to give her any other power over the property than that which would necessarily belong to her as mere tenant for life? It is contended, on the one hand, that she had no other interest or power, than as mere tenant for life; on the other, that she had not only a life estate in the property, but the power to dispose absolutely of any part or of the whole thereof, so as to leave nothing for the daughters, except such as she might fail to dispose of.

There is not, in my opinion, any thing in this will, to justify the belief, that the testator intended thus to subject the interests of his daughters to the power of his wife. It is not usual for the father of a large family to pursue such a course; and I think it an unnatural course, unless there be particular circumstances which require it. In a doubtful case, therefore, I should feel no disposition to attribute such an intention to a testator. But, in this case, the testator has expressed himself so strongly as (in my judgment) to leave no doubt of his intention. The solicitude which he has manifested for the interests of his daughters, is at least equal to that which he has shewn for the interest of his wife, though he has provided for them in different ways. To his wife he gives the enjoyment of the property during her life; but, if there be any force in language, he also intended that his daughters should enjoy it after her death. It is somewhat remarkable, that the clauses of the will on which the question arises, commence and end with the declaration, that his daughters are to have, after the death of his wife, 392 *the benefit of all of his moveable property. This is certainly so, as to the first clause; for the expressions there are, that the moveable property of every description, after the death of his beloved wife, should be sold, and the proceeds thereof equally divided among the five daughters. The same idea is as strongly expressed in the last clause, where, after having in the intermediate clause declared that all his moveable property should be at the intire disposal of his wife, he immediately adds, "on her death the same shall be disposed of as above mentioned;" that is, sold for the benefit of his daughters. The word "same," in the last clause, refers to the property which in the preceding clause he had put at the intire disposal of his wife; viz: all his moveable property. The testator could not have intended, that his wife should have the power to dispose, absolutely, of all his moveable property, so as to leave none of it for his daughters, and yet intend that his daughters should have it all, after her death. The two intentions are inconsistent with each other. When contradictory expressions occur in wills, it is our duty to reconcile them if we can. As, then, the testator has declared, in the most express and positive terms, that his daughters are to have all his moveable property after his wife's death, and that in the mean time she is to have the intire disposal of it, it seems to me impossible to resist the inference, that, by the terms intire disposal of his wife, he meant no more than that she should have that sort of intire disposal, which is necessary to the full and uncontrolled enjoyment of it during her life. I am therefore of opinion, that the wife took only a life estate under the will, and had no right to give away the slave in question. As to the points of law, which have been discussed at the bar, though not decided by the chancellor, I give no opinion on them; because, according to the view which I have taken of the case, some of them can never arise, and because it would be premature to decide the others, before all the parties interested in them shall be brought before the court.

393 *CARR, J., thought the decree right in omnibus; but, the other two judges, holding that it was erroneous upon the points before alluded to, as depending upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, involving no general principle, and therefore not necessary to be noticed in the report, the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded to the court of chancery.

†Same—Motion against Deputy and Sureties—Interest.—The principal case was cited with approval in Willard v. Overseers of Poor, 9 Gratt. 141.

§Same—Evidence against Sureties—Judgment against Sheriff—Effect.—Crawford v. Turk, 24 Gratt. 176, was an action of debt, brought by a sheriff against his deputy and the sureties of the deputy, on the official bond of the deputy, to recover the amount of a judgment rendered against the sheriff for the default of the deputy. The question was presented to the court of appeals whether the judgment rendered against the sheriff, the deputy having attended the trial and made full defense to the action, was binding and conclusive upon the sureties of the deputy in the action of the sheriff against the deputy and his sureties. It was held that the judgment was conclusive evidence against the sureties of the deputy as well as against the deputy himself. JUDGE MONCURE, who delivered the opinion of the court, discusses at some length the principal case, Munford v. Overseers, 2 Rand. 318, and Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 323, and shows that they are not opposed to the view which is taken in the case at bar. Though he seems to approve the proposition laid down in Munford v. Overseers, 2 Rand. 318, that a judgment against a principal in a bond is not conclusive against his sureties, he thinks that the case of a deputy and his sureties, so far as it relates to the effect upon the sureties of a judgment against the deputy, does not come within the purview of the rule governing the case of a principal and his sureties: but that the bond given by a deputy and his sureties is a bond of indemnity, and the case of a deputy and his sureties falls under that class of cases in which those who are not parties to the suit, and do not claim under either of the parties, may be bound by the judgment.

In discussing the decision in the principal case, he says: "It was not necessary to decide, and was not decided in that case that the judgment against the sheriff was not conclusive evidence against the sureties of the deputy, but it was sufficient to decide, as it was decided, that the said judgment was prima facie evidence against them. The remark of JUDGE CARR in delivering the opinion of the court, that 'This, we think was ample evidence of the fact, and charged his sureties, unless disproved by them,' was extrajudicial as to the concluding words, 'unless disproved by them,' and seeming in that respect to have been made without advertent to the distinction noticed by JUDGE GREEN, as before mentioned. 2 Rand. 318. JUDGE CARR treated the case before him as a case falling under the general rule which governs the case of principal and surety, instead of a case falling under the exceptions, which includes cases of contracts of indemnity and the like. Whether it properly fell under the one or the other, the result of the case would be precisely the same."

"In that case the judgment against the sheriff was by confession, though with the assent of the deputy, and it was therefore contended by the sureties of the deputy, that it did not bind them: there being, as they said, no other evidence of the deputy's default. But the court said the record showed that the motion against the sheriff was for judgment for the amount of the clerk's tickets for fees put into the hands of his deputy, and that upon this motion the deputy assented in open court to the confession of judgment by the sheriff: in other words, confessed that he had received the clerk's tickets and had not accounted for them: this the court thought, 'was ample evidence of the fact, and charged his sureties, unless disproved by them.' Had the judgment been rendered against the sheriff, not by confession, but in invitum, and against the utmost resistance of the deputy, the court might have thought the judgment conclusive, not only against the deputy but also against his sureties. In the case now under consideration the judgment against the sheriff was in invitum, and evidence against the deputy's sureties, upon a motion by the sheriff against the deputy and his sureties.

Same—Bond of Deputy—Effect of Death of One Surety.

A deputy sheriff gives bond with eight sureties to the sheriff; one of the sureties dies: HELD, a motion lies on the bond against the deputy and the surviving sureties.

Jacobs was commissioned sheriff of the county of Nelson, for the year 1820-21, and, by a second commission, was continued in the office for the year 1821-22. During the first year of his service, he appointed Hill his deputy; and Hill, with eight sureties, executed a bond to Jacobs, with condition which (so far as it is material) to recite it *here) was in the following words: "The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas W. B. Jacobs hath been commissioned sheriff of the county of Nelson, and the above bound J. T. Hill hath undertaken the duties of the said office, for and during the time the said Jacobs may continue in office; now, if the above bound J. T. Hill shall well and truly execute and perform the duties of the said office, as deputy sheriff, and well and truly collect and account for all moneys which he may receive by any process, &c. and shall moreover indemnify, keep and save harmless the said W. B. Jacobs from all costs, fines, forfeitures and amercements, which he may be subject to in consequence of his the said J. T. Hill's default, in all suits, actions and motions, and shall in all respects execute and perform the duties of deputy sheriff as he may be required by law, then this obligation to be void." During the second year of Jacobs's shrievalty, the clerk of Nelson put his tickets for fees into the hands of Hill, the deputy, for collection; and Hill failing to collect and account for them, the clerk made a motion in the county court of Nelson, against Jacobs, the high sheriff, for

against the utmost resistance of the deputy, who was present on the trial, was examined as a witness for the defendant, and seemed to be the person manifesting the most interest in the progress and result of the action.

And in State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 389, 30 S. E. Rep. 67, 68, it is said: "I think that in this state a judgment against a principal does not bind the surety, as a general rule. Bigelow v. Estop, 145; Craddock v. Turner, 6 Leigh 118; Munford v. Overseers of Poor, 2 Rand. (Va.) 318; Jacobs v. Hill, 2 Leigh 393; Black, Judgm. § 586. These cases overrule Baker v. Preston, Gilmer 235. There is high authority, however, in favor of the conclusiveness of a judgment against the principal upon the sureties. Stovall v. Banks, 10 Wall 583; Bigelow v. Estop, 146, note 2. I said above that the judgment is not generally conclusive upon sureties. It depends upon the character of the bond. If it undertakes to pay such judgment as may be recovered, that judgment is conclusive, because that judgment is the event on the happening of which the surety agrees to pay. Crawford v. Turk, 24 Gratt. 176. If the effect of the obligation is such that the surety is to be bound by the result of litigation between others, he is, in the absence of fraud or collusion, concluded by such result." 1 Brandt Sur. § 110; Herm. Estop. §§ 139, 153; Black, Judgm. § 586. Where the bond is not merely to pay damages, but for indemnity against liability by judgment, it is conclusive."

In Henrico Justices v. Turner, 6 Leigh 128, TUCKER, P. in his dissenting opinion, said: "In the case of Jacobs v. Hill, 2 Leigh 393, a judgment confessed by the sheriff, with the assent of the deputy, but without the knowledge of his sureties, was indeed held to be admissible evidence, but not conclusive, for JUDGE CARR, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that it charged the sureties, unless disproved by them."

See the principal case also cited in Board of Supervisors v. Dunn, 27 Gratt. 622; Carr v. Mead, 77 Va. 160.

the amount, and damages at the rate of 15 per centum per annum, according to the statute; upon which Jacobs confessed judgment for 807 dollars, the amount due, and the damages to be computed from the 1st November 1822 till paid, and costs. And then Jacobs gave a notice to Hill and seven of his sureties (stating that the eighth surety was dead) that he should make a motion against them in the same court, for the 807 dollars and the damages and costs, which the clerk had recovered against him for Hill's default. At the trial of this motion, in the county court, the facts above stated appeared in evidence; and it was proved, that Jacobs confessed the judgment to the clerk, with the assent of Hill; which was the only proof adduced of Hill's default; and there was no proof that Hill's sureties were privy to, or had any knowledge of Jacobs's confession of judgment.

*Upon this state of facts, the county court gave judgment for Jacobs, for the 807 dollars and the damages and costs recovered of him by the clerk with interest on the aggregate of principal, damages and costs, from the date of the clerk's judgment for them, and the costs of this motion. To this judgment the defendants prayed and obtained a supersedeas from the circuit court of Nelson, which reversed the judgment, and then Jacobs appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant, referred to the cases of The Commonwealth v. Fairfax, 4 Hen & Munf. 208, Royster v. Leake, 2 Munf. 280, and Munford v. Rice, 6 Id. 81, and he said, the question was, Whether the condition of Hill's bond to Jacobs, bound him and his sureties for his faithful performance of the office of deputy, during both the years of Jacobs's shrievalty, or only during the first year? a deputy sheriff and his sureties may, during the first year of his principal's shrievalty, contract that the deputy shall duly perform the duties of the office, for that and the second year of the shrievalty also; and if that was the contract in this case, it fell within the principle of Royster v. Leake, and the judgment of the county court was right; but if the condition of the bond imported a deputization of the shrievalty for Jacobs's first year of service only, the principle of The Commonwealth v. Fairfax and Munford v. Rice, applied to the case, and the judgment of the circuit court was right.

The parties contracted with knowledge of and reference to the statute; which provides, that every person commissioned as sheriff, "shall be continued in office for one year after his qualification, and may, with his own consent and the approbation of the executive, be continued for two years," &c. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 6, p. 277. The contract recited in the condition of the bond in this case, pursued, substantially, the language of the statute: whereas W. B. Jacobs hath been commissioned as sheriff of and for the county of Nelson, and the above bound J. T. Hill hath undertaken the duties of the said office, for and during the time the said Jacobs may continue in office;" not during the term of the office for which Jacobs then held a commission, but, in the language of the statute, during the time he might continue in office; that is, the whole time for which he might lawfully be continued in office; namely, two years, and until a successor should be appointed.

Johnson, for the appellees, said, that the principle was settled by the case of The Commonwealth v. Fairfax, that the office of sheriff was an annual office: and considering that the condition of the bond in this case recited that Jacobs had been commissioned sheriff of Nelson (that is, for a single year only) and that Hill had undertaken the duties of the said office (referring to the office of shrievalty for that year) for and during the time the said Jacobs may continue in office; these last words must be understood as importing Jacobs's continuance in the office he then held, namely the shrievalty for that year. He might have died, or resigned, or been ousted of the office, during the year; and a determination of the annual office of the sheriff within the year, would have determined the deputation of it to Hill; so that the deputation of the office to Hill, for and during the time Jacobs might continue in it, might just as properly be applied to his continuance in the annual office he then held, as to the shrievalty for the succeeding year for which he might subsequently receive a commission. In the language of the court in Munford v. Rice, "it is not natural to give to the general expressions" in the bond of this deputy sheriff, "an extension beyond the term for which his principal himself held his office."

But the judgment of the county court was plainly erroneous, in other respects. 1st, The only evidence adduced of Hill's default, was the judgment which Jacobs confessed to the clerk with the assent of Hill, which is not evidence of Hill's default, as against his sureties. Munford v. Overseers of the poor &c., 2 Rand. 313. 2dly, The judgment *was rendered, not only for the principal, damages and costs, recovered by the clerk of Jacobs, but for interest on the aggregate amount; but the statute which gave this summary remedy by motion, authorised judgment against the deputy and his sureties for the amount recovered of the sheriff for the deputy's default, but not for interest upon it. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 33, p. 283. 3dly, The statute gave the motion against the deputy and his sureties, their heirs, executors or administrators, jointly or severally: but the motion here was neither joint nor several: it was a motion against the deputy and seven of his sureties, omitting the representatives of the eighth who was dead.

Leigh acknowledged that the statute did not in express words, authorise the judgment for interest; the interest, however, might, perhaps, be justly considered an incident to the principal. As to the other objections taken by Johnson, he said, the case of Munford v. Overseers of the poor &c. only settled that a judgment against the principal by default, was not conclusive evidence against the sureties, not that it was inadmissible. The judgment in the present case, against the sheriff, upon his confession made with the assent of the deputy, was admissible evidence of the deputy's default against his sureties: they might have controverted the fact of the default; but they did not. The representatives of the deceased surety neither ought nor could regularly be included in the same motion with the living obligors.

CARR, J., delivered the opinion of the court. He reviewed the cases of The Commonwealth v. Fairfax, Royster v. Leake and Munford v. Rice, and then said: From these cases we may deduce two conclusions. 1. That the office of the sheriff being an annual one, he must give an annual bond. 2. That the contract of the sheriff and his deputy being a private affair, not regulated as to its continuance by law, may be either for one or two years. The case before us arises on a bond executed by a deputy and his sureties; and the question is, Whether the parties intended

398 *to be bound only for one year, or for two? The statute concerning sheriffs enacts, "that every person hereafter commissioned and qualified as aforesaid, shall be continued in office for one year after his qualification, and may, with his own consent and the approbation of the executive, be continued for two years" &c. The bond here recites, that "whereas Jacobs has been commissioned as sheriff &c. and the said Hill hath undertaken the duties, of the said office, for and during the time the said Jacobs may continue in office" &c. From the similarity (almost identity) of expression in the law and the bond, it seems to me highly probable, that the parties meant to be bound for the whole period during which the sheriff might under the law hold the office. The law says, the sheriff shall be continued in office for one year, and may be continued for two years: the bond says, the deputy has undertaken the office, for and during the time the sheriff may continue in office. If the words of the bond had been may be continued in office, they would have been the same used in the statute; and we must have concluded, that by adopting the very words of the statute, which was probably before the parties, they meant to be bound for the same period, during which, under those words, the sheriff might hold the office; namely, two years. But what is the difference in meaning, between the words may be continued in office, and may continue in office? The parties knew the law; knew, that the sheriff must continue in office for the first year, but that for the second year, his own consent and the approbation of the executive were necessary. When they say, then, we agree to be bound, as long as the sheriff may continue in office, do not they mean exactly the same, as if they had said, we will be bound as long as the sheriff may be continued in office? He could not continue in office, unless he was continued in office. So far as his own consent operated, he might be said (using the verb actively) to continue in office: so far as the approbation of the executive operated, he might be said, by that approbation, to be continued in office: but he could not continue in 399 office *without a concurrence of both these. The two phrases then, as applied to the continuance of the sheriff in office, mean precisely the same thing; and

I conclude, that by using this language, the obligors meant to be bound for the whole time that the law would permit the sheriff to continue, or to be continued, in the office. This conclusion may be fortified by another view of the subject. The bond here, recites that the deputy had undertaken the duties of the office of sheriff, which seems as if he had taken the whole office. The history of the country informs us, that nothing is more common than for a sheriff, so soon as he is appointed, to form out his office for the two years to a deputy; and this court has sanctioned the custom. It seems very probable, from the recital in the bond, that this is a transaction of that kind; and so, the bond of the deputy would of course be given for the two years.

It was also objected by the counsel for the appellee, that the judgment of the county court against the sureties of the deputy was wrong, because the judgment recovered by the clerk against the sheriff, being by confession, did not bind the deputy's sureties, and there was no other evidence of the deputy's default. But the record tells us, that it was a motion against the sheriff, for judgment for the amount of the clerk's tickets for fees, put into the hands of his deputy Hill, during the second year of the shrievalty, and that upon this motion, Hill, the deputy, assented in open court, to the confession of judgment by the sheriff; in other words, confessed that he had received the clerk's tickets, and had not accounted for them: this, we think, was ample evidence of the fact, and charged his sureties, unless disproved by them.

It was farther objected, that one of the sureties being dead, this motion could not be made against the survivors; for it must be a joint motion against all, or a several motion against one; and this was neither. This objection is considered unsound. At common law, the principle is perfectly settled, that by the death of one or more 400 of the obligors, *the obligation is not discharged, but survives against those who remain, and an action lies against them as surviving obligors. So, on the joint and several bond given here by the deputy and his sureties; the statute gives a motion against them, their heirs, executors and administrators, jointly and severally; and one of the obligors dying, the motion lies against the survivors jointly, or any one of them severally. It would be strange indeed, if it were otherwise; for then, in proportion to the number of sureties, added for the safety and protection of the sheriff, would be the chance of his losing by the death of some one of them, the remedy given him by the statute; and this loss produced by the act of God, which the maxim tells us shall injure no one. But we have authority also against this. In Shelton v. Ward, 1 Call, 538, the motion was against the sureties of a deceased deputy sheriff. And in Royster v. Leake, the motion was against Royster and others, sureties of Vaughan, deputy for Payne; and Mr. Wickham took the very objection, that the law gave either a joint or a several motion, but that was neither: yet the court affirmed the judgment.

It was also objected that the judgment was erroneous in giving interest on the aggregate of principal, damages and costs, which had been recovered against the sheriff for the default of the deputy. It seems to me just, that such interest should be awarded, and I had thought there was a positive law giving it; but I have not been able to find it; and, as the section of the statute under which this motion was made, says nothing about interest, and acts giving summary remedies are construed strictly, the judgment of the county court, so far as it gives interest, must be pronounced erroneous.

The judgments both of the circuit and county courts, must be reversed, and judgment entered here, for the aggregate amount of the principal, damages and costs, recovered of the sheriff for his deputy's default.

Chancery Practice—Improper Parties Plaintiffs—Effect of Objection in Appellate Court.—If one person to whom alone the right asserted in a bill in chancery appertains, and other persons who have no right, join in the bill, and the cause be proceeded in to a decree in the court of chancery, without any objection there to the joining of improper parties plaintiffs in the bill: upon appeals from the decree to this court, the objection will have only this effect here, that the court will consider the right as vested in the plaintiff entitled thereto, and affected by his acts or omission.

Depositions—Irregularities—Objection in Appellate Court.—If irregularities occur in awarding a commission to take a deposition in chancery, and in taking the deposition and the deposition be read at the hearing in the court of chancery without any exception taken there; upon appeal to this court, objections taken here to the deposition, for such irregularities, cannot avail to exclude the evidence.

slaves under a mortgage thereof to him by his co-defendant A., there is a decree for the slaves and profits, against both defendants: B. alone appeals from the decree: the court, holding that the plaintiffs had no right, considered the whole cause before it, upon B.'s appeal, and dismissed the bill as to A. as well as B.

This was a suit originally brought in the county court of Bedford, in chancery, by the appellees, Smithson Davis, Susan Davis, and Josiah Harrison, administrator of his deceased wife Rachel Davis, against Thomas Stewart and Tirzah his wife administratrix of her first husband Richard Davis deceased, and the appellant William Dickerson. Richard Davis died, intestate, in the year 1784, when slaves were real property; and the plaintiff, Smithson, claimed as his heir at law, and the other plaintiffs as his distributees, a slave named

Lucy, and her increase now numerous, three *of which were then in the possession of the defendant Dickenson, who claimed the same under a mortgage and purchase from his co-defendant Thomas Stewart, and the rest were in the possession of Stewart, though they also were under mortgage to Dickenson. The object of the bill was, to recover of the defendant Dickenson, such of the slaves as he held in possession, and the profits thereof since they had come to his possession, and of the defendants Stewart and wife, such of the slaves as Stewart yet held, and the profits which he had taken and enjoyed.

It was agreed by all parties, that the slave Lucy in question, was originally a part of the estate of William Morrison, who died as early as the year 1761; and that he, by his will (according to the construction put upon it, acquiesced in and conformed with all parties concerned, though that construction seemed somewhat questionable) devised and bequeathed all his slaves and moveables to his wife for life, with a power to her, with the concurrence of his executors, to appoint the same to and among his children. And the plaintiffs alleged, that Mrs. Morrison, with the concurrence of the executors, made an appointment of the slave Lucy, to the testator's daughter Tirzah, then the wife of their father Richard Davis, and delivered her to him, and that he held the possession of her till his death, and that, therefore, she and her increase appertained to his estate. On the other hand, the defendants alleged, that though Mrs. Morrison, the tenant for life, had made a verbal loan of the slave Lucy to Davis during his life, and he had held possession of her under that loan, yet in fact, no appointment was made by Mrs. Morrison during Davis's lifetime; that after his death, he reclaimed this slave which she had lent him; that, in 1796, after her daughter Mrs. Davis had married her second husband Stewart, Mrs. Morrison and James Higginbotham, the surviving executor of her husband, united in a general deed of appointment of that testator's slaves among his children, and thereby, for the first time, appointed the slave Lucy and her increase to Mrs. Stewart, and delivered *the property to her husband: that thus, these slaves were the property of Stewart. But the defendant Dickenson also alleged, that Stewart having applied to him for a loan of money, and having offered him a mortgage of the slaves in question as a security, he determined to be assured of Stewart's title before he would advance his money upon that security, and applied to the plaintiff Smithson Davis, to know whether he had any claim to the slaves (explaining to him his reason for the inquiry) and was told by Davis that he had none; upon which he lent his money to Stewart, and took the mortgage: and he insisted, that this assurance of Smithson Davis, that he had no claim to the slaves in question, upon the faith of which he had advanced his money upon a mortgage of the slaves, precluded the plaintiffs, in equity, from now asserting a claim to the property against him.

Upon the question of fact, when and how Mrs. Morrison and the executor of her husband had in truth made the appointment of the slave Lucy to her daughter Tirzah, whether by verbal appointment and delivery of the property, during the lifetime of her first husband Davis, or not till after his death and after her marriage with her second husband Stewart, and then by the general deed of appointment of 1796 under which Stewart claimed, and which was exhibited in the cause, there was much parol evidence. But the principal evidence on which the plaintiffs relied, to prove that the appointment was made during Davis's lifetime, and the slave delivered to him accordingly, was the deposition of James Higginbotham, the executor of William Morrison, who was required by the will of that testator, to concur with his widow in the appointment of the subject to and among his children. This deposition was taken before the defendants had put in their answers to the bill, under an order of the county court, made on the motion of the plaintiffs, giving them leave to take it, not de bene esse, but in chief: no affidavit appeared in the record to found the order on: it was subscribed by the deponent, but there was not, in the record, any certificate of the magistrates, that he was sworn to it: *and the deponent, though a man of unquestionable integrity and veracity, was eighty years old, and this deposition was written for him by the plaintiffs' attorney, and the part of it most material for them, had been so written before the magistrates attended, and in the absence of the defendants' agent, though he attended before it was completed, and cross examined the deponent. But the deposition was read at the hearing, in the court of chancery, without any exception.

As to the alleged disclaimer of Smithson Davis of any right to the slaves in question, made to Dickenson before he lent his money to Stewart upon a mortgage of this property, the proof was as follows: a witness deposed, that Smithson Davis, in conversation with him, sometime after the commencement of this suit, said, that he had made some efforts to compromise the suit, as it was a hard case on both sides: that Dickenson had applied to him to know whether he had any claim to the slaves in dispute, before Dickenson's advances to

Stewart were considerable, and he informed Dickenson he understood he had no title to the slaves; and he then supposed he had none. And it appeared, that at the time of this disclaimer of right by Smithson Davis, he was about twenty-five years of age; and there were circumstances in proof, from which it might fairly be inferred, that he was also, most probably, well apprised of all the facts upon which he afterwards set up his present claim.

The cause, after having been many years pending in the county court, was removed by consent to the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg. The chancellor was of opinion, upon the proofs in the cause, that the slave Lucy had been duly appointed to the defendant Tirzah in the lifetime of her first husband Richard Davis, and delivered to him accordingly, and that, consequently, that slave and her increase appertained to Davis's estate. And he made an interlocutory decree whereby he appointed commissioners to assign one third of the whole number of the slaves to Stewart and wife for her dower, to be held by Stewart for his wife's life, with reversion to the 405 *plaintiffs: and as to the other two thirds, when ascertained by the assignment of Mrs. Stewart's dower, he decreed that Dickenson should deliver such of them as he held in possession to the plaintiffs, and render an account of the profits thereof since they came to his possession; and that Stewart should deliver to the plaintiffs such of them as he held, and render an account of the profits of the subject accrued and received by him since his marriage with the widow and administratrix of Davis.

In pursuance of this decree, the dower slaves of Mrs. Stewart were assigned to Stewart and wife, and a report thereof was made to the court; and an account was taken, and reported, of the profits of the slaves held by Dickenson, with which, upon the principles of the decree, he was chargeable; the amount of which was 681 dollars; but there was no account taken of the profits with which Stewart was chargeable. Upon the reports coming in, the chancellor made a peremptory decree, that Stewart and Dickenson should forthwith deliver to the plaintiffs all the slaves in controversy (except the dower slaves) by them respectively held, and that Dickenson should pay the plaintiffs the 681 dollars, reported to be due from him for profits.

Dickenson alone appealed from the decree.

1. Wickham, for the appellant, objected, that if the appellees had right at all, their bill was framed upon a misconception of the right. If the slaves appertained to the estate of Richard Davis, they were, as the law stood at the time of his death, real estate, which descended to Smithson Davis, his eldest son and heir at law; and, though he was bound to give his sisters a distributive share of the value, he alone was entitled to the subject itself, and he alone could maintain a suit for it.

Johnson, for the appellees, answered, that the sisters being entitled as distributees of their father, to distributive shares of the value of his slaves, were in-406 terested in the recovery *of the slaves themselves, and, therefore, were proper parties to the suit. But, whether they were proper parties or not, the objection could not avail here: this court could correct the details of the decree, and adjudge the whole subject to the heir at law.

2. Wickham said, that the deposition of James Higginbotham, on which the appellees mainly relied to prove their case, could not be considered by this court as evidence at all: that, as the law stood at the time the county court gave leave to take it, the court, in the then state of the case, before answer filed, could only have given a commission to take the deposition de bene esse, and that upon proper affidavit, shewing grounds for awarding such a commission: that the deposition of this aged witness, whose memory must have been impaired, having been written for him beforehand, by the attorney of the plaintiffs, was rather the deposition of the attorney than of the witness: and that there being no certificate that the witness was sworn to it, it was not, in truth, a deposition.

Johnson answered, that the evidence had been read at the hearing, without exception. If it had been timely excepted to, the deposition might have been taken over again, or the objections removed by proof. Objections of this kind to evidence read in the court below; all objections, indeed, founded on irregularity in taking depositions in chancery, not taken there by exception, come too late in the appellate court, and if allowed here would have the worst effects of a surprise on the parties who adduced them.

3. Wickham insisted, that supposing Higginbotham's deposition could be properly considered as evidence, yet viewing that deposition in connexion with the other proofs in the cause, not only had the appellees failed to prove their case, but it was disproved, and the contrary case established, by the evidence. This was an un-mixed question of fact, which was discussed with much earnestness on both sides.

4. Wickham contended, that the disclaimer of title to the subject, by Smithson Davis, who as the heir at law of 407 *his father had the whole right to it, if it pertained to his father's estate, made to Dickenson, before he made advances to Stewart, and trusted to a mortgage of this subject for his security; and made too, with full knowledge of Dickenson's motive for inquiring into Stewart's title and Davis's claim; precluded Davis in equity, from asserting against Dickenson, the claim or pretension now set up.

Johnson said, that the only ground on which Davis's disclaimer of right could preclude him from afterwards asserting his just claim, was that the disclaimer was fraudulent; that with full knowledge of his right, he disclaimed it, and thus betrayed Dickenson into an advance of money to his father-in-law upon a bad security. Now, he said, the proof that Davis did disclaim his right, was Davis's own admission that he had done so, accompanied with a declaration, in the same breath, that at the time of the disclaimer, he was ignorant of his right to the subject.

CARR, J. It is objected by the appellant's counsel, that the plaintiffs were improperly joined in the bill; for, supposing the slaves to have been the property of Richard Davis, Smithson, his son and heir, would, according to the law of that day have succeeded to them alone; the other children having nothing more than a claim on him for their distributive portions of the appraised value. That this is a correct statement of the law, is certain; and I will not say what might have been the effect of this objection, if properly pleaded: but in the present situation and stage of the cause, I think it can have no other effect than this, that the court will consider the right, if there be any, as vested in Smithson, and bound by his acts or omissions. It was also objected that the deposition of James Higginbotham could not be read, there being no proper order of court for taking it, and no certificate of magistrates that it was sworn to, and it being altogether written by the attorney for the plaintiffs, before the arrival of the justices, or any person representing the defendants. If these objections had been taken in the

408 *court below, by exception, they would unquestionably have been fatal, unless the plaintiffs could have removed them by evidence. But as it is, I do not think the first two can be looked into here. The facts, that the deposition was written by the plaintiffs' attorney, and the parts of it most material for his clients, before the arrival of the magistrates, or of the opposite parties or their agent, do appear on the record; and though it would be too harsh, at this late stage of the controversy, when the witness is probably dead, to exclude the deposition, yet, I think, these circumstances cannot but materially affect its credit. And taking this deposition with its credit thus impaired, and comparing it with the other proofs in the cause, the clear deduction from the whole is, that if Richard Davis was (and it appears he was) in possession of this slave during his lifetime, he held that possession under a loan from his mother-in-law, Mrs. Morrison; and that the slave Lucy was for the first time appointed to her daughter Tirzah, by the general deed appointing the slaves of the testator William Morrison to his children, executed in pursuance of his will, by Mrs. Morrison and his surviving executor, in 1796, when the appointee Tirzah was the wife of Stewart, to whom accordingly the property was delivered; and, therefore, the slave Lucy and her increase do not pertain to Davis's estate, but belonged to Stewart. [Here the judge entered into a critical examination of the evidence.] And if this question of fact were more doubtful than I think it is, there is yet a consideration, which would repel the claim of the appellee Smithson Davis (to whom alone, if the property belonged to his father's estate, the right descended) so far as he seeks to disturb the mortgage to Dickenson. It is in proof, that when Dickenson was solicited to make advances to Stewart, and take a mortgage of these slaves for his security, he took the precaution, before he would venture, to apply to Smithson Davis, and to ask him whether he had any claim to the property, telling him his reason for making the inquiry; and Davis answered, that he understood 409 he had none. He stood *by, then, and saw Dickenson's advances made to Stewart, and the mortgage taken; and then brought suit. He said, indeed, in relating the fact of this disclaimer, that at the time he so informed Dickenson, he supposed he had no title. But he did not pretend that he was then ignorant of the facts upon which the claim he now sets up rested; and there are circumstances in proof [the judge stated and examined them] which evince, that he was, most probably, fully apprised of them. He could not be allowed to disturb a security which he himself induced Dickenson to accept and trust to: his rights, if he had any, would be postponed to those of Dickenson: this is a settled point; Stewart v. Luddington, 1 Rand. 407, and the cases there cited, and Lang v. Lee, 3 Id. 410. This, however, is a secondary consideration: the ground on which this court decides the cause, is, that the slaves in question were never the property of Davis, the father, and consequently, the appellees have no title.

The other judges concurred in this opinion, and directed a decree to be entered, reversing the chancellor's decree, and dismissing the bill.

Johnson asked, whether the court intended to reverse, or could regularly reverse so much of the decree as affected Stewart and wife, who had not appealed from it? He referred to Tate v. Liggit &c., ante, 84, 108.

Wickham said, the decree against Stewart and wife affected the rights of the appellant Dickenson: for he was the mortgagee of the slaves held by Stewart, as well as mortgagee and vendee of those held by himself.

BROOKE, P. The court considers the whole cause before it, upon Dickenson's appeal.

prived of the opportunity of defending himself at law, upon the plea of non est factum: HELD, that, in giving notice on a forthcoming bond, the sheriff acts as agent of the creditor, who is not entitled to benefit by any fraud he commits in relation thereto; and that, in the present case, the surety was entitled to relief in equity, upon the ground of surprise, but only on terms, that he himself shall do equity; that is, that he shall pay the amount for which he really intended to bind himself as surety.

In a suit of Gordon against Jeffery, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, the case alleged in the bill, and, in the opinion of this court, proved by the evidence, was thus:

Five writs of fieri facias were sued out of the court of Orange, against Robert Mallory, upon judgments of that court; one by Buck, amounting, principal, interest, costs and sheriff's commissions to 250 dollars; one by Lightfoot, amounting to 238 dollars; one by Bradley, amounting to 98 dollars; one by Burgess, amounting to 828 dollars; and the other by the appellee Jeffery, amounting to 651 dollars: in the aggregate 2065 dollars. These executions were all delivered to Holloway a deputy sheriff of 411 Orange, and were *in his hands at the same time. The executions were not actually levied: but Mallory applied to Gordon, to join him as his surety in forthcoming bonds for the delivery, at the time and place of sale, of property specified by Mallory, or to be specified in the forthcoming bonds, as having been taken in execution under the five writs of fieri facias; and to induce Gordon to incur this responsibility, Mallory represented to him, in the presence of Holloway, the deputy sheriff, that the whole amount of the five executions was only two or three hundred dollars; and Holloway, though he must have known the truth, did not gainsay this erroneous representation. Misled by this information of the small amount of the debts, Gordon consented to become the surety; and Mallory and Gordon signed and sealed five blank forthcoming bonds; blank, probably, in all particulars; blank, certainly, as to the names of the creditors, the name of the deputy sheriff who had charge of the executions, and the amounts thereof respectively: and they delivered these forthcoming bonds, or rather forms of bonds, so signed and sealed by them, to Holloway. The blanks in the bonds were afterwards filled up, partly by Holloway, and partly by his clerk by his directions: Holloway himself inserted the description of the property in the conditions of the bonds, there stated to be the property of Mallory which he had taken in execution, though it appeared, that, in fact, Mallory had not at the time any such property: the other blanks were filled up by the clerk. Motions were made in the county court for award of executions on these forthcoming bonds, and due notice of the motions being proved by Holloway, executions were awarded. The motions were made at the short morning session of the monthly court in April, the day of the election, in the absence of Gordon's counsel: and it appeared most probable, that no notice of the motions had been given to Gordon; but, on the contrary, Holloway had, at the preceding March term, informed Gordon's counsel, that he had not given, or that he would not give, notice upon the forthcoming bonds, to the next court; that 412 he supposed *the attorney for the creditors would not move against him, the sheriff, and he should give Mallory time to get in his crop of wheat. The county court, at the May term after the award of executions on the forthcoming bonds, upon the motion of Gordon, and upon proof of the material facts of the transaction above stated, being satisfied, that the forthcoming bond taken to Jeffery was fraudulently obtained from him, and having been in blank when signed and sealed by him, and that the award of execution thereupon had been obtained by surprise, and that the proceedings and return upon the fieri facias on which the bond was taken, were wholly irregular, quashed the forthcoming bond taken to Jeffery, and the writ of fieri facias upon which it had been taken. But to this order, the circuit court, at the instance of Jeffery, allowed a supersedeas, and eventually reversed the order.

Gordon, then, exhibited this bill against Jeffery, setting forth all the facts of the case; alleging that this forthcoming bond to Jeffery, as well as the other four forthcoming bonds, had been obtained from him by the misrepresentation, as to the amount of the debts, made by Mallory in the presence of the deputy sheriff, and not contradicted by him; that this bond (as well as the other four) having been blank in the most material particulars, when signed and sealed by him, and the blanks afterwards filled up by the deputy sheriff, was not his deed; and that no notice having been given him of the motion for award of execution on the bond, but on the contrary his counsel having been informed by Holloway, that notice had not been or would not be given on the bond, he was prevented from making his defence at law, and the award of execution was obtained by surprise: and, therefore, praying an injunction to further proceedings on Jeffery's execution on the forthcoming bond.

The chancellor awarded the injunction, according to the prayer of the bill: but, upon the hearing, he dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill with costs.

Gordon appealed to this court.

413 *Stanard, for the appellant, insisted that the five forthcoming bonds, and this taken to Jeffery, among the rest, were obtained from Gordon by a misrepresentation as to the amount of the debts, which having been made in the sheriff's presence and not corrected by him, he was a party to it, and so the bonds were fraudulently obtained from Gordon; and that independently of the fraud, the facts alleged and proved would have fully sustained the plea of non est factum at law; and that Gordon having been prevented from making that defence upon the motion for award of execution upon the bonds; having been indeed lulled into security by the declaration of the sheriff that he had not given, or would not give, a notice upon the bonds, to the court, at which motions were afterwards made and execution awarded, the award of execution was obtained by gross fraud and by surprise: that, therefore, the injunction ought to be perpetuated as to the whole debt. He cited King and Porterfield v. Smith et al., ante, p. 157.

BROOKE, P., delivered the opinion of the court. This case differs materially from those of King and Porterfield v. Smith. There, King executed the forthcoming bond, and delivered it to the sheriff, as an escrow, on the express condition, that another surety, the father of the debtor, should also execute it, in the confidence, probably, that if the father executed it, he would see that the son discharged it. The chancellor thought, that it was doubtful, whether the bond was executed and delivered as an escrow, and directed an issue to try that question; but, at the same time, dissolved the injunction, as to so much as the plaintiff would have been bound to pay, if the bond had been executed by the father as surety, according to the condition on which it was delivered, and the sureties made liable to pay the debt, the principal being insolvent. This court concurred with the chancellor, as to the propriety of the issue, but held, that the plaintiff was bound for the whole of the debt, or for no part of it; if the bond was his, for the whole; if not, for none; because in no case, had he agreed to make himself liable for any part, unless 414 the bond was executed *according to the condition on which it was delivered. The case before us is wholly different. Gordon intended to be bound for the debts due from Mallory, especially for that due Jeffery (as he admits); and to that end, signed the blank bonds, and delivered them to the sheriff, to be filled up according to the executions: his only ground of complaint in equity, is, that he was grossly deceived as to the amount of the executions, by the false representations of the debtor Mallory, made in the presence of the sheriff, who did not undeceive him. If that representation had been true, the circumstance, that he might have defended himself at law, on the plea of non est factum, but for the surprise practised on him by the sheriff, would not have entitled him to relief in equity; which, though it will not charge a surety farther than he is chargeable at law, will not relieve him, or any other party, against a judgment, however obtained, when such relief would be against conscience. For, if the surety intended to be bound when he signed the blank bond, to the full amount of the debt, the judgment would only have the effect of enforcing his deliberate contract; and to discharge him from it, would be against conscience. If Gordon had intended, when he signed the blank bond, to avail himself of that defence at law, he would have been practising a fraud both on the creditor and the sheriff. The circumstance, therefore, that he had an essential defence at law, of which he was deprived by the fraud of the sheriff, is of no importance, except that it gives jurisdiction to the court of equity to relieve him against the judgment, if, upon the other circumstances of the case, he is entitled to relief. Both parties are seeking to avoid a loss. Gordon, to relieve himself from the payment of the debt of another, for which he has received no consideration; Jeffery to recover a just debt by due course of law. If both parties are blameless, a court of equity will not interfere. On Gordon's part, he in the first instance, was grossly negligent, in trusting the sheriff as he did, and enabling him to do the mischief, which must now fall on one of the parties. In conducting the executions, and taking the forthcoming bonds, the sheriff *was, in no sense, the agent of Jeffery, but an officer of the law, to whom he was under a legal necessity of confiding that duty: therefore, he is not at all affected by his fraud in that respect. And, if there was nothing more in the case, no relief could be given to Gordon; it being a principle frequently acted on, in courts of law, that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, he who has trusted most must bear the loss. The sheriff was, however, the agent of Jeffery, in respect to the notice of the forthcoming bond. It was not his official duty to give the notice. The law gives the right to the creditor to whom the bond is made payable, to have an award of execution on his motion only. He is, therefore, responsible for the fraud of the sheriff, his agent in this respect; or, at least, cannot be entitled to benefit by it, though he was not privy to it, nor had the least participation in it. He stands, then, on different ground from that he would have occupied, if due notice had been given, and the award of execution had been made without opposition, through some accident not affecting him; such as the absence of counsel, or the like. Yet it does not seem equitable that this fraud of his agent, which does not touch his conscience, should have the effect to discharge Gordon from all responsibility; since he too has been in fault, and since he certainly intended to be bound by all the bonds that he signed, to the extent of 300 dollars. For, a court of equity will not relieve even against a judgment obtained by the fraud of the creditor, but on the terms, that the defendant at law shall pay what is justly due; upon the settled principle, that he who asks equity must do equity. I think, therefore, that the injunction ought to have been dissolved, only for a sum equal to the proportion of 300 dollars, which would fall to Jeffery, in a rateable distribution thereof among all the creditor of Mallory, to whom Gordon intended, when he signed the blank bonds, to become bound to that extent. The decree, therefore, is reversed, the injunction reinstated, and the cause remanded, to be further proceeded in, according to the principles here declared.

General Deed of Assignment—Rights of Lien Creditor Therein.—A. mortgages lands to B. to secure a

Deeds—Recordation—Effect as Notice.—Our law, unquestionably in its present state, avoids deeds and debt due to him; and then, by a general deed of trust, conveys the equity of redemption of the same lands, together with sundry personal property, to a trustee, to raise a fund to pay all his debts, including debts due B. other than that specifically secured by the mortgage: HELD. B. is entitled to receive the whole of the debt specifically secured to him by the mortgage, out of the proceeds of the mortgaged lands, and then to come in for distribution of the fund in the hands of the trustee under the general deed of trust, for satisfaction of the other debts due him, pro rata with the other creditors.

Upon a bill exhibited by Hammond and others, creditors of Beckwith, against Beckwith, and Bell, the appellant, and others, in the superior court of chancery of Winchester, the case was thus:

Beckwith, by deed, dated the 9th October 1815, and duly recorded the same day, conveyed two tracts of land to Powell, in trust, to secure a debt to Bell of 3500 dollars, with interest from the date.

By an agreement under seal, indorsed on the deed, dated the 3d June 1816, and duly recorded the same day, Beckwith agreed, that a further debt of 250 dollars, due by him to Bell, should be charged on the trust subject, and that the trustee might sell the same for the satisfaction of this debt also.

Then, by deed dated the 6th March 1817, and duly recorded on the 8th of the same month, Beckwith conveyed the same lands with sundry slaves and other personal estate, to Hite, upon trust, to sell the same, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of all the debts at that time due from Beckwith; and, secondly, that Hite should be and was thereby authorised to indemnify Bell, for any moneys which he might advance to Hite for the use of Beckwith, or which Bell might pay in satisfaction of outstanding legal obligations of Beckwith, in the hands of others, and that Bell as to all moneys then due him, should be entitled to equal justice with any other creditor, for payment out of the trust subject thereby conveyed.

417 *Afterwards, by a second agreement under seal, also indorsed on the first mentioned deed of trust of Beckwith to Powell, dated the 13th April 1817, and duly recorded the next day, Beckwith agreed, that the further sum of 1850 dollars advanced by Bell for him, and also the sum of 900 dollars for which Bell yet stood bound as surety for Beckwith, should be charged on the trust subject by that deed mortgaged, and that the trustee Powell might sell the same for the satisfaction and indemnity of Bell as to these sums also.

And, finally, by another instrument under seal, also indorsed on the first mentioned deed of trust to Powell, dated the 21st April 1817, Hite, the trustee in the second deed of trust above mentioned, reciting, that Bell had been compelled to pay 2750 dollars as surety to Beckwith, and that Beckwith had agreed to extend the lien of the first deed of trust to Powell, so as to secure this additional sum due to Bell, declared his willingness, that the lien of the first deed of trust should be extended so as to secure that additional sum to Bell, notwithstanding the second deed of trust conveying the same subject to him, Hite, in trust &c.

It appeared, that this sum of 2750 dollars was advanced by Bell as surety for Beckwith, upon engagements incurred before the execution of the general deed of trust to Hite, of the 6th March 1817.

The lands mortgaged by both the deeds of trust, having been sold, and the proceeds being more than enough to satisfy the debt of 3500 dollars secured to Bell by the first deed of trust of October 1815, and the 250 dollars, secured to him by the first agreement indorsed on that deed, of June 1816, with interest on both sums, and there being a surplus arising from the lands, and other funds arising out of the other trust subject conveyed to Hite, by the general deed of trust of the 6th March 1817, but the fund being insufficient to satisfy all the creditors, the question arose, Whether Bell, claiming to come into partition of this fund with the other creditors of Beckwith, 418 for satisfaction of his claims *against him for advances made after the execution of the general deed of trust to Hite, was entitled to receive out of the proceeds of the mortgaged lands, the full amount of the debts specifically secured to him, by the deed of trust of the 9th October 1815, and the agreement indorsed thereon of the 3d June 1816, and then to come, pari passu with the other creditors, in respect to the residue of his claims, into distribution of the residue of the fund?

The chancellor was of opinion, that he was not, and decreed accordingly; and Bell appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Stanard for the appellant, and Nicholas for the appellees, upon the single point above stated.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The counsel for the appellant very properly waved any claim to priority over the other creditors, in respect to the additional sums advanced by him to and for Beckwith, after the execution of the general deed of trust to Hite. And the counsel for the appellees, with equal propriety, waved any objection to the appellant's priority, as to the 250 dollars advanced by him, and agreed to be charged on the mortgaged lands, by the indorsement on the deed of trust to Powell for his peculiar security, before the general deed of trust to Hite was executed.

The appellant was entitled to receive out of the proceeds of the mortgaged lands, the full amount of the debt originally secured to him by the deed of trust to Powell of the 9th October 1815, and the additional sum of 250 dollars charged upon the lands, by the indorsement on that deed, of the 3d June 1816, for which those instruments gave him a specific lien; and then to come, pari passu with the other creditors, in respect to the residue of his claims, into distribution of the residue of the fund. In the case of Heams v. Bance, 3 Atk. 630, lord Hardwicke held, that a mortgagee who had lent a further sum to the mortgagor on conveyances, if unregistered, to the prejudice of subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith: and when duly registered, makes them effectual as notice to all the world. But the notice is of the contents of the instrument, and of nothing more; not of any secret condition, or trust, or equity, between the parties. McClanachan v. Siter, 2 Gratt. 300, citing, among others, the principal case: Davison v. Waite, 2 Munf. 527; Colquhoun v. Atkinsons, 6 Munf. 550. To the same effect the principal case was cited in Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 150.

419 a trust by will for the payment *of debts, could not tack the bond, but as to that must come in pro rata with the other creditors, upon the equitable fund; and in an anonymous case, 2 Ves. sen. 662, that, in a similar case, when the debtor had conveyed the mortgaged property in trust for other creditors, the mortgagee as to the amount of his mortgage and two judgments which he was entitled to tack, had a priority over the creditors under the deed of trust; but that the bond was only a charge upon the general assets of the debtor who was dead.

The decree is, therefore, to be reversed, and a decree entered according to the principle here declared.

Taylor and Wife v. Browne and Others.

November, 1830.

Will.—Disposition of Property Settled upon Wife.—B. makes a deed of settlement of property upon his wife, and then by will makes a disposition of the property, different from that made by the deed of settlement, and far less beneficial to the wife, and dies; the wife takes administration with the will annexed:

Same—Same—Right of Widow.—HELI, 1. the widow may claim under the deed of settlement, without having renounced the provision made for her by the will according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 24.

Same—Same—Election.*—And, 2. the widow taking administration with the will annexed, is not an election by her to take under the will and not to claim under the deed of settlement.

William Browne deceased, by deed executed in his lifetime, dated the 9th January 1812, and duly recorded in the hustings court of Richmond the 13th July following, in consideration of natural love and affection for his wife, Mary Browne, conveyed to William Nettles, trustee, ten slaves, sundry articles of furniture, and some stock of horses, cows &c. in trust for the sole and separate use of Mary his wife for life, free and exempt from the control of her then husband the donor, or any future husband, with power to the wife to dispose of the subject by will or deed to such persons as she should think proper.

420 *William Browne, died sometime in November 1816, having made a will in the month of October preceding; whereby he devised his lands to his wife during her life or widowhood, remainder, after her death or marriage, to his brother Thomas Browne and his heirs: and he disposed of the property settled on his wife by the deed of January 1812; bequeathing four of the slaves therein mentioned, to her in absolute property; and the residue of the slaves, together with all his personal property, to her during her life or widowhood, and in case she should marry, then that this part of the subject should be sold, and that three female slaves, from six to twelve years old, should be purchased out of the proceeds, one for Eliz. Marston, one for Eliz. Durfey, and one for Eliz. Nettles, and that the residue of the proceeds should be equally divided between Thomas Browne, Caroline Radcliffe, and Susan Smith; but in case his wife should die his widow, she should have the free disposal of all the personal estate bequeathed to her during life or widowhood, at her own discretion; and he expressed his hope and belief, that if she should die his widow, she would comply with his wishes in the disposal of the said property as above mentioned.

The will was proved in the hustings court of Richmond; and the executors named in the will (of whom the widow was one) having renounced the executorship, administration with the will annexed was granted to the widow.

Mrs. Browne, the widow, married Henley Taylor, in August 1817; and, on the 25th of that month, she executed a deed, whereby she disclaimed the provision made for her by her first husband's will, and relinquished all benefit or claim under it. And on the 20th October following, her husband Henley Taylor and she joined in a deed of renunciation to the same effect. Both these instruments were duly recorded in the hustings court of Richmond, within the year after the death of the testator William Browne.

Thomas Browne and the other legatees in remainder of the testator William Browne, exhibited a bill in the superior 421 *court of chancery of Richmond, against Taylor and wife, charging, that the deed of January 1812 was made without any lawful consideration, and was therefore void; and if it was not so, yet the widow of the testator in taking administration with the will annexed, had elected to take under the will, and could not now claim under the deed. They, therefore claimed all the property which was bequeathed by the will to the wife during widowhood, with remainder in the event of her marriage to them, and prayed an account of the administration &c.

Taylor and wife in their answer, stated that the wife had duly renounced the provision made for her by her first husband's will; and that, even without any such renunciation, they had a right to claim under the deed of January 1812; which, though voluntary, was good and effectual as against the donor and volunteers claiming under him: that the wife's taking the administration with the will annexed, was not an election to abide by the will, and not to claim under the deed, nor had she otherwise made such election: and that they were ready to account for all the estate of the testator, except that which was settled on his wife by the deed of 1812; but they claimed, under that deed, all the property thereby conveyed.

The first of the instruments of renunciation above mentioned, that of the 25th August 1817, which was executed by Mrs. Taylor alone, was filed as an exhibit in the cause, at the time of the hearing and of the interlocutory decree made therein. But the other deed of renunciation of the 20th October 1817, in which Taylor the husband joined with his wife, was not then exhibited: it was filed after the decree was entered, and subjoined to the transcript of the record sent to this court, by the clerk.

In order to prove, that Mrs. Taylor had elected to take under her first husband's will, and not under the deed of January 1812, the plaintiffs adduced the deposition of one of the appraisers of the testa-

422 tor's estate, that the property *mentioned in the deed was appraised as part of the estate. The appraisement itself was not exhibited.

The chancellor held, that Mrs. Taylor was bound to abide by the provision made for her by her first husband's will, and could not claim against the will, and under the deed of January 1812, unless she had duly renounced the provision made for her by the will, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 26, p. 381.* And taking up the case upon the deed of renunciation of the 25th August 1817, he held, that that deed was ineffectual, because Mrs. Taylor was at that time a married woman, and the deed was executed by her alone without her husband joining in it. Therefore, he held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the property bequeathed by the will of the testator William Browne, to his wife during her widowhood, with remainder in case of her marrying again to them; and ordered the defendants to render an account of the estate, and of the administration thereof, in the same manner as if the deed of January 1812 had never been made.

The cause was argued here, by Leigh for the appellants, and the attorney general for the appellees, upon two points: 1. Whether Mrs. Taylor could claim under the deed of January 1812, without having re-423 nounced the provision made *for her by the will of her first husband, William Browne, in due time and form, according to the provisions of the statute? In other words, whether the statute applied to the case? 2. Whether Mrs. Taylor, in taking administration of Browne's estate with the will annexed, or by causing or permitting the property in question to be appraised as part of his estate (if the fact was so), had elected to take under his will, and precluded herself from claiming under the deed of January 1812?

CARR, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The chancellor, in rejecting the claim of the appellants under the deed of January 1812, seems to have been governed wholly by the supposed failure of the wife to renounce in due and binding form, according to the terms of the statute, the provision made for the wife by the will of her first husband William Browne. As to the validity of the act of renunciation, we give no opinion. The provisions of the statute have, in our judgment, no application to the case. They were only in-

*The words of the statute are: "When any widow shall not be satisfied with the provision made for her by the will of her husband, she may, within one year from the time of his death, before the general court, or court having jurisdiction of the probat of the will as aforesaid, or by deed executed in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, declare, that she will not take or accept the provision made for her by such will, or any part thereof, and renounce all benefit which she might claim by the same will, and thereupon such widow shall be entitled to one third part of the slaves whereof her husband died possessed, which she shall hold during her life &c. and she shall, moreover, be entitled to such share of his other personal estate, as if he had died intestate, to hold as her absolute property; but every widow not making a declaration within the time aforesaid, shall have no more of her husband's slaves and personal estate, than is given her by his will."—Note in Original Edition.

tended to direct, how a widow shall proceed, who means to reject the provision made by her husband's will, and take that made by the law: but this can relate only to the slaves and personal estate of the husband; and so are the express words of the statute. It does not mean, that unless the widow renounces the will, she shall be prevented from making claim to property to which she is entitled, not under the will, but from a different source. With respect to such property, if it really belongs to the wife, and the husband has undertaken to dispose of it by will, this statute cannot govern the case: it must stand on the general doctrine of election, which disables a person from claiming under a will and against it. In Wallace v. Taliaferro, 2 Call, 447, this court required no renunciation of the will, but decided, that a husband could not devise slaves which he claimed in right of his wife, unless they were reduced into possession during the coverture. In Upshaw v. Upshaw, 2 Hen. & Munf. 381, the wife was entitled to slaves, in which 424 her mother *had a dower right; the husband during the mother's life devised these slaves away from the wife, but left her all his other property during her life; she took the provision made for her by the will; and on the death of her mother, took also the slaves, which her husband had devised away, and held the whole for many years: she was sued by the devisees of the slaves: this court held, it was a case of election; that the wife could not hold under the will, and yet disappoint its provisions as to the slaves; but they said also, that to make an election binding, a party must have a clear knowledge of his rights and of the funds; and, therefore, though the wife had held the estate given her by the will for twenty years, they would have been inclined even then (as she seemed to have acted in ignorance of her rights, and the consequences of her holding) to have given her the power of election if she had not so appropriated a part of the property she held under the will, as to disable her from returning it. These cases shew (if, indeed, anything can shew it more plainly than the statute itself) that the provision in question concerning a widow's renunciation of her husband's will, has nothing to do with a case, where she has a claim to property independent of and paramount to the will. In this case, the widow claimed under the deed of 1812. That deed is charged by the bill as being fraudulent, and if creditors were before the court, it would no doubt be so considered as to them. But there is nothing shewn, which, as between the parties and volunteers claiming under them, can affect it in the slightest degree. It was contended that the qualification of the widow as administratrix with the will annexed, was such an election to take under the will, as precluded her from afterwards resorting to the deed. We do not think so. Her duty as administratrix was well and truly to execute the will, by paying first the debts, and then the legacies, as far as the goods, chattels and credits of the testator would extend, and the law charge her. But this related solely to the property of the testator: the law could charge her no farther. And even if 425 this could *be considered an election, at the time, to abide by the will, we see that, before any change in the state of things was made, within twelve months, there was a decision not to take under the will, but to abide by the deed: the renunciation of the wife, made and recorded, followed by an act of renunciation by her and her second husband solemnly executed, though not called for by the statute, is sufficient evidence of this.

The decree is to be reversed with costs, so far as it directs an account of the property contained in the deed of 1812, and affirmed as to the residue, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded in according to the principles here declared.

Same—Same—No Exception in Lower Court—Appellate Practice.—When the deposition of a party in a suit in chancery is taken under a special commis-

*For sequel of principal case, see Beverly v. Brooke, 4 Gratt. 187. In this case the principal case is cited at pages 188, 216, 217, 218, 231, 233, 234.

*Depositions—Competency of Witnesses—Objection First Made in Appellate Court—Virginia Rule.—An exception to the deposition of a party to a suit on the ground of incompetency, though not brought to the notice of the court at the hearing, otherwise than by the exception, may be passed upon by that court; and, whether so passed upon or not, it may be passed upon by the appellate court, and the deposition be either read or excluded in the decision of the case by that court, as may be proper. Statham v. Ferguson, 25 Gratt. 38, citing principal case. See, in accord, Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 227, 228, citing principal case.

But, in Hord v. Colbert, 28 Gratt. 54, 55, objection was made to the deposition of Joseph W. Colbert, a defendant in the cause, on the ground of his incompetency to testify. But the exception was not made sion, subject to all just exceptions, whether the deposition be excepted against on the ground of incompetency or not. It behoves the court to examine and decide the question of competency; and though the deposition be read at the hearing in the court of chancery, without exception, yet if, on an appeal from the decree, the appellate court finds the deposition incompetent evidence by reason of the deponent's interest in the event, it will pay no regard to the deposition.

until after he had been cross-examined at great length upon all the issues involved, and the whole examination was concluded, although the party making the exception was aware of it as well before as after the cross-examination was commenced and concluded. The attention of the court below seems not to have been to the objection. The question was raised in the appellate court whether the objection had not been waived by this manner of proceeding. JUDGE STAPLES, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say, that when the party cross-examines upon the issues involved, with a knowledge of the interest of the witness, he will not be permitted afterwards to make the objection. Having made the objection however in due season, he may then proceed to cross-examine without prejudice to his right to move to suppress the deposition at the hearing. Jacobs v. Laybom, 11 Mees. & Welsby R. 684; Moorhouse v. De Passon, 10 Ves. R. 432; Harrison v. Courtauld, 5 Eng. Ch. R. 428; Donelson v. Taylor, 8 Pick. R. 390; Graves v. Graves, 2 Paige R. 62, 3 Paige 240, 554; 1 Payne C. C. R. 400; 1 Phillips on Evidence 789.

"It may be said that the rule here stated has no application to parties examined as witnesses. Under the former practice, in the chancery courts of this state, when a special commission was issued to take the deposition of a party, saving all just exceptions, the duty devolved on the court to take notice ex officio of objections to the competency of the witness arising from his interest in the event of the cause. And in such a case an appellate court will consider and decide upon the question of competency, although the deposition may have been read in the court below without objection. Leigh, 425. The decision in Beverly v. Brooke & als., 2 Leigh 425. The court was of opinion there that the question would have presented more difficulty had the deposition been taken under a general commission. (See principal case cited to the same effect in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 227, 228.)

"Whatever may have been the distinction formerly between parties and other witnesses, that distinction has been entirely abrogated by the statute, which declares that no witness shall be incompetent to testify because of interest; and in all actions, suits, and other proceedings of a civil nature, at law or in equity, the parties thereto shall, if otherwise competent to testify, and subject to the rules of evidence, and of practice applicable to other witnesses, be competent to give evidence. Code of 1873, p. 1109. Under this provision it is very clear the rule in respect to objections for incompetency on the ground of interest is equally applicable to parties examined as a witness as to those who are not parties. For these reasons I am of the opinion, if there was any valid objection to the testimony of Joseph W. Colbert, that objection has been waived, and he must now be treated as a competent witness."

And, in Simmons v. Simmons, 33 Gratt. 460, objection was made in the appellate court to the competency as witnesses of certain persons whose depositions had been received as evidence in the cause. In replying to the objection, JUDGE BURKS, speaking for the court, said: "It would seem to be a sufficient answer to this objection, that it does not appear that it was first made in the court below. Notwithstanding some expressions in decided cases, which seem to concede that objections to the testimony of a witness on the ground of his incompetency may be properly made in this court although not made, or considered, or passed upon in the court below, we are of opinion, that such objections, unless first made in the court below, cannot be relied on here, for the reason that if allowed, parties might be taken by surprise. If made in the court of original jurisdiction: First. The incompetency might in some cases be removed by release or otherwise: Second. If not removed and the witness be excluded, the loss of his testimony might perhaps be supplied by other evidence. See what was said by JUDGE MONCRE in Fant v. Miller & Mayhew, 17 Gratt. 187. Also Beverly v. Brooke & als., 2 Leigh 425; Hord's Admr v. Colbert & als., 28 Gratt. 49, 54, 55, 56; Statham v. Ferguson's Admr & als., 25 Gratt. 38, 39. This seems now the settled law in Virginia. See McVeigh v. Chamberlain, 94 Va. 73, 26 S. E. Rep. 366.

Deeds of Trust—Notice to Trustees of Prior Unrecorded Trust Deed on Same Subject—Effect.—C. takes a mortgage from A. to secure just debts; and is informed immediately before the mortgage is executed, that A. has mortgaged the same subject to B. to secure a debt due him, but that the debt to B. is usurious; which mortgage to B. is not duly recorded: HELD, that C. and all claiming under the mortgage to him, are purchasers with notice of the prior unrecorded mortgage to B. and that the contemporary information that the prior mortgage was usurious, does not affect the question of notice of the prior mortgage.

Judgment—Alienation of Land Subject to—Liability of Alienees.—A judgment is obtained against a debtor; and then the debtor alien his lands to divers alienees by divers conveyances; HELD, all the debtor's lands, in the hands of his several alienees, are alike liable to the judgment creditor, and the lands in the hands of the several alienees must contribute pro rata to satisfy the judgment.

James English obtained a judgment in the circuit court of Fauquier, at September term 1819, awarding execution on a forfeited forthcoming bond, against George Pickett and Steptoe Pickett, and F. W. Brooke their surety in the forthcoming bond. Steptoe Pickett was also a surety of George, having become bound for this debt, by the original judgment for the same as his appearance bail. Farther proceedings on the judgment were stayed by injunction awarded by the court of chancery of Fredericksburg, in December 1819; and, after a long controversy, the injunction was dissolved in part, and perpetuated as to the residue, by a decree of the chancellor in May 1826, from which decree an appeal was taken to this court, and the appeal was still pending.

427 *George Pickett, by deed dated the 10th June 1818, reciting, that he was indebted to Peter Beverley, by note of the same date, in the sum of 6200 dollars, payable in two years, conveyed 500 acres of land in Fauquier, to T. T. Mason, upon trust, in default of due payment, to sell the subject, and pay the debt to Beverley out of the proceeds. And the day after the date of the deed, Pickett, at the instance of Peter Beverley, addressed the following letter to Robert Beverley: "Alexandria, June 11th 1818. Mr. Robert Beverley, I am indebted to Mr. Peter Beverley the sum of 6200 dollars, payable in two years, for which I have given him my note payable in the bank of Alexandria, and a deed of trust upon my lands to secure the same; and as he is indebted to you and about to transfer the note to you, I now inform you, that I will punctually pay it when it becomes due. I am &c. (signed) G. Pickett." The debt was assigned by Peter Beverley to Robert Beverley.

The deed of trust was acknowledged by Pickett and Mason the trustee, before two justices of Fairfax, three several times; first, on the 11th June 1818; again, on the 17th December following; and last, on the 20th August 1819. The certificates of the first two acknowledgments were very informal: and the last was without a caption, in these words: "We, G. T. and R. R. magistrates of the county of Fairfax, certify, that G. Pickett and T. T. Mason, parties to the within conveyance, have duly acknowledged the same before us, on in the inverse order of alienation. Indeed the principal case seems to be the only Virginia case that ever held otherwise. See, citing principal case, McClung v. Belrine, 10 Leigh 394, 402, 403, 405 (in this case, STANARD, J. in his dissenting opinion thought the decision of the principal case ought to be conformed to), and foot-note: Michaux v. Same—Same—Same—West Virginia Rule.—The West Virginia cases seem to adhere to the rule that objection may be made to a deposition, on the ground of the incompetency of the witness, for the first time in the appellate court.

In Middleton v. White, 5 W. Va. 574, it was held that an exception to a deposition on the ground of incompetency of the witness is not waived by not being insisted on in the court below. The principal case and Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187, are cited to sustain the position.

Again, in Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122, 133, it was held that an objection to a deposition on the ground of the incompetency of the witness, would be considered in the appellate court, although the objection be made there for the first time. See, in accord, Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 263, 271, 11 S. E. Rep. 927, 930; foot-note to Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 188, containing an extract on this point from Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 263, 271, 11 S. E. Rep. 927, 930.

Deeds of Trust—Notice to Trustee—Effect upon Beneficiary.—(Though the conveyances in the principal case are spoken of in the headnotes as mortgages, the facts of the case show that in reality they were deeds of trust. This is also true of the case of Conrad v. Harrison, 3 Leigh 532, cited below.)

It is a well settled principle of law, especially in Virginia and West Virginia, that notice to a trustee, is notice to a cestui que trust. Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Slendanoah &c., R. Co., 32 W. Va. 259, 9 S. E. Rep. 185; foot-note to French v. Loyal, 5 Leigh 627; Eubank v. Kirk, 1 Va. Dec. 254; Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354, all citing principal case.

Deed of Trust Creditor—Purchase.—It is well settled that a creditor taking a deed of trust on real estate to secure his debt is a purchaser within the purview of the act relating to registration of conveyances. Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 325, 326, citing principal case and Tate v. Liggett, 2 Leigh 84. For other cases in accord, see foot-note to Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153.

Judgment—Alienation of Land Subject to—Liability of Alienees.—In Conrad v. Harrison, 3 Leigh 532, a debtor mortgaged certain lands to three different creditors successively to secure debts due them. It was held that the third mortgagee could not call on the second mortgagee to contribute pro rata to the satisfaction of the debt due the first mortgagee. The proposition affirmed in the principal case, that where "a judgment is recovered against a debtor, and the debtor alien his lands to divers alienees and by divers conveyances, all the debtor's lands, in the hands of his several alienees, are alike liable to the judgment creditor, and the lands in the hands of several alienees must contribute pro rata to satisfy the judgment," was doubted, but held not applicable to the case at bar. JUDGES CABELL and TUCKER (pp. 541, 546) distinguished the principal case from the case at bar on the ground that the principal case was not a case of subsequent incumbrances after a prior mortgage, but after a prior judgment. JUDGE CARR, while he concurred in the opinion of the court in each case, said that he could not reconcile them, but that in each he decided as he thought right.

But later cases review the decision in the principal case on this point and expressly overrule it, or refer to it as overruled. And the rule established in both Virginia and West Virginia now is, that where land which is subject to a lien of a judgment, or other incumbrances, is aliened to different purchasers by successive alienations, it is chargeable in the hands of the purchasers the 20th day of August in the year 1819, and desired us to certify the said acknowledgment to the clerk of the county of Fauquier, in order that the said conveyance may be recorded. Witness our hands and seals." [Signed and sealed by the justices.]

The deed, with this certificate of the acknowledgment of it, was lodged with the clerk of Fauquier, to be recorded, on the 5th May 1820 (after the date of English's judgment) and the clerk indorsed a memorandum on it, that it was received in the office on that day; but it was not admitted to record till the 25th December 1822. The delay was explained *by the clerk; who deposed, that on the 5th May 1820, he received a letter from Mason, the trustee, inclosing the deed to him, and requesting him to record it, and to charge the deed for doing so to Peter Beverley; to which he answered, that he would not record the deed upon the credit of Peter Beverley for the fee, but if Mason, or any other person he could confide in, would undertake to pay the fee, he would immediately record it: that he, thereupon, made the memorandum of the date when he received the deed, and kept it, first among his own private papers, and afterwards among the unrecorded deeds in his office, until the 25th December 1822, when, being assured of the fee by an agent of Robert Beverley, the assignee, he committed it to record.

George Pickett, by deed dated the 3d May 1820, which was the next day duly recorded in the county court of Fauquier, conveyed the same 500 acres of land, together with sundry other real and personal estate, to John Scott, upon trust, to make sale of the whole subject, at such times and on such terms as best he could, and out of the proceeds, 1st, to discharge all sums of money for which Scott himself was then or might afterwards be bound for, on account of Pickett; 2dly, such of Pickett's debts as any other person was bound for, as his surety; 3dly, such other of Pickett's debts as Scott should prefer; and lastly, all his other debts. And, by another deed, dated the 22d January 1821, duly recorded the same day, he conveyed the same subject (more accurately specified and described) and some other property, to Scott, upon the same trusts.

After the execution and registry of both the deeds of trust to Scott, Letty Ball recovered a judgment against George Pickett, and sued out a ca. sa. thereupon; and Pickett being arrested upon it, in September 1821, surrendered his effects, took the oath of insolvency, and was discharged as an insolvent debtor. In the schedule which he rendered of his effects, he mentioned his equity of redemption of the property conveyed to Scott by the deed of the 22d January *1821, and he assigned that and all the other property mentioned in the schedule to the sheriff, by a formal deed of assignment: (though without such a deed, all his rights of property would have been vested in the sheriff, by force of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 34, p. 538). And the sheriff sold and conveyed the property contained in Pickett's schedule and deed of assignment thereof to him, to F. W. Brooke.

And, after George Pickett's insolvency, and surrender of his effects, under the ca. sa. sued out by Letty Ball against him, namely, in September 1822, John Laird recovered a judgment against him and Steptoe Pickett his surety. In April 1823, Laird had an entry made on the record book, that he elected to charge the goods and chattels and a moiety of the lands of the debtors, upon his judgment. And in November 1823, he assigned this judgment to F. W. Brooke.

There arose out of these transactions, three suits in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg.

I. Jacob Weaver exhibited his bill against Scott, the trustee in the deeds of trust of May 1820, and January 1821, George Pickett, Peter Beverley, and T. T. Mason, the trustee in the deed of trust of June 1818, securing the debt due to Beverley; setting forth, that he was a creditor of George Pickett; claiming, that the debt due him should be charged on the trust subject conveyed to Scott by the deeds of May 1820 and January 1821; and praying, that Scott should be ordered to execute the trust, to sell the trust subject, and to apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of Pickett's creditors, according to the provisions of those deeds: charging, that the deed of trust of June 1818, executed to Mason to secure the debt to Beverley, had never been duly recorded; and that the debt thereby secured to Beverley was usurious, and Pickett had in fact paid the whole or the greater part of the money really advanced to him, with legal interest: and insisting, therefore, that this *deed should not be allowed to stand in the way of the conveyances made of the same subject, by Pickett to Scott, for the benefit of his just creditors.

II. F. W. Brooke and Steptoe Pickett exhibited their bill against George Pickett, Peter Beverley and T. T. Mason his trustee, and Robert Beverley his assignee, John Laird and James English; setting forth, that they were the sureties for George Pickett for the debt due to English; and insisting, that English's judgment had unquestionable priority to the deed of trust executed by George Pickett to Mason to secure the debt due to Beverley, and they, the sureties for the debt due to English, had a right to be substituted in his place for the benefit of the lien of his judgment on Pickett's lands: setting forth also, the judgment recovered by Letty Ball against George Pickett, the ca. sa. sued out upon the same, the arrest of Pickett upon that process, his surrender of his effects, and discharge as an insolvent, and the sale and conveyance of the effects surrendered, by the sheriff to Brooke; and the judgment recovered by John Laird against George Pickett, and the assignment thereof by Laird to Brooke: charging, that the debt to Peter Beverley, to secure which George Pickett's deed of trust to Mason of June 1818 was executed, was usurious; that Peter Beverley was from the first only nominally the creditor, having lent the money secured by the deed of trust, as the agent of Robert Beverley, who supplied him with the funds to be lent out at usurious interest; and that

George Pickett's letter to Robert Beverley of the 11th June 1818, was, dictated by Peter, and designed to place Robert, though in fact the real creditor, in the ostensible situation of an assignee, induced to take an assignment of the debt by the promise of the debtor to make punctual payment to him; and that, whether this debt was usurious or not, Brooke, being the assignee of all the effects of George Pickett mentioned in his schedule and surrendered to the sheriff, upon his discharge as an insolvent under Letty *Ball's ca. sa. and being the assignee of Laird's judgment, acquired rights under both assignments, preferable to Beverley's claim and the deed of trust securing it, because both Ball's ca. sa. and Laird's judgment were prior in date to the registry of the deed of trust under which Beverley claimed.

Robert Beverley stated in his answer that Peter Beverley, having become justly and fairly indebted to him, to an amount larger than the debt due from George Pickett to Peter, offered to assign this debt to him in part satisfaction, and he was induced to take the assignment of it, by the assurances contained in Pickett's letter to him of the 11th June 1818, that the debt was justly due, was amply secured by deed of trust on Pickett's land, and would be punctually paid: that Peter Beverley was not his (Robert's) agent in the transactions with Pickett, out of which this debt arose; that he (Robert) was no wise concerned or acquainted with those transactions. and in particular, did not know or suspect, that the time he took the assignment, and did not now know, that the debt was usurious or otherwise illegal; and that, as he was neither party to the alleged usury, if usury there was, nor had any notice of it, and had been induced to take the assignment by the assurances contained in the letter above mentioned, he ought not, in case the fact of usury should be established, to be held liable to the consequences. And, as to the registry of the deed of trust under which he claimed, he said, he had been informed, that it had been lodged with the clerk to be recorded, and never knew that it had not been in fact recorded, immediately upon its being so lodged with the clerk, till long after the debt secured by it had fallen due.

As against Mason and Peter Beverley who were not inhabitants of Virginia, and failed to appear and answer, the bill was taken for confessed. The defendants English and Laird put in answers; but they had no interest in the controversy contrary to those of the plaintiffs.

*III. Robert Beverley exhibited his bill against George Pickett, Scott, the trustee in the deeds of trust of May 1820 and January 1821, Peter Beverley and T. T. Mason; and afterwards, an amended bill, making English, Laird, Steptoe Pickett and Brooke, parties defendants. He set forth all the facts touching the assignment by Peter Beverley to him, of George Pickett's debt to Peter, stated in his answer to the bill of Brooke and Steptoe Pickett, and, particularly, Pickett's letter to him of the 11th June 1818, by the assurances contained in which, he alleged, he was induced to take the assignment of the debt; and all the facts touching the registry of the deed of trust of June 1818, under which he claimed; alleging, that it was duly acknowledged by the parties before the justices of Fairfax in August 1819, and lodged with the clerk to be recorded on the 5th May 1820, and that it was the clerk's fault or neglect that it was not then recorded; but whether it was duly and timely recorded or not, was, he insisted, wholly immaterial; for he charged, that Scott, before the execution of George Pickett's first deed of trust to him, that of the 3d May 1820, had notice of the execution of the prior deed of June 1818 securing the debt to Beverley; and the defendant Laird, or Brooke as his assignee, claimed under the deeds of trust to Scott, and had obtained a decree for satisfaction of Laird's judgment out of the trust subject in Scott's hands, according to the provisions of those deeds. And the bill prayed a discovery from Scott, whether he had such notice or not, and how and when; and that the trustee in the deed of June 1818, or some other person to be appointed by the court, should be directed to sell the trust subject thereby mortgaged, and to apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the debt to Beverley; and general relief.

George Pickett answered, that since the execution of the several deeds of trust in the bill mentioned, he had taken the oath of insolvency, and surrendered all his interest in the subject, which interest had been sold by the sheriff for the benefit of the creditor at whose suit he was in execution, *for a sum not more than sufficient to discharge the debt due that creditor: and, therefore, he disclaimed all interest in the matter in controversy in this cause.

Scott, in his answer, admitted that, after the first deed of trust to him of the 3d May 1820 was prepared, and when Pickett had taken the pen in his hand to execute it, he observed to Scott, that he had borrowed money of Peter Beverley at twelve per centum per annum, and had given him a mortgage of part of his land to secure the payment of about 6000 dollars. Scott also stated, that he was jointly concerned with Brooke, in the assignment of Laird's judgment; and that Steptoe Pickett was surety for George to Laird.

Brooke, in his answer, also stated that Scott was jointly concerned with him in the assignment of Laird's judgment, and that Steptoe Pickett was surety for George to Laird; and he admitted, that the debt due to Laird was secured by the deeds of trust to Scott, and that the assignees thereof had claimed under those deeds, and obtained a decree for satisfaction out of the trust subject thereby conveyed, which as yet, however, had proved unproductive.

Steptoe Pickett, insisted in his answer, that being a surety for George Pickett to Laird, he had a right to demand that George Pickett's property conveyed by the deed of trust to Scott, should be applied in discharge of that debt, so as to relieve him from his liability as surety for the same, and that he, as surety to Laird, was entitled to be substituted to every advantage to which Laird was entitled.

Laird also answered. As against the defendants, Peter Beverley, Mason, and English, the bills were regularly taken for confessed.

The plaintiff put in a general replication to all the answers, except that of George Pickett, to which there was no replication.

The circumstances attending the delivery of the deed of trust of June 1818, under which Beverley claimed, to the clerk of Fauquier to be recorded, and his reasons for not recording it till the 25th

December 1822, were proved by the deposition of the clerk. They have been already fully stated.

The defendant Scott was examined as a witness, as to his notice of the deed of June 1818, before the execution of the deed of May 1820 to him; and he deposed substantially as he had answered, that, after the deed of May 1820 had been drawn, and when Pickett was about to sign it, Pickett told him, he had borrowed a sum of money of Peter Beverley at twelve per cent. interest, and had given a mortgage on part of the land included in the deed to Scott.

Upon the question, whether George Pickett's debt of 6200 dollars to Peter Beverley which was secured by the deed of trust of June 1818, and assigned by Peter to Robert Beverley, was usurious, there were many circumstances in proof; but the principal evidence, that, indeed, without which the charge of usury could not be established, was the deposition of the defendant George Pickett, which stated the fact and the particulars of the usury, very positively and explicitly. The question was as to the competency of his evidence; and the circumstances under which it was taken, and read at the hearing, were supposed to affect the question. They were these: the defendant Scott moved for and obtained a special commission to examine and take the deposition of Pickett, to be read at the hearing, saving all just exceptions. And, afterwards, Beverley himself moved for and obtained a like commission to examine Pickett. But Beverley never proceeded under his commission. The deposition was taken by the other parties, under the commission awarded on Scott's motion. When the deposition was returned, Beverley's counsel indorsed an exception to it, upon the envelope containing it, to the following effect: that he excepted to the reading of the deposition, taken, as it was, under a special commission subject to all just exceptions, on the ground, that the deponent was a party in the suits, and directly interested in the event. But the counsel did not sign this exception; and, for 435 aught that appeared, the *court was not apprised of it, or called upon to examine and decide upon it, so that the deposition was read at the hearing, without any exception presented to the court, or known to the parties who adduced and relied upon the evidence.

In the case of Weaver v. Scott and others, the chancellor, reserving for future consideration all questions as to the validity of the deed of trust of June 1818, under which Beverley claimed, the registry thereof, and the charge of usury in the debt which that deed was executed to secure, directed Scott to sell all the trust subject comprised in the two deeds of trust to him of May 1820 and January 1821; and, an account having been taken of the debts chargeable on this fund according to the provisions of these two deeds, and Scott having made sales of the trust subject in pursuance of the decree, and made report thereof to the court, the chancellor decreed the payment of the proceeds to the creditors claiming under the deeds to Scott including Laird and his assignees, in the order provided by those deeds.

And afterwards, in the two cases of F. W. Brooke and Steptoe Pickett v. George Pickett, Beverley and others, and Robert Beverley v. George Pickett, Scott and others, the chancellor declared, that the deed of trust of George Pickett to Mason of June 1818, securing the debt to Beverley, was not a recorded deed within the meaning of the statute of conveyances (1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 4, p. 362,) until the 25th December 1822, when it appeared by the certificate of the clerk of Fauquier, to have been admitted to record; and that the plaintiff Robert Beverley, claiming under that deed to charge the land thereby mortgaged, must be postponed to the judgment creditors of George Pickett, whose liens attached before the deed was recorded; that Beverley, however, if he elected to do so, might come in under the deeds of trust of May 1820 and January 1821, for satisfaction out of the trust subject, according to the provisions of these deeds, and that, if 436 he failed to get satisfaction *out of that fund, he was entitled to a personal decree against George Pickett, for such portion of the debt secured by the deed of trust of June 1818, as might remain unsatisfied. And he decreed and ordered, that the marshal of the court should sell the 500 acres of land mortgaged by the deed of June 1818, and that, out of the proceeds of sale, he should pay Brooke, assignee of Laird, 4754 dollars with interest from the 1st July 1826 till paid, (being the balance due upon Laird's judgment against George Pickett and Steptoe Pickett his surety) and the costs of the suit of Brooke and Pickett v. Pickett, Beverley and others; and that the marshal should deposit the residue of the proceeds in bank, subject to the future order of the court.

Beverley appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellees.

I. Johnson said, the first question was, whether George Pickett's debt to Peter Beverley, assigned to Robert Beverley, the appellant, to secure which the deed of trust of June 1818 was executed, was usurious or not? The chancellor, considering the charge of usury not proved, had decided against the preference claimed by Beverley under that deed, upon other grounds; but the effort to establish the usury, might and no doubt would be repeated here. He said, there was no other evidence of the usury but the deposition of George Pickett; so that the point depended upon the question of his competency. He contended, that Pickett was not a competent witness. For he was a party to the suits, liable, in case the usury was not established, and Beverley should succeed in charging his debt on the land, either under his own mortgage or under the deeds to Scott, to a personal decree for so much of the debt as the trust fund should fall short of satisfying; and exempt from such liability, if Beverley's claim was condemned as usurious: liable, certainly, to a decree for costs, if Beverley should succeed; 437 and entitled to costs if Beverley should fail: and, therefore, interested to defeat him. But, if the evidence could be held competent, and the usury as between Peter Beverley and Pickett should be thereby established, Pickett, after his letter to Robert Beverley, of the 11th June 1818, whereby he induced him to take an assignment of the debt, as a fair debt, amply secured, which would be punctually paid, could not be allowed to set up the defence of usury against Robert Beverley; neither, therefore, could Scott, who claimed under Pickett the equity of redemption, and stood in Pickett's shoes, nor Laird or his assignee Brooke, who claimed under the deeds of trust to Scott, nor any other creditors of Pickett claiming under those deeds, avail themselves of the objection of usury, as against Robert Beverley, the innocent assignee of the usurer, misled and deluded by the debtor.

Stanard said, that Pickett's deposition related to the question of usury put in issue by the pleadings in Weaver's suit, and in that brought by Brooke and Steptoe Pickett, (the first and second suits above mentioned) and it was only in the third suit, upon the bill exhibited by Beverley, that Beverley could be entitled to a personal decree against Pickett, the deponent. Now, in this suit, George Pickett's answer to Beverley's bill, disclaimed all interest in the controversy; and to this answer, containing this explicit disclaimer, there was no replication: Pickett, then, was discharged from the cause. Accordingly, Beverley as well as Scott, asked a special commission to take Pickett's deposition: after that, neither party could be heard to object to his competency. And the deposition was, in fact, read at the hearing without objection; for the exception indorsed by Beverley's counsel, on the envelope which contained the deposition, not even signed by the counsel, never presented to the chancellor, or intimated to the other parties, indorsed on a paper which neither the court nor the parties would ever think of examining, could not be regarded as an exception at all. The deposition es-

438 tablished the usury as against *Peter Beverley. As to Pickett's letter to Robert Beverley, of the 11th June 1818, he went into a minute examination of the evidence, and endeavoured to shew, that in the transactions between Peter Beverley and Pickett, Peter was Robert's agent, lending Robert's money to Pickett; and that that letter, so far from being regarded as an inducement held out by Pickett to Robert Beverley, to take the assignment of the debt, and thus precluding Pickett, and those standing in his place, from relying on the usury, was a contrivance which manifested the consciousness of the usury practised, and was a strong presumptive proof of the usury.

Johnson replied, that Pickett could not disclaim his interest in the controversy: he could not disclaim his personal liability to Beverley for the debt he owed him, or for the costs of suit. That the want of a replication to his answer, was immaterial; for there was nothing in the answer, which it was necessary to deny by replication. That, so far from Pickett having been discharged from the cause, it was set for hearing, and heard, as to him as well as the other parties. That, though Beverley had asked a commission to take Pickett's deposition, he had never proceeded under the commission. That, as to the deposition being read at the hearing without exception: if it was not enough, in all cases, to file such an exception among the papers in the cause (as he thought it was); yet this deposition was taken under a special commission, expressly saving all just exceptions; in other words, the court itself, in giving the authority to take the deposition, reserved the question of competency for its future consideration, and was bound to examine and decide it: and, besides, he doubted, whether it was necessary for a party, against whom a deposition of a witness, plainly incompetent upon the face of the record, is adduced, to file a formal exception to it, in order to avail himself of the objection to its competency: such exceptions were properly applicable to cases of irregularities in the taking of depositions, such as the want of notice and 439 the like, and *were required in order to save the party adducing them, from being surprised by the objection. The question whether Peter Beverley, in his transactions with Pickett, was the agent of Robert, was a question of fact; and he insisted, that there was no evidence which could justify the court in assuming the fact of the alleged agency.

II. Johnson insisted, that the deed of June 1818, under which Beverley claimed, ought to be considered as a recorded deed upon and from the 5th May 1820, when it was "lodged with the clerk to be recorded," according to the express provision of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 4. It was immaterial, whether it was actually recorded or not, or what was the clerk's motive or reason or failing to commit it to record immediately. But the point, he said, was of no consequence in this cause; or Scott had actual notice of the mortgage to Beverley, prior to the execution of the first deed of trust to him of the 3d May 1820; and, therefore, Beverley's mortgage, supposing it was never recorded, was good against Scott, and all persons claiming under the deeds of trust to him. Then, the state of the claims of the creditors, as to their priorities, stood thus: English's judgment was prior to Beverley's mortgage; but as he had claimed under the deeds of trust to Scott, over which Beverley's mortgage had priority, he could not avail himself of the previous lien of his judgment, to insist on the priority which that would otherwise have given him over Beverley's mortgage; or, if he was entitled to stand on the previous lien of the judgment, his claim ought to be charged on that part of Pickett's lands which were not mortgaged to Beverley, but were, afterwards conveyed in trust to Scott. And either way, Beverley would be entitled to the benefit of the whole subject mortgaged to him. Scott, and the creditors claiming under the deeds of trust to him, were entitled to the equity of redemption to the land mortgaged to Beverley, and to the other trust subject comprised in those deeds.

As to Letty Ball's judgment and the 440 ca. sa. *which she sued out upon it, Pickett's surrender of his effects and discharge as an insolvent debtor, being subsequent to the execution of the deeds of trust to Scott, nothing but Pickett's equity of redemption of the subject comprised in those deeds, was surrendered to the sheriff for her benefit, and the sheriff could convey to Brooke no other interest in the lands in question. And Laird's judgment being subsequent to Pickett's discharge as an insolvent debtor, which vested all his rights of property in the sheriff for the benefit of the creditor at whose suit he was in execution, there was literally nothing on which the lien of that judgment could attach: Laird, and his assignee, could only claim under the deeds of trust to Scott.

Stanard denied, that the mortgage to Beverley could be regarded as a recorded deed at all: he said, the certificate of the acknowledgment of it by the parties, was fatally defective: for the justices of Fairfax, who certified that the deed was acknowledged before them, had no jurisdiction or authority for any such act, out of their county; and their certificate did not state, that the acknowledgment of the deed was taken by them in their county; nor was there even a caption to the certificate, referring the act to the county of Fairfax. And as to Scott's notice of the mortgage to Beverley, he remarked, that the notice given him of the existence of that deed, was accompanied by information, in the same breath, that it was usurious, and in effect void: and he endeavoured to maintain, that such a notice could not affect Scott, or the rights of those claiming under him.

GREEN, J. The first inquiry in these cases is, whether Beverley's demand is tainted and destroyed by usury? And this depends upon the question as to the competency of George Pickett as a witness. If he is competent, the proof of usury is full and complete, and the question as to the effect of his letter to Beverley of the 11th June 1818, would arise. If he is not a competent witness, the other evidence 441 *in the cause, though sufficient to excite strong suspicions, does not amount to satisfactory proof of usury.

Pickett, if Beverley's claim was valid to any purpose, was his debtor, and a party defendant in his suit, under such circumstances, that if the claim to satisfaction, in whole or in part, out of the land, either under the deed to Mason or under those to Scott, were established, Pickett would have been liable to a personal decree for any balance not satisfied out of the land, and for the costs. But if, on the other hand, Beverley's claim to satisfaction out of the land were repudiated, then, even though

Pickett might be still personally responsible in consequence of his letter, Beverley's bill must have been dismissed with costs as to Pickett, as well as to the other defendants, since the only ground of jurisdiction against Pickett, was the plaintiff's right to subject the land. In respect to the costs, therefore, at least, he had a direct interest in the event of the cause, depending upon the very point to which he testified. His evidence must, consequently, be rejected, unless the course taken by Beverley has sanctioned it.

His bill did not ask any specific relief against Pickett, particularly; but it prayed general relief; and that was sufficient to found any decree against any of the parties, which the state of the case at the hearing would justify. Pickett answered, that having surrendered all his interest in the land upon taking the benefit of the insolvent debtor's law, and the sheriff having sold that interest, for a sum not more than sufficient to satisfy the execution under which he surrendered, he had no longer any interest in the property, and he, therefore, disclaimed all interest in the subject of controversy; that is, between the other parties, as to the land. But he did not, and could not disclaim his interest in his own personal liability. Beverley put in no replication to this disclaimer; and that, it was argued, put Pickett out of court as a party. That may be a just rule, when the answer, followed by a disclaimer, is such as, if true, would shew that the party could have no interest in the decree in any event, and the plaintiff admits 442 it to be true by failing to *reply to it. But, in this case, the answer being true, there could be no occasion to traverse it; and yet it shewed, upon its face, that the defendant had still an interest in the cause, and was liable to a personal decree, if the plaintiff was properly in court in respect to the land.

After the answer and disclaimer of Pickett were filed, Beverley procured an order for a special commission to take his deposition, subject to all just exceptions at the hearing. But he never took out and acted on the commission. The deposition was taken under a commission awarded by a special order to the same effect, made at the instance of the defendant Scott. The circumstance of Beverley having asked for a commission, cannot, in reason, preclude him from objecting to the competence of the witness; and no authority was cited in support of that proposition.

Finally, though there was an indorsement on the envelope of the deposition, in the hand writing of Beverley's counsel that he excepted to the reading of the deposition (particularly describing it) on account of the witness's interest in the event of the cause; yet it was not signed by the counsel, nor does it appear that the attention of the court was called to the exception, or that the court decided upon it. This frequently occurs in the records which come to this court, and as to depositions taken under general commissions, presents serious difficulty. But that difficulty does not exist in the case of a special commission, saving in terms, all just exceptions for the consideration of the court at the hearing; and, consequently, devolving on the court the duty to take notice, ex officio, of objections to the competency of the witness, arising from his interest in the event of that very cause; a question which cannot be affected by any collateral proofs.

Upon the whole, I think that Pickett's deposition should be rejected. And the chancellor seems to have disregarded it.

According to the views that have occurred to me, in respect to the priorities of the several parties claiming satisfaction of their debts out of the property in question, it is wholly immaterial whether the 443 deed of trust to Mason under *which Beverley claims, be considered as a deed admitted to record on the 5th May 1820, or the 25th December 1822, or as remaining an unrecorded deed to this day. No judgment creditors of Pickett appear, except one, who had his judgment before the 5th May 1820, and before Pickett's first deed to Scott, (namely, James English) and such as obtained their judgments after the execution of both the deeds to Scott, viz. Letty Ball and John Laird.

As to the first, English's judgment, it overreaches all those deeds, and operated as a lien on all the debtor's lands, which has not in any degree been impaired. He, and the sureties of Pickett to him, have been guilty of no laches or other act to impair its force. The judgment was rendered in September 1819, and enjoined in January 1820. The injunction was perpetuated in part, and dissolved in part, in May 1826, and an appeal taken from the decree, which, as far as appears, is still depending. Nor has English received any thing under the deeds to Scott; nor does he appear to have been privy or consenting to them. A sum has been retained in the case of Weaver v. Pickett and others, on account of his claim, subject to the future order of the court. If he had claimed under the deeds to Scott, that would not have barred him of his election to resort to his original security, the lien of the judgment, if at any time before the final disposition of the fund, he had found it to be his interest to do so. Codwise v. Galston, 10 Johns. Rep. 517. It was, however, insisted on the part of Beverley, that no part of this debt should be charged upon the lands conveyed to Mason; because, before Pickett conveyed the residue of his lands to Scott, if that residue had been extended, Pickett could not have claimed contribution from the lands conveyed to Mason, whom he was bound to indemnify; and, in equity, the residue of the lands should, in that case, be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment in exoneration of those conveyed to Mason. And this is certainly true, for neither a debtor nor his heir can claim contribution in such a case against the alienee of a part of the land bound by the 444 judgment. *From this it was argued, that Scott, the second alienee, and those claiming under the deeds to him, should stand in Pickett's shoes in that respect, and that residue first subjected to the satisfaction of the judgment, as far as it will go, in exoneration of the land conveyed to Mason. Upon this subject, the law is perfectly settled. All the alienees of the lands of a debtor bound by a judgment or recognizance, no matter in what order the alienations were made, are bound to bear equally the burden of satisfying the judgment, by mutual contributions, pro rata, according to the value of the property held by them; all being considered as in equality, without regard to the priority of their purchases or conveyances. Authorities for this doctrine are referred to in 5 Vin. Abr. Contribution and Average, A. pl. 3, 4, 6, 7, 12, 19, p. 561, 2; Herbert's case, 3 Rep. 12. There is no pretence for calling upon Pickett's sureties, against whom the judgment was also rendered, for contribution. If there was such a right at law, equity would control it, by substituting the surety to the lien of the judgment upon the land of the principal debtor, no matter in whose hands it was. This, however, was not claimed. This judgment should be satisfied out of the proceeds of the lands conveyed by Pickett to Scott had already sold, and that in controversy, pro rata, in proportion to the neat amount of the sales thereof respectively. But if, in the case of Weaver v. Pickett, the proceeds of the land sold have been so disposed of as that that portion of English's judgment which ought to be paid out of that fund, cannot now be fully satisfied out of it (a question which cannot be examined here) still the land remaining unsold can only be charged with its due proportion, to be ascertained as aforesaid.

Letty Ball's judgment being subsequent to the execution and recording of both of the deeds to Scott, operated as a lien, not upon the land in question, the legal title to which, as to her, was vested in Scott, but upon Pickett's equity of redemption, or his interest in the surplus, if any, of the fund conveyed to Scott, after satisfying all 445 the purposes of the *deeds to him; that is, after paying all Pickett's debts, including that to Beverley, in the order specified in the deeds. The execution of the ca. sa. destroyed this lien, and the discharge of Pickett under the insolvent laws, vested his equity of redemption, or interest in that surplus, if any, in the sheriff for her benefit; and that again was vested in Brooke by the conveyance of the sheriff. The proceedings under the ca. sa. also vested in the sheriff, for the benefit of the creditor, all the property of the debtor conveyed by him by any conveyance made void by the statute of frauds and perjuries, as being in fraud of creditors, or by the statute of conveyances, as not being duly recorded; as was held in the case of Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 735. So that, if there had been no conveyance by Pickett of the land in question, other than that to Mason, and that were unrecorded at the time of the execution of the ca. sa. the legal title would have passed to the sheriff, and from him to Brooke, in opposition to that deed. But there was another unimpeached and duly recorded deed, providing for the payment of Beverley's debt, which, putting the deed to Mason out of the case, as if it had never been made, would give Beverley a preference over Brooke, claiming not under the deed to Scott, but only as a purchaser of the title of the sheriff under Pickett's schedule and surrender of his effects.

Laird's judgment being subsequent to the ca. sa. and the proceedings under it, operated as a lien upon nothing; for Pickett then had no scintilla of interest, legal or equitable, in any thing, real or personal; the sheriff having sold all his interests, for a sum not more than sufficient to satisfy the execution under which he was taken, and thus annihilated even his interest in any surplus which might arise from the sale of his mortgaged property. If there had been a surplus, Laird's judgment would have operated as a lien upon that; but there was none. Laird, therefore, can claim nothing, but as a creditor under the deeds of trust to Scott, without any aid from his judgment, which gives no additional strength to that claim. And his claim stands precisely as it would, if he had not obtained judgment.

446 *Allowing the preference to English's judgment to the extent stated, the question arises between Beverley and those claiming only under the deeds to Scott, including Laird, as to the order in which the residue, after satisfying English's judgment, shall be applied; whether according to the terms prescribed by the deeds to Scott, putting Beverley in the last class of creditors to be satisfied, upon the ground, that the deed he claims under is void as to all Pickett's creditors claiming under the deeds to Scott, because not recorded; or to the satisfaction of Beverley's claim in preference to the creditors claiming under the deeds to Scott, upon the ground that it was in fact recorded before those deeds were executed, or that Scott, and consequently, those claiming under him, had notice of the deed to Mason, before the first deed to Scott was executed? I have already said, that it is unnecessary to any purpose in this cause, to decide whether the deed to Mason ought to be considered as a deed admitted to record on the 5th May 1820, or on the 25th December 1822, or remains a deed not duly recorded to this day; and I mean to give no opinion on that point. It is, in every view, unimportant; because the first deed to Scott, conveying the property in question, was executed and admitted to record, before the deed to Mason was delivered to the clerk; and the second deed to Scott does not impair the force of the first, for it is upon the same trusts precisely, and differs from it only in specifying the property conveyed more particularly, and conveying other property. So that those claiming under the first deed to Scott, would have an unquestionable priority to Beverley, unless Scott took that conveyance, as well as the last, with such a notice of the existence of the deed to Mason, as made it good against him, and all claiming any benefit under the deeds to him.

Such a notice I think he had: he was explicitly informed, that a deed for a part of the land was given to secure a debt to Peter Beverley, and, at the same time, that the debt was usurious. This notice made the deed as valid against him, at all claiming under the deeds to him, as if it had peached for usury, as it, would have been if recorded, and no otherwise. It had the same effect, as a notice of the existence of the deed, with a declaration by Pickett that he had paid the debt, would have had; and that surely could not have been considered as, per se, without any other proof of payment, destroying the effect of the notice of the existence of the deed.

Upon the whole, the land conveyed by the deed to Mason should be sold under the direction of the court of chancery; the just proportion charged upon it in favour of English's judgment, and applied towards the satisfaction thereof, in the first place; and then the proceeds applied to the debt secured to Beverley, and the costs of his suit; and the surplus, if any, distributed according to the order prescribed in the deeds to Scott.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was reversed with costs.

Jones v. Murdaugh.

December, 1830.

Trespass on Case—Wrongful Distress for Rent—Declaration—Allegations.—In an action upon the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 5, for wrongful distress for rent when no rent in arrear, the declaration must set forth the relation of landlord and tenant existing between the plaintiff and defendant: and if it does not, the declaration is bad on general demurrer.

This was an action on the case brought by Murdaugh against Jones in the circuit court of James City, for making wrongful distress for rent, when no rent was in arrear and due.

The declaration was very informal: it contained two counts, as follows: "J. W. Murdaugh complains of W. Jones in custody &c. of a plea of trespass on the case; for that the defendant, on &c. at &c. wrongfully and illegally, in his own name and in those of his wife Mary and 448 P. L. *C. Burwell, caused a distress to be made and levied on the personal property of the plaintiff, to a large amount in value, to wit, to the value of 200 dollars, and, on &c. at &c. wrongfully and illegally, caused the said property to be sold; and the plaintiff avers, that before, on and since the day of distress and sale of the said property, no rent was due to the defendant and Mary his wife or P. L. C. Burwell. And further, the plaintiff charges and avers, that on &c. at &c. the defendant, pretending that rent was in arrear and due to him, wrongfully and illegally (through the agency of one M. and one B.), caused a distress to be levied and made on the personal property of the plaintiff, to a large amount in value, to wit, to the value of 200 dollars, and, on &c. at &c. caused the said property to be sold; and the plaintiff charges and avers, that no rent was in arrear and due to the said defendant, before, on or since the day and year aforesaid; whereby action accrued to the plaintiff to demand and have double the amount or value of the said rent distrained for, or double the value of the property distrained. Nevertheless, the defendant illegally caused said distress and sale to be made, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and to the damage of the plaintiff 1500 dollars, and therefore he brings suit &c." The defendant demurred generally to the declaration, and pleaded not guilty. The court held, that the law on the demurrer, was for the plaintiff. And upon the trial of the issue on the plea of not guilty, the jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages to 400 dollars. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; and the motion being overruled, he filed exceptions to the opinion of the court, thereupon, stating all the facts which had appeared in evidence at the trial; from which it appeared, that the plaintiff wholly denied any relation of tenant and landlord between him and the defendant, or the other parties, in whose names the declaration alleged the wrongful distress to have been made. The court gave judgment for 449 the damages *found by the jury; and the defendant, Jones, appealed to this court.

The case was argued here, by R. G. Scott for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellee; but the court decided it upon a point which was not noticed at the bar.

COALTER, J. The declaration, though it avers that the plaintiff complains of a plea of trespass on the case, is really, if any thing, a declaration in trespass under the statute for distraining the goods of the plaintiff for rent, when no rent was in arrear and due; and there is a verdict and judgment for double the value of the goods sold. The declaration was demurred to: and the question is, Whether it is a good one under the statute? Several objections were taken to it; one of which, the want of specification of the goods taken and sold, is perhaps fatal, according to the cases of Wyat v. Essington, 1 Stra. 637, and Bertie v. Pickering, 4 Burr. 2455. If this was a simple action of trespass, not founded on the statute, those cases would seem to me conclusive. How far this case may be taken out of that doctrine, being an action under the statute, not intended to contest the right of the property, or the propriety of the seizure of it, if rent had been due, I am not prepared to say, nor have I deemed it necessary to inquire; because, as it appears to me, there is a fatal defect in the declaration, which was not noticed at the bar. There are various actions that may be maintained by tenants against their landlords: as, 1st, trespass or case under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 5, for a distress made when no rent is in arrear and due, a remedy given in England, by the statute of 2 W. & M. stat. 1, ch. 5, § 5. 2d, An action for excessive distress, given by our statute, Ibid. § 31, which is similar to the english statute of Marl. 52, H. 3, ch. 3. A simple action of trespass did not lie at common law in such case; for at common law, the landlord might distrain for more than the rent in arrear, so as to make it the interest of the party to re- 450 deem the *goods by paying the rent; Lynne v. Moody, 2 Stra. 851. 3d, A special action on the case lies for distrain-

ing for more rent than is due, whereby the tenant has been obliged to pay a larger sum than was justly due, besides costs &c. And 4th, in England, an action lies under the statute of 51 H. 3, for distraining beasts of the plough and sheep, there being other sufficient distress on the premises. The forms of declarations in all these actions, are given in 2 Chitt. plead. 285, 6, 7, 8. And all of them go upon the relation of tenant and landlord, admitted and stated in the declaration. The precedent given by Chitty, of a declaration in such a case as that before us, sets out the fact, that the plaintiff was tenant of the defendant, and at what annual rent &c. It goes for double damages; and, of course, is not an ordinary action of trespassa de bonis asportatis, though a count of that kind may be joined with it, upon which the damages will be according to the nature and extent of the injury. Salter v. Brunaden, 4 Mod. 231, was an action of the same kind as this under consideration: there, there was a judgment by default, and a writ of inquiry of damages, and a motion in arrest of judgment for the defects of the declaration, in not sufficiently setting forth the demise, and shewing the relation of landlord and tenant, and that the goods were distrained for rent arrear; but, as these matters were set forth, though informally, the court held the declaration good. But the case shews, that the relation of landlord and tenant, must be substantially shewn in the declaration; and the inference which Chitty draws from it, is, that the demise need not be set out so fully and formally as in his form. In the case before the court, the declaration, so far from stating or admitting a lease, or any relation of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff and defendant, is wholly silent on that point: and when we look into the proofs (which are stated in the bill of exceptions) we find the plaintiff went on the ground that there was no lease, and no relation of landlord and tenant between him and the defendant; and yet 451 he recovers double damages. *It is unnecessary to inquire what would have been the consequence, if the plaintiff had declared merely for a simple trespass, or had joined a count of that kind; since we must decide on the demurrer, whether this is a good declaration or not? It seems to me that it is not, for the reasons I have stated; and that, therefore, the judgment ought to be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant upon the demurrer.

The other judges concurred. Judgment reversed; and judgment entered for the appellant.

Threlkeld's Adm'r v. Fitzhugh's Ex'x.

December, 1830.

Sale of Land—Breach of Warranty—Measure of Damages.—Upon a sale of land by T. to B. the vendor covenants for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to warrant the land to B. his heirs

Sale of Land—Breach of Warranty—Measure of Damages.—Since the case of Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh 451, the definite fixed rule, never since departed from in Virginia, has been that the purchaser of land, upon eviction, is only entitled to the purchase price paid, with interest from the date of eviction, and costs. This rule is safe and certain; it is too well established, too plainly essential to the and assigns: B. is evicted, and brings covenant for breach of this warranty: HELD, the proper measure of damages is the purchase money with interest from the date of the actual eviction, the costs incurred in defending the title, and such damages as the vendee may have paid, or may be shewn to be clearly liable to pay, to the person who evicted him.

Same-Same-Same-Querre.—But, though the purchase money with interest &c. was held to give the proper measure of damages in the particular case, the opinions of the judges leave it still questionable, whether the actual value of the land at the time of sale, if proved to be greater than the purchase money, with interest &c. may not be justly demanded.

Covenant, in the circuit court of Stafford, by Lucy Fitzhugh, executrix of Francis Fitzhugh deceased, who was assignee of William Bronaugh, against John Fox, administrator of Elijah Threlkeld deceased.

The plaintiff declared, That Threlkeld, in his lifetime, on the 6th July 1780, by deed of bargain and sale, in consideration of £88. Virginia currency, conveyed a parcel of land to Bronaugh, in fee; and covenanted, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, with Bronaugh, 452 his heirs and assigns, 1. that he had a good and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple; 2. that he had at the time of the conveyance, good and lawful power and right to convey; 3. that the land was, and should forever remain, free and clear of and from all former and other gifts, sales, bargains, rights of dower, judgments, executions, titles, troubles, charges and incumbrances whatever, made, done, committed or suffered, by Threlkeld, or any other person or persons whatsoever; and 4. that Threlkeld and his heirs should and did thereby warrant the land to Bronaugh his heirs and assigns, against Threlkeld and Mary his wife and their heirs, and all and every other person and persons whatever: and that Bronaugh, having entered upon and being possessed of the land, by virtue of Threlkeld's conveyance thereof to him, by deed of lease and release, on the 3d April 1785, conveyed the premises, in fee, to the plaintiff's testator, Francis Fitzhugh, in his lifetime. And the plaintiff's alleged breaches of all the covenants: that Threlkeld, at the time of his conveyance to Bronaugh had not an estate in fee; and had not good and lawful power and right to convey; and that the premises were not and did not remain in the hands of Bronaugh and his assignee Fitzhugh, free from disturbance; and that Threlkeld and his heirs did not warrant and defend the premises to Bronaugh, his heirs and assigns, against himself and his wife Mary and their heirs, and against all persons whatever; but, on the contrary, the plaintiff's testator, Fitzhugh, in his lifetime, on the 6th October 1808, was lawfully evicted of two undivided third parts of the land by the judgment of the district court of Fredericksburg, in ejectment, and was ousted of the other undivided third by John Fox, in right of his wife, who as one of the children and heirs of Mary, the wife of Threlkeld, the bargainor and covenantor, had lawful title thereto paramount to Threlkeld, or Bronaugh or Fitzhugh claiming under him.

The defendant pleaded covenants not broken, and covenants performed: and on these pleas issues were made up.

453 *At the trial, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions to an instruction given by the court to the jury: whence it appeared, that the plaintiff gave in evidence, 1. A deed of bargain and sale, duly executed by Threlkeld, and signed by his wife Mary, purporting to be the deed of them both, dated the 6th July 1780, conveying, in consideration of £88. a parcel of land of the inheritance of the wife, to Bronaugh in fee, and containing the four covenants for assurance of the title, set forth in the declaration, with this difference only, that, in the deed, the covenants purported to be the covenants of both the husband and wife, that they were seized of the fee simple, that they had lawful right and power to convey &c. but the deed was never acknowledged by the wife, on privy examination according to law, and so was not binding on her. 2. A deed of lease and release, executed by Bronaugh, dated the 3d April 1785, conveying the same land to the plaintiff's testator, Fitzhugh, in fee. 3. The record of an ejectment, in the district court of Fredericksburg, brought by two of the heirs and co-parceners of Mary, the wife of Threlkeld, against the plaintiff's testator, Fitzhugh, for two undivided third parts of the land, so sold and conveyed by Threlkeld to Bronaugh, and by Bronaugh to Fitzhugh, in which action judgment was rendered, on the 6th October 1808, against Fitzhugh, in his lifetime, for two undivided third parts. 4. Proof, that after this judgment of eviction, Fitzhugh, on some ground of equity alleged by him, obtained an injunction in chancery, to stay execution of the same, which was pending till 1816, when the injunction was dissolved, and the bill dismissed at Fitzhugh's costs; and, a short time afterwards, Fitzhugh was ousted of the possession of the land. And 5. proof that the price of £88. given by Bronaugh to Threlkeld for the land, in 1780, was at the rate of twenty shillings the acre; that its average value from 1780 to 1808 was forty shillings per acre; and that, at the time of the judgment of eviction in October 1818, the value of the land (which had increased, not by any buildings or improvements put upon it, or cultivation, 454 *in the meantime, but in consequence only of the progressive rise in the price of lands) was equal to ten dollars the acre. Whereupon, the plaintiff's counsel moved for an instruction to the jury, that general good, to admit of doubt. RICHARDSON, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Click v. Green, 77 Va. 835.

The rule laid down in the principal case, as to the measure of damages to which the purchaser of land, upon eviction, is entitled, for breach of warranty of title, was also approved in Abernathy v. Phillips, 82 Va. 773, 1 S. E. Rep. 113; Conrad v. Eminger, 87 Va. 61, 12 S. E. Rep. 2; Tod v. Baylor, 4 Leigh 509, 511; Tabb v. Blanford, 4 Leigh 143; Jackson v. Turner, 5 Leigh 123, 124, 129, 131; Thompson v. Guthrie, 9 Leigh 106, 107; Norman v. Cunningham, 5 Gratt. 75; Roller v. Eminger, 88 Va. 641, 14 S. E. Rep. 347; Moreland v. Metz, 24 W. Va. 138; foot-note to Jackson v. Turner, 5 Leigh 119 (containing extract from Moreland v. Metz, 24 W. Va. 138); Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 454; foot-note to Thompson v. Guthrie, 9 Leigh 101 (containing extract from Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 454); Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 646, 11 S. E. Rep. 69; Stuart v. Pennis (Va.), 42 S. E. Rep. 667. The principal case was held in Eminger v. Kenney, 92 Va. 250, 23 S. E. Rep. 742, to have no application to such cases as the case at bar.

the proper measure of damages was the actual value of the land at the time of the above-mentioned judgment of eviction, namely, ten dollars per acre, with legal interest thereon from the date of the judgment of eviction: and it seemed, though it was not so expressly stated, that the court did so instruct the jury; and the defendant filed a bill of exception to the opinion, which was signed but not sealed by the judge.

The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed her damages to 1724 dollars 80 cents, conforming (as it appeared) with the direction of the court as to the measure of damages, and giving the value of the whole land instead of two thirds recovered of Fitzhugh in the ejectment mentioned in the bill of exceptions: and the court gave judgment accordingly: from which Threkeld's administrator appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee. Several points were discussed at the bar, but the main question, and the only one which the judges thought the case really presented, was, Whether upon a covenant of general warranty in a conveyance of lands, or any covenant for the assurance of the title against future eviction or disturbance, the proper standard of damages, in case of eviction, is the value of the land at the time of eviction, or the value of the land at the time of the warranty or covenant made, with interest thereon from the date of the eviction? And this question was argued upon principle and authority; but the judges discussed it so fully, that it would be superfluous to report the arguments of counsel.

CARR, J. The instruction of the circuit court as to the proper standard of damages, presents the only point on 455 *which this court is called to decide; and a most important point it is, entering into almost every sale of real estate. It was argued at the bar, as an open question; and, I think, properly; for, though in Mills v. Bell, 3 Call, 320; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & Munf. 164, and Humphreys's adm'r v. McClanahan's adm'r, 1 Munf. 493, the point was incidentally touched, it was certainly not before the court, nor at all involved in the decision of those cases. It is a settled rule, that these obiter dicta cannot be received as authority; a rule founded in sound reason, and, instead of detracting from the respect due to judges, necessary for the preservation of that respect; for when the mind is deeply engaged in the investigation of a particular subject, we know how eagerly we seize on any position, which strikes us as illustrating it, by analogy or otherwise, without inquiring into the correctness of such position, or following out its consequences, with that care and accuracy of discrimination, which we feel bound to bestow on the main question. There is another case, Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 132, in which this question was before the court, and elaborately argued by the judges: but there, the court consisted of three members only, and one dissenting, the judgment, according to our rule, does not settle the law.

In considering this subject, it seems proper to look back to the course of proceeding upon the ancient warranty, where the land was lost by eviction; for, though that course has long since become obsolete, it may reflect some light upon our path. We are told by Coke, 1 Inst. 365, a. that "a warrantie, is a covenant real annexed to lands or tenements, whereby a man and his heirs are bound to warrant the same, and either upon voucher, or by judgment in a writ of warrantia chartæ, to yield other lands and tenements to the value of those that shall be evicted by a former title." The value, at what time? All the old books tell us, at the time when the warranty was made. Thus Bracton (Lib. 5, cap. 13, § 3), says, Si autem de excambio fieri debet extensio et estimatio, estimari debet 456 res quæ amittitur, in eo statu in quo fuit quando primo data fuit. Non enim admittitur melioratio tenentis qui amisit, ut si post feoffamentum suum, ipse vel antecessores sui ibi ampla construxerit ædificia, sicut castra, parcos vel vivaria. Thus Viner, vol. 22; Voucher, T. b. pl. 1, 2, p. 145, "a man shall recover in value, according to the value of the land at the time of the warranty made;" "as if the land be of greater value than it was at, the warranty made, by finding of a mine of lead or tin, he shall not render in value according to that, but as it was at the warranty made;" and he cites 19 H. VI. 46, 61; 3 E. III. 14, b. "So, if improved by building or otherwise;" Br. Voucher, pl. 69. "If the tenant be impleaded and vouches me, and at the grand cape ad valentiam, I come and cannot bar the demandant, I shall take issue with the tenant, of what value the land was at the time of the warranty, and shall not render more in value." Id. Ibid. "In no case was land, taken by purchase at all liable, nor was a person bound to warranty beyond the value of the land at the time of the donation." 1 Reeve's Engl. law 448; Ballet v. Ballet, Godb. 151, was a case of warrantia chartæ in the time of James I. and on demurrer, the court held, that if there be new buildings, of which the warranty is demanded, which were not at the time of the warranty made, and the deed is shewn, the defendant ought not to demur, but shew the special matter, and enter into the warranty for so much as was at the date of the deed, and not for the residue. I might cite other authorities, but it is useless to incumber the case with them: the doctrine is settled beyond all question, that the warrantor was liable only for the value of the lands lost, at the date of the warranty; and that he rendered that value in lands valued at the date of the eviction. This last is clear from all the forms of the writ of habere facias ad valentiam to be found in Rastall, Bracton &c.

Thus stood the law, while the ancient covenant real, the technical warranty, prevailed in the transfer of real estate; but that has long since given way to cov- 457 enants personal, introduced *into more modern conveyances, such as covenants of seisin, for quiet enjoyment &c. &c. These have rendered the remedy more simple, as well as more efficient; for they bind the personalty, as well as the realty. Thus Blackstone (vol. II. p. 304), tells us, "If he (the vendor) covenant for his executor and administrators, his personal assets, as well as his real, are pledged for the performance of the covenant, which makes such covenant a better security than any warranty; and it has therefore in modern practice, totally superseded the other." But have these personal covenants abrogated also the fixed and settled rule of the common law, with respect to the measure of damages? Have they established the value at eviction, as the standard, instead of the value at the warranty? Where is the evidence of this? I have looked for it in vain: I cannot find a trace of it in any elementary writer or reporter in England. Is not this, though negative evidence, strong to disprove the existence of such a change? When Blackstone, for instance, was speaking of the preference of these personal covenants, in the increased security they furnish, is it conceivable that he would have omitted to notice a change still more important, which they had effected, in destroying the old standard of damages, and erecting a new one? It belonged directly to the subject he was treating. Where are we to look for the common law, but in the opinions of the judges, and the treatises of learned men? In these depositories we find abundant evidence of the old rule, but not a vestige of the new one; nothing which indicates a change: on the contrary, the english cases which I have found, subsequent to the introduction of personal covenants, though few and meager, do, so far as they go, support the ancient rule. Thus, in Pomery v. Partington, 3 T. R. 665, one holding under a will which gave a power of leasing part of the estate, demised to P. for ninety-nine years, a moiety of the tithes of corn and grain in St. Nyot in Cornwall. On the death of the lessor, the heir general of the deviser brought ejectment against P. and recovered the tithes. P.

458 *sued the executors of his lessor on the covenant of title in his deed. On the trial at nisi prius, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon a special case. The main question argued before the court of king's bench, was, whether the power in the will authorised a lease of the tithes? The court decided that it did not. The question then arose, whether P. should recover £30. which he had paid for the lease, and the costs of the ejectment, which would amount to £125. 17. 2. or whether the measure of his damages, should be the value of his interest in the term at the death of his lessor, which with the costs of the ejectment would amount to £500. The court said, that unless the counsel agreed upon the sum to be taken as damages, they must send the cause back to a jury to have the quantum of damages assessed; but as far as they could hint any opinion on the subject, they thought that the plaintiff ought only to take the smaller sum: on which it was agreed that the verdict should be entered for the £125. 17. 2. This case shews, that the old rule was recognized both by court and bar, as the true one. And if it be urged, that there was neither an argument at the bar, nor a regular opinion of the court on the point,

I answer, this is evidence that it was thought too clear and too well settled for argument. Can we suppose, that if the question had been considered either new or doubtful, the counsel for the plaintiff would have surrendered three fourths of the damages they claimed, upon the mere suggestion of the opinion of the court? Again: In Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Blacks. 1078, Flureau, at an auction, bought a rent of £26. 1. 0. per annum for a term of thirty-two years. It was knocked down to him at £270. and he paid as a deposit £54. On looking into the title, the defendant could not make it out, but offered to the plaintiff either that he might take the title such as it was, or receive back his deposit, with interest and costs; but the plaintiff insisted on a further sum for damages in the loss of so good a bargain. The jury, contrary to the direction of the judge, gave a verdict *for £74. 15. 6. allowing £20. for damages. On a motion for a new trial, De Grey, C. J., said, "I think the verdict wrong in point of law. Upon a contract for a purchase, if the title proves bad, and the vender is, (without fraud,) incapable of making a good one, I do not think, that the purchaser can be intitled to any damages for the fancied goodness of the bargain, which he supposes he has lost." The other judges were of the same opinion, and a new trial was granted. This case, though different in circumstances, seems to me to recognize the same principle which governed Pomery v. Partington. I will cite one other case, Lewis v. Campbell, 8 Taunt. 715; 3 B. & A. 392; 4 Eng. com. law rep. 258; 5 Id. 322. Barclay demised certain premises to Campbell, for twenty-one years: Campbell assigned his interest to Corp, who assigned to the plaintiff. Upon the assignment by Campbell to Corp, he covenanted with Corp and his assigns, for the quiet enjoyment of the premises. Barclay afterwards, for a forfeiture of the term, incurred by Campbell, entered upon and ejected the plaintiff, who sued Campbell upon his covenant for quiet enjoyment. In his declaration, the plaintiff stated as his damages, 1. the loss of the premises: 2. the sum of £300. which he had been forced to expend in endeavouring to defend his possession: 3. other large sums, expended in altering, improving and ornamenting the premises; in all, amounting to £2000. At the trial, it was proved, that the plaintiff had made several additions, consisting of coach houses, and out buildings, and had converted the lands into pleasure grounds; that the value of the property at the time of the assignment to Corp was £300. and that the value of the additions and alterations was £450. The jury having found a verdict for £750. it was objected, that the plaintiff could not recover more than the value of the premises at the time of the defendant's assignment to Corp; and this question was reserved for the opinion of the court. On the argument in bank, two points were made; 1. whether this was a covenant running with the land; 2. whether the verdict 460 *should not be reduced to £300? The court decided that it was a covenant running with the land: and Dallas, C. J., said, "Then as to the second point, I very much doubt, whether in any case, plaintiff can recover for the improvements and buildings he may choose to make and erect upon the land; but whether damages in respect of money expended in such improvements and buildings, can or cannot in any case be recovered, I am of opinion, that they cannot be recovered in this case, as the declaration is insufficient." All the court were of opinion to reduce the verdict to £300. the other judges going upon the insufficiency of the declaration, without speaking to the point generally. These are the cases I have met with in the english books: their tendency certainly is, to support the rule so clearly shewn to have been established under the old technical warranty. Upon the ground of authority, then, it seems to me, that we ought to receive this rule as a part of the common law.

But suppose this not so, and we were now about to establish a rule as to compensation for eviction of real estate, what would be the best and safest rule, looking at the same time, to a just exposition of the covenants in the deed, and the general convenience of the community? I strongly incline to think it would be, the purchase money with interest, and the costs of eviction; I mean, interest for such time as the covenantee is liable, on eviction, to be called on for rents and profits; for so long as he receives these to his own use, they stand instead of interest. We have seen that under the old covenant real, the rule was, the value of the land lost at the date of the warranty. Upon what ground was this so settled? It was not, that the ancient warranty was less comprehensive in its terms than the modern covenants: the warrantor bound himself to defend the land to the warrantee, his heirs and assigns, against the claims of all persons whatever. It was not, that feudal principles governed the decision: they, perhaps, so far operated as to make it a recovery in kind, land for land; but they could not at all have influenced the question, whether the land should be valued at 461 the date of the warranty, or the eviction. Why then was it restricted to the date of the warranty? I concur with chief justice Tilghman, who says, in Bender v. Fromberger, 4 Dall. 443. "The reason appears to be, that the intention of the parties was so understood, that the warranty should be limited to the value of the land, at the time of the executing the deed." If we consider the personal covenants (of good title, for quiet enjoyment, to warrant and defend the premises &c.) as inventions of the legal profession (which they no doubt were), what reason have we to suppose, that they meant to change the ancient rule? They found it established: they were habituated to it: they have used no words in the new covenants which indicate an intended change. Those covenants are not larger: they bind the personal estate, it is true, but not to answer damages larger or smaller, or in any manner different from the covenant real. But stripping the contract of its legal clothing, what is it that the parties, the vendor and vendee, mean? When land is sold, the existing state of things, the present value and situation of the land, are the subjects in the minds of the parties: it is this land as it now is, that is bought and sold and warranted. Is it not most natural, then, to suppose that the parties mean, that the purchase money, the standard of value to which they have both agreed in the sale, shall be the measure of compensation if the land be lost? They seldom look into futurity to speculate upon the chances of a rise or fall in value. If they did, the views of buyer and seller would probably be very different; and, whatever they might be, could form no part of the contract, nor enter into its construction. What is it that the seller warrants? the land itself. Does this warranty, either by force of its terms, or by the intention of the parties, extend to any future value, which the lands may reach, when they have become the site of a populous city, are covered with expensive buildings, or mines of gold have been found in their bowels? such a state of things was probably not dreamed of. And how can these subsequent accessions be the subject of a warranty, made when they had no existence, nor were ever in the contemplation of the parties?

462 *But let us look at the rule, with an eye, to public convenience. This is by far the most important point of view. It is much better for the community, that a rule should be simple, clear and certain, than that it should attain exact justice. Upon the subject before us, we can establish no general rule, which will not, in particular cases, operate hardly. Those who contend for the value at eviction, as the best rule, do not, I believe, extend it to all cases; if so extended, it would be harsh beyond endurance. Numerous cases may be stated, where a party selling what he considers a barren worthless piece of ground for a trifling sum, may be called on for tens of thousands of dollars, and overwhelmed with ruin. But the difficulty here is, that if you do not go the whole length of the principle, you can have nothing like certainty. Say, for instance (with Justinian), that cases of extraordinary increase, and of very expensive improvements, shall be excepted from the rule; how will you draw the line? how present to buyers and sellers, that fixed standard, by an appeal to which they may ascertain, to what amount they will be bound, in any warranty they may make upon a contract of sale? It is impossible. A rule, thus surrounded with difficulty, danger and uncertainty, cannot be a safe one for the community. Look, then, at the rule of the common law; the purchase money, with such interest as is before stated, and the cost of the suit, by which the vendee was evicted. Here all is simple and certain. The vendor sells for a certain sum, and believing his title perfect, he warrants: all this is done in good faith (for if there be fraud or concealment the rule is different): the purchaser has precisely the same means of ascertaining the soundness of title, as the vendor: he may call in counsel to examine the chain of title. The parties know what to count on: if there shall be an eviction, at whatever time, the vendor knows what he is to pay; the vendee, what he is to receive. If the vendee does not choose to rely on the common covenants, but to be secured also for the increase in value of the land, and any improvements he may put on it, let him insist on 463 particular covenants, expressly guarantying to him such increase and improvements?

I think, upon the whole, that in all cases where the parties have relied on the usual covenants only, the best and safest rule is, the purchase money with interest (as before qualified) and costs of suit. And I rest on this conclusion with tenfold confidence, when looking to the different states, I find their able and enlightened judges (so far as I have seen their decisions) coming to the same conclusion, with the exception of two states only. In Kentucky, see Cox v. Strode, 2 Bibb, 279; Booker v. Bell, 3 Id. 177. In Tennessee, Talbot v. Bedford, Cook's Rep. 447. In South Carolina, some early cases were contrary; but in Furman v. Elmore, 2 Nott and M'Cord, 189, the court of appeals of that state took up the subject, and after an elaborate discussion, established the common law rule: and in Ware v. Weathnall, 2 M'Cord, 413, the doctrine was again examined, and the point considered as settled. In North Carolina, the case of Phillips v. Smith, 1 No. Carolina Repos. 475, establishes the same rule. In Pennsylvania, in the case of Bender v. Fromberger, 4 Dall. 441, the subject was investigated with great learning and ability, and the common law rule settled. And it was approved in New York, after very profound examinations of the subject, in Staats v. Ten Eyck, 3 Cain, 111, and Pitcher v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Rep. 1. The exceptions are Massachusetts and Connecticut: Gore v. Brazier, 3 Mass. Rep. 543, and Horsford v. Wright, Kirby's Conn. Rep. 3. In both these cases, the judges admit the common law rule to be as I have stated; but, in the first, chief justice Parsons goes upon the early and settled practice of the state, a legislative interpretation &c. and, in the last, the court puts it on the practice simply. I think the judgment should be reversed.

GREEN, J. Some objections unconnected with the principle assumed by the instruction excepted to, were made at the bar to the finding of the jury. It was said, 464 that the "proofs set out in the bill of exceptions, only shewed an eviction of two thirds of the premises, and that the damages assessed obviously embraced the whole. I do not think we can notice the objection here, as it was not made in the court below, and, especially, as the declaration alleges an eviction of two thirds by judgment, and of the residue by the entry of one having a superiour title, and the bill of exceptions states that it was proved, that, a short time after the dissolution of the injunction in 1816, Fitzhugh was ousted from the possession of the land, in general terms. If the legality of the entry made under the superiour title, as to the one third not recovered in this ejectment, was intended to be questioned, it should have been done in some more distinct form.

From the exceptions it appears, that none of the covenants of Threlkeld's deed were broken, except that of warranty; for he and his wife were seized of a fee simple estate, and had full power to convey it; nor was there any former gift &c. or incumbrance of or upon the land, made or suffered thereon afterwards by them, or any other: so that the case presents in the simplest form, the question discussed in Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 132, as to the proper measure of damages, for the breach of a covenant of warranty. I have reconsidered that question, and my opinion remaining unchanged, I shall add but little to what I said on that occasion.

Since the decision of that case, I have met with that of Pomery v. Partington, 3 T. R. 665, (which, though as far as I recollect, it has not been cited in any of the american cases upon this subject, seems to me to have a strong bearing upon the question,) and the case of Campbell v. Lewis, 8 Taunt. 715. [He stated the circumstances of those cases, very particularly.] I think the clear inference from these cases is, that in Westminster hall this question was considered as settled beyond any reasonable doubt, and that the value at the time of eviction never occurred either to court or 465 counsel, as affording the proper criterion of damages. *The counsel for the plaintiff, in the first case, claimed the value at the time when the title, which was good for the life of the lessor, failed by his death, and when the plaintiff became liable to eviction, and referred not at all to the time of eviction. This value, without interest, although many years had elapsed since the death of the lessor and the subsequent eviction, together with the costs of the ejectment, was all he asked for his client. He readily yielded three fourths of that claim to the slight suggestion of the court. The rule adopted for the adjustment of the damages, was, to allow the costs, added to the price given for the property, with interest thereon from the time when the title of the lessor, and of course that of the lessee, ceased, and the latter became accountable to the true owner, for the profits, which he might have subsequently received; stopping the interest at the time of the actual eviction, namely, the time of rendering the judgment in the ejectment (which being for the recovery of an incorporeal hereditament, virtually executed itself) and not carrying on the interest up to the time of the judgment in the action of covenant, although many years had intervened between the two judgments. I have supposed, that the interest on the purchase money, was allowed only from the time of the lessor's death, though the report of the case is silent as to the time from which it was allowed; because there can be no conceivable reason, why interest should have been allowed during the life of the lessor, since the lessee during his life, had and enjoyed, without being answerable for the profits to any one, an absolute and indefeasible right to the titles under the lease.

The case at bar, in which the value of the land has not been increased by improvements in buildings, or by cultivation, or by any accidental circumstance, other than the gradual increase in the value of lands generally, is very well adapted to the practical illustration of the principle, upon which damages should be estimated in cases of warranty and eviction. The purchaser from Threlkeld, and 466 *those claiming under him, enjoyed the profits of the land from 1780 to 1816, by virtue of his deed, and their possession acquired and held under it only, and for a greater part of that time (as long as Threlkeld's marital rights existed), with a clear title, and irresponsible to any one for the rents and profits received during that part of the time. Neither does it appear, that they have been subjected to the payment of any part of the rents and profits to the successful claimants: indeed, if no suit was brought against Fitzhugh or his executrix for profits, before the institution of this action (in 1823) they were then completely protected from any future demand on that account, by the statute of limitations, unless any of the claimants fell within some of the exceptions in the statute. Supposing the annual profits of the land to have been equal to the legal interest on its value, let us see the effect of the principle adopted by the circuit court, and ascertain the gain and loss of the purchaser, in consequence of the purchase and eviction. The average value of the land, from 1780 to 1808, was forty shillings, and afterwards ten dollars per acre: and in May 1798, the legal rate of interest was increased by one per cent. Upon these data, the purchaser was out of pocket, the amount of the purchase money and interest (allowing the intermediate increase in the rate of interest) at the time of the actual eviction in 1816, 882 dollars 73 cents; and he had received profits to the amount of 1313 dollars 8 cents; a difference arising from the increase of the rate of interest, and of the value of the land, both operating in his favor: in addition to which, the principle adopted by the circuit court gave him to be paid by the vendor, the value of the land in 1808, at ten dollars per acre, with interest thereon from October 1808, amounting to 1724 dollars 80 cents; making in all 3037 dollars 88 cents, more than three times as much as his actual loss, except the costs which he had expended in defending the title.

In Stout v. Jackson, I had occasion to collect and refer to many cases, shewing that after the statutes in England, 467 *allowing costs and damages in real actions, the warrantee upon voucher on warrantia chartæ, was entitled upon eviction, to recover not only the value of the land, as it was at the time of the warranty made, but the damages recovered against him, which damages included costs, for they were considered as damages, and assessed with them. And this is, in general, all that the warrantee can be said to have lost, in consequence of the warrantor failing to maintain his title, and the only loss that can be in the contemplation of the parties when they enter into their contract.

I think, therefore, that this judgment should be reversed, with a declaration, that the true measure of damages, is the value of the land at the time of the conveyance made in 1780, to be ascertained by the price given, if no better proof be offered, with interest thereon from the time Fitzhugh was actually evicted, (not by the judgment of 1808, for that was no eviction, he continuing still to hold and enjoy the land under Threlkeld's deed; but by the actual entry of the true owners after the dissolution of the injunction) and the costs incurred by him in defending his title, and also any damages which may have been recovered against him, by those who evicted him, or which they may be now shewn to be clearly entitled to recover against his estate.

COALTER, J. I have the misfortune to differ from all my brethren upon this interesting question. My view of the subject was very fully stated in the case of Stout v. Jackson. My opinion remains unchanged. And I have nothing material to add to the reasoning upon which the opinion I entertained in that case (and still entertain) was founded.

CABELL, J. This case presents the important question discussed in Stout v. Jackson, as to the proper standard of damages, in an action of covenant for the breach of a covenant to warrant and defend the title of land sold and conveyed in fee simple; whether the proper standard be the value of the land, at the time of the sale, or at the time of the eviction?

468 *As the covenants inserted in modern deeds, were introduced as auxiliary to or substitutes for the ancient clause of warranty, it is important to ascertain the effect of the latter, before we proceed to decide the effect of the former. It is undeniable, that the only recompense for the breach of a strict technical warranty, was a recovery of lands of equal value, by voucher, or writ of warrantia chartæ. If there were no lands, the warrantee was without remedy. I think it equally certain that, in estimating the value of the land lost by the warrantee, for the purpose of determining how much land was to be given to him in exchange or by way of recompense, the value was estimated as it was at the time of making the deed. The authorities have been cited by my brother Carr. Indeed, I do not understand that any one contends, that, either on voucher or writ of warrantia chartæ, any increased value on account of buildings, or discovery of mines &c. was to be taken into the estimate: and it would seem to me, that, if the purchaser of lands was not to be compensated by the warrantor, for the value of even necessary buildings, on which he had expended his own money, he would have still less claim to be compensated for the increased value of the land growing out of accidental circumstances happening after the purchase. And the law is so laid down in the year book, 30 E. III., 14, b; 22 Vin. abr. Voucher, T. b, pl. 4, p. 145. 'If a man grants a ward, which creates a warranty in law, if after the grant other lands descend to the ward, by which he is of much greater value, yet he shall not render in value according to that, but only according to the value at the warranty created, though all the ward and marriage passes at the warranty created; for it is better by the descent after.' Such, then, was the effect of the ancient clause of warranty, viz. that the person evicted was to be compensated only in lands, and that the value of the lands lost was to be estimated as at the time when the deed was made; and this compensation could only be recovered on voucher or warrantia chartæ.

469 *And thus the law continued, until comparatively modern times, when personal covenants were introduced into conveyances of land, as auxiliary to or as substitutes for the ancient warranty. Blackstone, in his commentaries (vol. II., p. 304), states the reason for the introduction of them, and says, that "the personal assets, as well as the real, are likewise pledged for the performance of the covenant; which makes such covenant a better security than any warranty." If, by these covenants, it was intended to change the standard of compensation, or if these covenants, or any of them, have really had that effect, it is very strange that so accurate a writer should have failed to advert to it; particularly, when he was engaged in detailing the comparative advantages of the covenants on one side, and of the warranty on the other. But Blackstone is not singular in his silence as to any such effect of the modern covenants. I have met with no such intimation in any book of english law; nor have I seen, even a complaint of the ancient standard of compensation. If so important a change in the law had been effected by the introduction of these covenants, it is impossible that the books should afford no traces of it. I infer, therefore, confidently, that though these covenants give a claim to a compensation in money, and not in land, and though they bind the personal as well as the real estate of the warrantor, for that compensation, yet the standard of compensation, based upon the principles of justice and sound policy, has undergone no change, but remains, as formerly, the value of the land at the time of making the deed. The land, as it then stood, was the subject of the contract between the parties: it was all that the vendor sold, and all that the purchaser bought: its then value was all that the purchaser paid, and all that the vendor received: it is, therefore, all that the purchaser ought to reclaim from the vendor, in case he loses the land. This standard is strongly recommended by its certainty, also: the parties know the ground on which it places them, and that ground is not liable to be changed by chance or accident.

470 *It is said, however, that an action of covenant lies on these covenants; and that, in covenant, the plaintiff is entitled to recover according to the loss he has really sustained. This position is sometimes found in the books. But it is not to be understood literally. There are very few cases, if any, in which the damages, even in ordinary actions of covenant, are not regulated by certain fixed rules, without any regard to the actual loss sustained by the party. Thus, in all covenants for the payment of money, the money which ought to have been paid, with the interest upon it, is the true standard of the damages recovered, though the damages actually sustained may have been a hundred times greater. In all executory contracts for the delivery of personal property, at a future day, the established standard of damages, is the value of the property, at the time and place, when and where it ought to have been delivered. In all executory contracts for the conveyance of land at a future time, the established measure of damages, according to the unvarying decisions of this court, is the purchase money. So, also, as I conceive, the law has wisely ordered, that on a covenant to warrant and defend the title of land, the standard of damages shall be the value of the land, at the time of the sale, as ascertained by the purchase money, where that can be known.

I do not say that this rule is perfect, or that it will, in its application, be always free from objection: that merit cannot be claimed for any human regulation. But I am of opinion, that it is the rule which the law has established, and is the best rule that could have been established. If the parties choose to agree upon a different rule, it is competent to them to do so, by suitable special stipulations. In the absence of such special stipulations, the general rule must prevail.

I have only to add one other remark, in relation to the severity with which, it is supposed, the rule may sometimes operate on the purchaser of land, who, on the faith of his purchase, has erected valuable 471 improvements thereon. It is true, that the rule absolves the fair vendor from all obligation to pay for them. But it does not follow that the vendee will always be without redress. Judge Green, in Stout v. Jackson, has shewn how far he may, even in a court of law, set off the value of the improvements against the claim for mesne profits. But courts of equity will, sometimes, go much farther, and will not permit the rightful owner of the land to have the benefit of the improvements, without making a just compensation for them. And this court has gone so far as to restrict the claim of even the rightful owner of the land, to the value of the land in its unimproved state; permitting both the land and the improvements to remain with the person who made the improvements, or in the hands of his assignee. Southall v. McKeand, 1 Wash. 336. How far courts of equity will extend relief in other cases, remains to be decided when suitable cases shall present the question. Upon the whole, I am for reversing the judgment.

BROOKE, P. If the bill of exceptions in this record, though only signed, not sealed, by the judge as the statute requires (1 Rev. Code, ch. 133), is to be considered as properly allowed by the judge; and it is also to be intended, that he gave the instruction to the jury, which was asked for by the appellee's counsel, though it is not expressly stated in the bill of exceptions that he did so; then, this case presents the point, which was very elaborately argued, and decided, by a majority of the court (though I did not think the precise question arose) in the case of Stout v. Jackson. Upon that point, I have very little to add to what I said in that case. I think, after the greater light which has been shed on the subject by the bar and the bench, it must be admitted, that the value in land, recovered by the warrantee on a technical warranty at common law, was the value of the land warranted at the time the conveyance with warranty was executed. This, I think, is fully demonstrated by the pleadings to be found in the old books, to which I referred in my opinion in 472 Stout v. Jackson. And that the *land recovered by the warrantee, as compensation for that which was warranted to him and of which he had been evicted, was valued as at the time of the eviction, is also demonstrated, I think, by the forms of the process, by which he was put into possession of the land recovered in lieu of the land lost. The writs of habere facias seisinam ad valentiam directed the sheriff to deliver lands of a certain annual value, at the then present value, I presume, since no other time was referred to by the writ. This being the settled law as to the measure of compensation for the breach of the ancient technical warranty, the question is, whether the covenants introduced into conveyances at a later period, were intended to give the covenantee an indemnity of a greater value than that given by the technical warranty? I think it quite obvious, that these covenants were introduced for a very different purpose; not to increase the amount of the indemnity in case of eviction, but to supply some defects in the technical warranty. That gave no remedy against the personal estate of the warrantor: it could be enforced only against the warrantor and his heirs: and if there were lands in the seisin of the warrantor, when the habere facias seisinam ad valentiam issued, there could be no recovery against him. So, also, when the writ of warrantia chartæ was resorted to, the warranty was unavailing, if the warrantor had no lands at the time of the writ purchased. F. N. B. 134. These were obvious objections to a reliance on the old warranty alone, for indemnity upon eviction of the land warranted, which became glaring when personal property came to be of more consideration, than in ancient times when the warranty was relied on for indemnity. The argument, that personal covenants having been introduced for the assurance of the title, these ought to be governed by the general principles of the common law touching other covenants, is plausible, but not sound. In a case in which there is a technical warranty and these personal covenants also, if the law applicable to the warranty might be departed from, and the law applicable to covenants 473 in other cases *might be applied to the personal covenants for the assurance of the title, an advantage would be given to the covenantee, which was certainly not in the contemplation of the parties: if the lands have fallen in value, he may resort to the warranty to recover the value at the time of the conveyance: if they have risen, he may resort to the personal covenants, to recover the value at the time of eviction. Now, it is impossible the parties should have intended, that there should be two measures of compensation. For these reasons, and for those which I stated in Stout v. Jackson, I think it very clear, that the personal covenants introduced into modern conveyances, were so introduced only for the purposes above mentioned, and not with any view to vary or increase the amount of the indemnity to the covenantee; and the case of Pomery v. Partington satisfies me, that such is the understanding of the law on the subject in Westminster hall. I conclude, therefore, that the true measure of damages, is the value of the land at the time of the warranty or covenants executed, and that the amount of the purchase money ascertains that value, unless a greater value can be proved; to which may be added the damages recovered of the warrantee or covenantee, upon his eviction. Whether he may also recover interest on the purchase money, will depend on the amount of the profits recovered of him; if none have been recovered, no interest should be allowed, as the profits will generally be an equivalent for the interest.

The judgment entered by this court was to the following effect: The court is of opinion, that, upon the facts stated in the bill of exceptions, the true measure of damages was the price given for the land at the time of the conveyance thereof by Threlkeld to Bronaugh, with interest thereon from the date of the actual eviction of Fitzhugh, by the entry of those entitled, and the costs expended by him in the action in which he was evicted, and such damages as he or his representatives may have paid, or may be shewn to be clearly liable to pay: and that the judgment is erroneous. 474 *Therefore, it is considered, that the same be reversed &c. And it is ordered, that the verdict be set aside, and the cause remanded &c. for a new trial to be had therein, upon which no such instruction as that stated in the bill of exceptions, is to be given.

Pleasants v. Clements.

February, 1831.

New Trial—Order Refusing or Granting—Review by Appellate Court.—As an appellate court will review an order of an inferior court overruling a motion for a new trial, and reverse the proceedings of new trial improperly refused, so it will review an order granting a new trial, and reverse proceedings if improperly granted.

Same—Erroneous Advice of Counsel.—An affidavit of a party, that he failed to summon material witnesses at the trial, owing to advice of counsel that their testimony was not necessary, no ground to set aside verdict and grant new trial.

Appellate Practice—New Trial Improperly Granted.—If appellate court reverses judgment, on ground that new trial has been previously improperly

New Trial—Order Refusing or Granting—Review by Appellate Court.—Whatever may be the practice in other States, it is well settled in this state, that the court of appeals may review the action of a circuit court in either granting or refusing a new trial in a common-law suit. Tompkins v. Stephens, 10 W. Va. 167, citing principal case; Briscoe v. Clarke, 1 Rand. 218, and Knox v. Garland, 2 Call 241. See also, foot-note to Knox v. Garland, 2 Call 242; monographic note on "New Trials" appended to Boswell v. Jones, 1 Wash. 822.

‡Appellate Practice—Two Trials in Lower Court.—The rule of the appellate court, where there have been two trials of a case in the lower court, is to look only to the proceedings on the first trial, and if it discovers that the trial court erred in setting aside the verdict on that trial, to set aside and granted, it will examine the proceedings of the trial set aside, and if it find error in them reverse and correct them, otherwise affirm them.

Action at Law—Evidence—Depositions Taken in Chancery Suit.—On the trial of an action at law, depositions taken in a suit in chancery between the same parties, are not proper evidence, unless the witnesses be dead, or otherwise not capable of attending the trial.

Same—Same—Decree in Chancery Suit.—A suit in chancery and decree therein, can neither be pleaded in bar, nor given in evidence, in an action at law between the same parties, unless the very same matter of controversy was involved in both suits, and unless the court of chancery had competent jurisdiction to decide the matter.

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Therefore, where P. filed bill in chancery against C. charging fraud practised by defendant in sale of a slave, and praying that the contract might be rescinded, and that C. might be enjoined from taking measures to recover the purchase money of P. and the bill was dismissed on a hearing; and then P. brought an action at law against C. to recover damages for breach of warranty of the soundness of the slave: Held, the proceedings and decree in the suit in chancery could neither be pleaded by C. in bar of the action at law, nor was the record thereof admissible evidence on the trial of the action at law.

This was an action on the case, brought in the hustings court of Lynchburg, by J. H. Pleasants against Eliza Clements, upon a parol warranty of the soundness of a slave sold by the defendant to the plaintiff.

475 *There were two counts in the declaration. The first stated that the plaintiff bargained with the defendant to buy a male slave of her for 375 dollars, payable twelve months after the date of the sale, and that the defendant falsely and fraudulently warranting the said slave to be sound and in good health, sold him to the plaintiff for the price aforesaid; whereas, in truth, the slave was, at the time, and thenceforth always continued, incurably afflicted with scrofula; by means of which premises, the defendant falsely and fraudulently deceived the plaintiff in the sale of the slave aforesaid. The second count stated, that the plaintiff bargained with the defendant to buy the slave of her, and that she, by falsely and fraudulently warranting him to be sound, induced the plaintiff to buy him of her; whereas, in truth, the slave was, at the time, and thenceforth always continued, incurably afflicted with scrofula; and so the defendant falsely and annul all the proceedings subsequent to said verdict, and enter judgment thereon. Muse v. Stern, 82 Va. 33; Jones v. Old Dominion Cotton Mills, 82 Va. 149; Tucker v. Sandridge, 86 Va. 557, 8 S. E. Rep. 650.

In Johnson v. McClung, 26 W. Va. 661, it is said: "It is well settled, that, where a case is tried and a verdict is rendered, which is set aside by the court, and a new trial is granted, and on the second trial the verdict is for the other party, and judgment is rendered thereon, to which a writ of error is obtained, the appellate court will look to the proceedings on both trials, and if the court below erred in setting aside the first verdict, the appellate court without considering the subsequent proceedings in the case will reverse the judgment and enter final judgment on the first verdict. Pleasants v. Clements, 2 Leigh 474; Knox v. Garland, 2 Call 241; Briscoe v. Clarke, 1 Rand. 218; Tyler v. Taylor, 21 Gratt. 700." To the same effect, the principal case was cited in Tyler v. Taylor, 21 Gratt. 702, and foot-note.

By statute (Pol. Suppl. § 3484), it is provided that where there have been two trials in the lower court, the appellate court shall look first to the evidence and proceedings on the first trial, and if it discovers that the court erred in setting aside the verdict on that trial it shall set aside and annul all proceedings subsequent to said verdict and enter judgment thereon.

fraudulently deceived the plaintiff in the sale &c. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and on that plea issue was joined.

At the first trial of the issue, the defendant offered in evidence, the record of a former suit brought by the plaintiff against her, in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, wherein, as she alleged, the very matter in controversy in this action, had been decided and concluded by the decree of the chancellor. The bill in chancery was exhibited by Pleasants before the purchase money of the slave fell due, and was verified by his oath: he set forth his contract with Mrs. Clements for the purchase of the slave, and that she, by her agent who made the sale to him, represented that the slave was sound and healthy, and that though he had been afflicted with the malady called the king's evil, he was intirely restored to health; that he was induced by these representations to purchase the property, at the price of 375 dollars, payable twelve months after the date of the sale, for which he gave his note negotiable and payable at the bank of Virginia at Lynchburg; that he took possession of the slave, but soon found he was incurably diseased with scrofula, and unable to endure the lightest labour, so that 476 *he became and must continue a charge upon him, instead of being at all serviceable; that Mrs. Clements was well apprised, at the time of the sale, of the unsoundness of the slave; and that he had proposed to her to cancel the contract, restore the property, and pay reasonable compensation for the time he had held it, but no answer had been returned to this proposition: and the bill prayed an injunction to restrain Mrs. Clements from transferring or negotiating the note which Pleasants had given her for the purchase money of the property, and from causing the note to be protested at bank for non-payment at its maturity; and an injunction also to restrain the bank from protesting it; and general relief. Mrs. Clements, in her answer, denied all the material allegations of the bill. The depositions of sundry witnesses were taken by both parties, and filed (these were, of course, part of the record offered in evidence). The chancellor, on a hearing, dismissed the bill with costs. Upon this record being offered in evidence by the defendant at the trial of this action, Pleasants objected that it was inadmissible, and the court sustained the objection, and excluded the evidence; to which Mrs. Clements filed exceptions. The trial proceeded; but as the jury could not agree in any verdict, the jury was by consent of parties discharged, and the cause continued it till the next term.

When the cause was called at the next term, Mrs. Clements tendered a special plea in bar, as follows, viz. Action non, "because the defendant says, that the matter in controversy in this suit has been fully heard and decided against the plaintiff, in a suit heretofore instituted and determined in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose, wherein the plaintiff in this action was plaintiff, and the defendant here was defendant, the decree in which suit in chancery was not appealed from, and remains in full force and unreversed; and this the defendant is ready to verify by the record and proceedings of the said suit in chancery &c. Wherefore &c." But the court would not allow the plea to be put in; to which Mrs. Clements filed exceptions.

477 *The cause was then tried upon the plea of not guilty. Mrs. Clements again offered the record of the suit in chancery in evidence, the court again excluded it, and she again excepted to the opinion. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for 300 dollars damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

But the next day, Mrs. Clements filed an affidavit to the following effect: That H. F. and J. H. of Powhatan county, were, as she was informed and verily believed, two of the commissioners who divided her father's estate, and with others had appraised the slave she had sold to Pleasants, the subject of this controversy; and she was informed by her mother, that this slave in the division and appraisement, was valued as a healthy one: that she was also informed and verily believed, that one J. B. of Powhatan, was well acquainted with the slave, and was an important witness for her: that those persons would have been summoned to attend as witnesses for her at the trial, but for the circumstances that her counsel advised her, that, in his opinion, it was unnecessary, as well because of the testimony of another witness already taken in the case, as because the matter in controversy had been already determined in the court of chancery, a court of competent jurisdiction, in which the question of fraud had been fairly tried and determined: that owing to this advice she had been surprised at the trial; and she verily believed, that if she could obtain a new trial, she would be able to prove, by the above persons and others, that the slave sold to Pleasants, had been, and was at the time of the sale, as healthy as any man of his age. Upon this affidavit, she moved the court to set aside the judgment entered the day before, and the verdict, and to order a new trial; and the court, upon the strength of the affidavit alone, did set aside the judgment and verdict, and order a new trial.

The cause was accordingly tried again at a subsequent term; when the jury found for the defendant, and judgment was given for her.

478 *Pleasants appealed to the circuit court of Lynchburg, where the judgment was affirmed; and thence he appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, insisted, 1st, That the hustings court erred in setting aside the verdict found for Pleasants on the second trial, and granting Clements a new trial, on her affidavit; for the ground presented by the affidavit, to found the motion for the new trial, was surprise produced by the opinion and advice of her own counsel, as to the competency and sufficiency of the record of the suit in chancery between the parties, as evidence to repel Pleasants's claim in this action; but there could have been no such surprise, since that record had been offered as evidence at a former trial, and rejected; and, surely, the mistake of counsel could not afford good ground for setting aside the verdict. 2ndly, That supposing the new trial to have been improperly allowed, this court ought to reverse the proceedings back to the order setting aside the verdict, and the judgment upon it, and allowing the new trial, and to leave the verdict and judgment thus improperly set aside, to stand. But, if the court would look farther back, then, 3dly, That there was no error affecting the verdict and judgment rendered for Pleasants at the second trial. 1. The special plea in bar, presenting the proceedings and decree in the suit in chancery between the parties, as a defence to this action, was properly rejected by the court: it was bad in form and substance; bad in form, because it neither made profert of the record and decree pleaded in bar, nor concluded to the court; bad in substance, because neither the plea, nor the record of the suit pleaded in bar, shewed, with certainty, the ground of the chancellor's decree, whether he dismissed Pleasants's bill upon the merits, or (which was more probable) for want of jurisdiction, and because the suit in chancery did not involve the same matter or controversy involved in the action at law, since the object of Pleasants's bill in chancery was to rescind the contract of 479 *sale on the ground of fraud, and to enjoin proceedings to recover the purchase money of the slave, whereas the object of this action was to recover damages for breach of the warranty of the soundness of the slave, to which he was entitled whether a fraud had been practised upon him or not. Besides, the plea was not offered in good time: it was offered after an issue made up and one trial, and just before the cause was called for the second trial. 2. The record of the suit in chancery was, as the court held, inadmissible evidence upon the trial of the issue, for some of the reasons he had urged against the plea founded on it, namely, that the chancellor's decree, for aught that appeared in the record, might have proceeded on the want of jurisdiction, not on the merits, and that the two suits did not involve the same matter of controversy; and for this additional reason, that the whole record, (depositions as well as pleadings and decree), was offered in evidence; but, certainly, the depositions in the suit in chancery, were not proper evidence on the trial of the action at law, unless it had been shewn that the witnesses were dead.

Stanard, for the appellee, said that this court had examined the grounds of applications for new trials, in cases where the courts below had improperly refused to set aside verdicts and order new trials, and had reversed judgments for that cause; but there was no case in which the grounds on which a new trial had been granted by the court below, had been reviewed, and the judgment reversed because the new trial was allowed on insufficient grounds. The case at bar shewed the propriety of the distinction: a verdict had been found for the plaintiff upon one trial, and then on the new trial, which was so full and fair that neither party could find cause for exception, there was a verdict for the defendant.

Supposing that Clements's affidavit shewed no sufficient ground for granting the new trial, still if injustice had been done at the former trial, this court should 480 for that cause, *sustain the order allowing the new trial, and affirm the judgment; or, at least the court would look at the previous proceedings, and if it found error in them, would correct it by reversing the proceedings back to the error. And he insisted, that Clements's special plea in bar ought to have been received. The objection that it was not offered in time (supposing the plea good) was repelled by the authority of Tomlin's adm'r v. How's adm'r, Gilm. 1. As to the objection to the form of the plea, for not making profert of the record, and concluding to the court; the want of profert was a mere defect in form; and this plea, though it did not conclude prout patet per recordum, in strict technical form, concluded with a verification "by the record and proceedings of the said suit in chancery &c. wherefore &c." In substance, the plea was a good and complete bar: for Pleasants's bill in chancery charged a fraud practised upon him in the sale of the slave, and the action at law was case for a deceit of the vendor, and so the point in controversy was the same in both. The chancellor's decree was general, and concluded the whole controversy. And the plea alleges that the court of chancery was a court of competent jurisdiction to hear and determine the question in controversy; and truly so alleges, since the ground of complaint in equity was fraud, and at law, deceit, in the sale. But, if the plea should have been rejected as demurrable for want of form or precision, or because it was not offered in good time, still Clements ought to have been permitted to use it as evidence in her defence before the jury. Used as evidence, it would not have had the effect of an estoppel; but it was a judicial proceeding between the same parties, bearing directly on the matter in issue, and ought to have been suffered to go to the jury, to be weighed by them. If the suits in chancery involved and determined the same matter of controversy, and the pleadings and decree were therefore proper evidence, it would be very difficult to maintain, that the depositions contained in the record were improper evidence. But the court excluded the whole record; the 481 *pleadings and the decree as well as the depositions, and even Pleasants's bill, which contained his state of the case upon his oath, and was certainly good evidence against him in this action.

CABELL, J. The first question which presents itself for consideration, is, Whether it is competent to this court to inquire into the propriety of the judgment of an inferior court granting a new trial, and in case it shall be of opinion that the new trial was improperly granted, to reverse the judgment, and render such judgment as the inferior court ought to have rendered? That this court may inquire into the propriety of the judgment of an inferior court refusing a new trial, and may affirm or reverse, according to its opinion of the propriety or impropriety of refusing the new trial, is settled by such a series of uniform decisions, as no longer to admit of question. It seems to me impossible to distinguish, in point of principle, the case where a new trial has been improperly granted, from the case where it has been improperly refused; and I consider it to have been settled by the cases of Knox v. Garland, 2 Call, 241, and Briscoe v. Clarke, 1 Rand. 213, that the power of this court extends alike to both cases.

Then, was the new trial improperly granted in this case? The court below, proceeded solely on the ground of the matter contained in the defendant's affidavit. It appears that she was well acquainted with the facts necessary for her defence, and the persons by whom they could be proved: but she failed to summon some of these witnesses, or to use any means for procuring their attendance. She made no motion for a continuance, but went to trial voluntarily, the full confidence, inspired by the advice in of her counsel, that she had abundant testimony without that of the absent witnesses. She had the full benefit of all the testimony on which she thus relied, except that of the record of the suit in chancery, which the court had refused to allow on the former trial, and which she ought to 482 have expected would *be again refused. Such a blunder, even if it be the blunder of counsel, affords no just ground for a new trial; for we cannot, in such a case, distinguish the party from the counsel. The new trial, therefore, was not justified by the matter contained in the affidavit of the defendant, on which the court granted it.

But it was contended, that though the new trial may not be justified on the ground on which the court placed it, yet that the court committed other errors which prevented the defendant from having a fair trial, and that the new trial ought to be supported on that ground. The acts of the court complained of as errors of this description, are the refusal to allow the record of the suit in chancery to be given in evidence, and its refusal to allow it to be pleaded in bar of the action.

Was it erroneous to reject the record as evidence? The record contained, in addition to the pleadings and decree, many depositions of witnesses taken in relation to the matter in controversy. Now, although depositions regularly taken upon a bill and answer in chancery, may be used as evidence in a trial at law between the same parties, provided it be proved that the witnesses are dead, or by reason of sickness are unable to attend, or that they cannot be found, or are absent from the country, or are otherwise not amenable to the process of the court, Com. Dig. title Testmoigne. C. 4, Deposition, 1 Atk. 445, yet they can be used only under the circumstances just mentioned. It was, therefore, proper in the court to withhold from the jury, the record containing depositions of witnesses, without proof of the circumstances which would justify the use of the depositions; and the bill of exceptions, in this case, does not shew that any such proof was given. Even if the defendant was entitled to the use of the record as evidence, no other parts of it were proper for that purpose, but the decree and the pleadings on which it was rendered. It was offered as a whole, depositions and all; and it was rightfully rejected on that ground, if on no other. But 483 no part of this record *ought to have been received in evidence in this case, unless it were of such a character, that if specially pleaded it would have been a bar to the action. And this leads me to inquire, whether the court erred in rejecting the plea?

I will not inquire, whether the plea was tendered in proper time, or pleaded in proper form: admit it to be free from all objection in these respects; admit it to have fully stated all the important parts of the chancery record; would the matter of the plea have been a bar to the action? To make such a plea a bar to the action, it is necessary, that the decision relied on should be the decision of the very matter in controversy in this suit; and that the court making the decision, should be a court having competent jurisdiction to decide the matter in controversy. The matter in controversy in this suit, was a claim for damages for the breach of a warranty, and there could be no recovery without proof of such breach. The words in the declaration, "falsely and fraudulently" preceding the word "warranting," were mere surplusage, and unnecessary to be proved. If, then, this had been the matter in controversy in the court of chancery, that court would have had no jurisdiction to decide it; and, of course, the plea would have been no bar to the action. But, in truth, the matter in controversy in the suit in chancery, was a different matter: it was a claim to vacate the contract intirely, on the ground of fraud, over which that court had jurisdiction. But the decision of that question against the plaintiff is no bar to his action for damages for a breach of the warranty; for though the plaintiff was not entitled to vacate the contract on the ground of fraud, yet he would be entitled to recover damages for a breach of the warranty, even if that breach were unaccompanied by fraud. I conclude, therefore, that the matter of this plea would have been bad on general demurrer, and, consequently, that the court did not err in refusing to receive it.

I am of opinion, that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be reversed; that the judgment of the hustings court, setting aside the judgment and verdict 484 rendered for *the appellant, and granting the appellee a new trial, together with all the proceedings subsequent to that order, ought also to be reversed; and that the judgment, which was entered by the hustings court on the verdict for the appellant, ought to be reinstated and affirmed.

The other judges concurring, the judgment for the appellee was reversed, and the judgment for the appellant, which was set aside by the hustings court, was reinstated and affirmed.

Bishop's Ex'or v. Bishop and Others.

Chancery Jurisdiction—Suit by Executor to Restrain

Legatee for Life from Carrying Legacy Out of State.—Testator bequeaths slaves to his son G. for life, remainder to G.'s children: the executor, being apprehensive that G. will sell the slaves to persons who will carry them out of the state, applies to court of chancery to restrain G. from so doing, and to compel him to give security, that the property shall be forthcoming at his death for the legatees in remainder: the executor alleging that he had never assented to the legacy, and the legatee for life alleging that he had assented thereto: Held, if the executor had not assented to the legacy, he had plain remedy at law to recover the subject; if he had assented to it to the legatee for life, that assent enured to benefit of legatees in remainder, and though they might, the executor could not, ask the aid of the court to secure the subject to the legatees in remainder.

Edward Niblett executor of James Bishop of the county of Prince George deceased, exhibited a bill against George Bishop, John Avery and Thomas Comer, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth, that his testator James Bishop, having in his lifetime lent his son, the defendant George Bishop, three slaves, Edy, Jenney and Peter, afterwards, by his will bequeathed them to the son George, for life, and the remainder after his death to his children, and "that they should

that the executor had never assented to this legacy, though as the slaves were in possession of George Bishop, the legatee for life, at the time of the testator's death, under the previous loan, he had allowed him to retain the possession; that George Bishop had sold the woman Edy to the defendants Avery and Comer, who were dealers in slaves, and purposed to send them out of Virginia; and the executor had reason to apprehend, that he would sell the other two slaves to dealers in slaves, who would send them also out of the state; and thus the legatees in remainder would be disappointed of the benefit of the legacy: therefore, the bill prayed injunctions to restrain the defendants Avery and Comer from removing the woman Edy from Virginia, and to restrain George Bishop from selling the other two slaves; and that the defendants, respectively, might be compelled to give bond with surety to have the slaves forthcoming at the death of George Bishop, for the legatees in remainder; and general relief.

Injunctions were awarded according to the prayer of the bill, to restrain the defendants, respectively, from making any disposition of the slaves till farther order, unless they should give bond with surety to have them forthcoming to abide the final decree; and if they failed to give such security, the sheriff of Prince George was directed to take possession of the slaves, and hire them out, and to hold them, and the profits, subject to the future order of the court. The defendants failed to give the security, and the sheriff took possession of the two slaves Jenny and Peter, and hired

Legacies—Assent of Executor to Possession of Legatee for Life—Effect on Remainderman.—It seems to be well established that the assent of an executor to the first taker's possession and enjoyment of a legacy, is an assent to the legacy to the remainderman. *Lynch v. them out according to the order. The slave Edy could not be found.

The defendants Avery and Comer, answered, that they had not purchased the woman Edy of George Bishop.

George Bishop, in his answer stated, that he had sold Edy to one Pearson, a citizen and resident of Virginia, and intended to vest the proceeds in the purchase of another slave to be substituted in her place. He acknowledged, that he claimed and held

Edy under the will of his father, and 486 so *had only a life estate in her; and he said, she was delivered to him, after his father's death, by the executor. But, as to the other two slaves, Jenny and Peter, he alleged, that his father had, in his lifetime, given and delivered them to him, in absolute property; and he claimed them under that gift, and not under the bequest in his father's will.

The will of James Bishop was exhibited, containing the bequest of the slaves in question, as stated in the bill.

Upon the questions of fact, Whether the testator James Bishop had, in his lifetime, made an absolute gift to his son George of the slaves Jenny and Peter, or had only put them into his possession upon loan? Whether the executor had ever given his assent to the legacy? Whether Avery and Comer had not purchased the woman Edy of George Bishop, and removed her from the neighbourhood? there were many depositions taken and filed by both parties; the evidence adduced by the one conflicting with that of the other.

The chancellor was of opinion, that the plaintiff's case was fully proved; and he decreed, that the defendants Avery and Comer should deliver the woman Edy to the plaintiff as executor of the testator James Bishop, or if they failed to do so, should pay him her value, unless the defendant Bishop should pay the same to him; and that the executor not having assented to the legacy, still held the legal title of the other two slaves Jenny and Peter: and, an account of the profits of these two slaves since the commencement of the suit, having been reported to the court, he directed the amount thereof, 101 dollars, to be paid to the plaintiff.

The defendants Bishop and Avery appealed to this court.

Spooner, for the appellants, maintained, that, whatever might be the true state of the facts, taking the case upon the executor's own shewing, his bill ought to have been dismissed: for, if the executor had not assented to the legacy, he had a plain remedy at law, by detinue or trover, to recover the slaves, or their value, of George Bishop, or of any person claiming by purchase from him: and, if he had 487 *assented to the legacy, though the legatees in remainder might have asked security to have the subject forthcoming after the death of the legatee for life, the executor, having no longer any right whatever in the property, had no pretence to claim the interference of the court.

Allison, for the appellee, referring to the evidence to prove, that the executor had never, in fact, assented to the legacy, and that there was real reason to apprehend that the legatee for life would sell the slaves in question, to dealers in slaves, who would remove them out of the state; insisted, that the executor's resort to the court of chancery was proper and necessary, to prevent the eloining of these specific slaves, which his testator had expressly desired should not be sold, or go out of the family; an object, which the powers of the court of chancery alone could accomplish; since, in trover, he could only recover the value, and in detinue also, he might, in the event, recover only the alternative value. And the chancellor having entertained the case for this purpose, most properly proceeded to do complete justice.

This was the point on which the cause turned, though the question of right to the property was discussed at the bar.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The court of chancery had no jurisdiction to entertain this suit, in any possible view of the case. Either the executor had assented to the legacy, and delivered the slaves in question to the appellee George Bishop, as legatee for life, or he had not assented to it, and only left them in his hands, as a loan or accommodation. If he had assented to the legacy in respect to the legatee for life, that enured as an assent to the legacy to the legatees in remainder after his death. And from that moment, he had no interest in the slaves legal or equitable, and could maintain no suit, either at law or in equity, in respect to the property, or any disposition of it.

No one but the legatees in remainder had an interest in the *remainder, that would entitle him to demand security for their enjoyment of that right when it should accrue. If, on the other hand, the executor had not assented to the legacy, he had a clear legal title to the slaves, if they belonged to his testator's estate, which he could have asserted at law as effectually as in equity. And as his testator's title to two of them was disputed, a court of law was the only proper forum in which the title could be investigated. In like manner, as to the slave sold, the legatees in remainder were entitled, if the executor had assented to the legacy, to sue all those who had participated in the act of eloining the slave, for damages at law, but not in equity. Yet the chancellor has entertained this suit in the name of the executor alone, determined the title of the two slaves in controversy as in an action of detinue, proceeded to ascertain the damages against the defendants concerned in eloining one of the slaves, and seized the other two, and condemned their profits to make good those damages, in favour of the executor. All this is beyond the proper province of a court of equity.

The decree is to be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

printed stamps or scrolls by way of seals; the blanks are filled up; and the instrument executed by the obligors, by signing their names to the printed stamps or scrolls, which are recognized as their seals in the body of the instrument: this is a sealed instrument within the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 94.

Supersedes to an order of the circuit court of Fauquier, made on the motion of Mackay, awarding execution on a forthcoming bond, executed by Thornton 489 and Sinclair his *surety therein, for the delivery, at the day and place of sale, of property taken by the sheriff under a fieri facias sued out by Mackay against Thornton.

The formal parts of the forthcoming bond were printed, and there were stamps printed at the foot of it, to serve the purpose of seals; thus [L. S.] The obligors signed their names opposite to these stamps; and the body of the bond stated, that it was sealed with their seals. And the question was, whether this was a sealed instrument, so as to make it good as a forthcoming bond? in other words, whether the printed stamps were scrolls, affixed by the obligors, by way of seals, within the meaning of the statute, that "any instrument to which the party making the same shall affix a scroll, by way of seal, shall be adjudged to be of the same force and obligation, as if it were actually sealed?" 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 94, p. 510.

PER CURIAM. The construction of this statute, which was in affirmance of the immemorial usage of Virginia, and consequently of our common law, has uniformly been, and the practice accordingly, that the recognition by the party executing the instrument, that any scroll annexed to his name is his seal, whether put there by him or another, before or after the execution of the instrument, constitutes it his deed; in analogy to the common law, which holds, that the acknowledgment of a seal of wax, as his seal, by the party executing an instrument, makes it his deed, no matter when or by whom the seal was attached to the paper or parchment. Here, the parties executing the instrument in question, declare in writing, that the scrolls annexed to their names, or rather to which their names are annexed, put there by the printer who prepared the instrument in blank, are their seals. The judgment is affirmed.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Equity Jurisdiction—Account—Remedy at Law.—Bill in chancery, praying an account, and a decree for the balance, which should be found due, upon a claim, on which an action at law would have lain, without shewing any obstacle which would defeat or embarrass the legal remedy: HELD, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction.

By articles of agreement under seal, between Poage and Willson, executed the 27th December 1794, Poage covenanted, that he would locate land warrants, for and in the name of Willson, on waste and unappropriated lands in Virginia, to the amount of 50,000 acres, and survey and make out plats of the lands so located, with certificates of survey, so as to be received at the land office clear of all expense, on or before the 1st May 1795, and that Poage, at the time of delivering the plats and certificates of survey, would give Willson deeds for the lands, binding Poage and his heirs to warrant the lands in the plats contained, against all persons whatever. And Willson, covenanted that he would pay Poage 20 dollars 50 cents for every thousand acres of land, so located, surveyed, delivered and warranted; one third of the sum at the expiration of six months, one third, eighteen months, and the other third, two years after the delivery of the plat or plats at the land office.

After this contract was made, Willson put other land warrants into Poage's hands, to the amount of 100,000 acres, to be by him located and surveyed, for and in the name of Willson, and to be conveyed by Poage to him with general warranty, upon the same terms stipulated in the covenant of December 1794, as to the 50,000 acres therein mentioned. The evidence of the contract as to the additional 100,000 acres, was a letter from Willson to Poage on the subject, dated the 2d January 1795, wherein, referring to the covenant of December 1794, he said, "The contract we have made, is to regulate the whole of our business."

491 In 1820, Poage exhibited a bill against Willson in the superior court of chancery of Clarksburg, setting forth the covenant of December 1794, and the other contract of January 1795, and alleging a full performance of both contracts on his part; that he had located for and in the name of Willson, and surveyed, the full quantity of 150,000 acres of land, and delivered plats and certificates of the surveys at the land office; and had made deeds for the lands to Willson, with general warranty, though the plats and certificates of survey of the 50,000 acres mentioned in the contract of December 1794, were not delivered at the land office within the time thereby stipulated: that Willson had paid him 1025 dollars [which was the full compensation for the location &c. of 50,000 acres, at 20 dollars 50 cents per thousand] and had, at several times, between the date of the service and September 1803, made him several payments, on account of the lands located by him, amounting to 685 dollars; and the balance was still due: that Willson, in 1811, and again as late as 1814, acknowledged the debt, asked indulgence, and promised to adjust and pay the balance; Poage being, at the dates of these acknowledgments and promises, and ever since a resident of the state of Kentucky: but Willson now refused, on various pretenses to settle the account of the balance, and to pay the same. The bill prayed an account of the moneys due Poage on the whole transaction, and a decree for the balance that should be due, and general relief.

Willson did not, in any form, object to the jurisdiction of the court, or rely on the statute of limitations in his defence. He put in an answer, acknowledging the contracts set out in the bill, and Poage's performance thereof on his part, as stated in the bill; and alleging, that Poage had received very nearly if not quite the whole amount of the compensation stipulated to be paid him, partly from Willson, and partly from Henry Lee, with whom Willson was jointly concerned in the location of the lands; in short, resting his defence on the merits.

492 *The chancellor doubted the jurisdiction of the court; but, reserving that point for future consideration, he directed an account, which was reported, and shewed a large balance due Willson. On the final hearing, the chancellor said the plaintiff had a plain remedy at law, which there was nothing to obstruct or to embarrass; there was no defect of proof; no discovery necessary; not a single feature to give the court of chancery even the colour of jurisdiction; and on that ground (though he was also inclined to discountenance the claim upon the merits) he dismissed the bill with costs.

Poage appealed to this court.

BROOKE, P. The contracts on which this suit is founded, are certainly not susceptible of any correct construction, by which the parties can be considered as vendor and vendee of land. The warranty relied on as giving that character to them, purports nothing more than an obligation on the part of Poage, to locate the land warrants furnished by Willson, on unappropriated and vacant lands. They are nothing but contracts for services to be rendered on the one part, and paid for on the other, at a stipulated rate, on which a suit at law was the plain and obvious remedy. The circumstance, that Poage had broken the covenants in the sealed contract, by failing to deliver the surveys within the stipulated time, in consequence of which he could not enforce it at law, does not obviate the objection to his coming into equity; because it appears by his bill, that that contract was satisfied by the payment, made by Willson, and the only claim he had, if any, was on the second contract for the location, survey &c. of the 100,000 acres; and this might have been enforced at law, if any thing was due on it, by an action of assumpsit upon the express promise of Willson to pay the stipulated compensation of 20 dollars 50 cents per thousand acres, for the location, survey &c. thereof. The decree is to be affirmed.

Pawns—Lien of Pawnee for Debts Subsequently Contracted—If goods be pawned for the security of a particular specified debt, the pawnee has no lien on the goods pawned for any other or subsequent debt contracted by the pawner to him, without an agreement to that effect, either express, or implied from the nature or circumstances of the transaction.

Equity Maxims—He Who Asks Equity Must Do Equity—Application.—The maxim of courts of equity, that a plaintiff asking equity must do equity to the party against whom he asks it, applies only to cases where the plaintiff is wholly without remedy at law, and is entirely dependent on the court of equity for relief: per GREEN and CABELL, J.

Set-Off—Joint and Separate Demand.—Against a debt due by A. and B. jointly to C. a debt due by C. to B. alone, cannot be set-off in equity any more than at law: per GREEN, J.

In November 1818, Hughes & Armistead sold Perkins a parcel of tobacco, for 6773 dollars, payable in three equal instalments, at three, six and nine months; for which Perkins gave them his three notes negotiable and payable at the office of the bank of Virginia at Lynchburg; and as a collateral security for due payment thereof, he indorsed in blank, and deposited with them two notes of Lynch, negotiable at bank (of which he was the fair holder) for 3633 dollars each, dated in 1817, and payable the 1st March 1821, and the 1st March 1822.

Gilliat was jointly interested with Hughes & Armistead in the sale of the tobacco to Perkins; though it was doubtful, whether Perkins was apprised, at the time, of Gilliat's interest in the transaction; and it was certain, that the deposit of the notes of Lynch by Perkins with Hughes & Armistead, was intended as collateral security only for the purchase money of the tobacco he had bought of them, and not as a security to Gilliat for any debt then due, or which might afterwards be contracted, by Perkins to him, or for any other debt whatever.

In the course of the year 1819, Perkins became indebted to Gilliat 1343 dollars, upon an intirely distinct transaction, which had originated prior to the sale of the tobacco by *Hughes & Armistead to Perkins, but was consummated afterwards. There was no manner of agreement or understanding between Gilliat and Perkins, that this debt should be secured by, or charged on, the notes of Lynch previously deposited by Perkins with Hughes & Armistead: and there was an agreement, that Perkins should accept a draft at sixty days, payable at bank, for the debt he contracted to Gilliat.

Equity Maxims—He Who Asks Equity Must Do Equity—Application.—The principal case was cited with approval in Scott v. Scott, 18 Gratt. 163.

Set-Offs—Joint and Separate Demand.—See foot-note to Rose v. Murchie, 2 Call 406; Glazebrook v. Ragland, 8 Gratt. 332; foot-note to Perkins v. Hawkins, 9 Gratt. 650; Armistead v. Butler, 1 Hen. & M. 176.

The principal case was cited with approval in Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 381; Conaway v. Odbert, 3 W. Va. 37.

Perkins paid his note for the first instalments of the purchase money of the tobacco, at its maturity, to Hughes & Armistead, and then failed, leaving the notes for the other two instalments, amounting to 4515 dollars, yet to be paid.

Sometime before Lynch's notes came to maturity, he acquired and became the holder of two notes of Perkins, negotiable at bank, for 1115 dollars each, payable the 4th April 1819, and the 4th April 1820, which were protested for non-payment, Perkins having failed before they came to maturity. But Lynch produced and exhibited only one of these notes, that payable in April 1820. Neither did he shew how or when he acquired these notes of Perkins, whether before or after his failure, or whether he gave any, or if any, what consideration for them: he alleged, generally, that he gave a valuable consideration for them, and acquired them before his own notes came to maturity.

Of the two notes of Lynch for 3633 dollars each, which Perkins had deposited with Hughes & Armistead as collateral security for the debt he owed them, Lynch paid Hughes & Armistead the contents of the first, at its maturity in March 1821, and at the maturity of the last in March 1822, he paid them 1410 dollars in part thereof, that being the balance in full of the debt and interest to secure which his notes had been pledged to them by Perkins. But he refused to pay the residue of the contents of this note, and Hughes & Armistead insisted on still holding it.

In a suit brought by Lynch against Perkins, Hughes & Armistead, and Gilliat, in the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg, (the object of which was to 495 join Hughes & Armistead from taking any measures to enforce the payment of the balance of Lynch's last note pledged to them by Perkins, which they continued to hold though the purpose of the pledge was accomplished, and to have that note delivered up and cancelled), Lynch claimed to set-off the contents of the two notes of Perkins, for 1115 dollars each, payable in April 1819, and April 1820, both of which Lynch alleged he yet held, and that the amount of both was still due, against the balance due on his last note pledged by Perkins to Hughes & Armistead. And Gilliat alleged that, though his individual advances to Perkins were not made upon any agreement that he should be indemnified out of the notes pledged to Hughes & Armistead, yet he looked to that pledge as his security; and he insisted, that, as he was jointly interested with Hughes & Armistead in the sale of the tobacco to Perkins, the deposit of Lynch's notes with Hughes & Armistead, to secure payment of the price of the tobacco, was a pledge thereof to him as well as to Hughes & Armistead, that he was a holder of Lynch's notes as well as Hughes & Armistead, and that, not having any notice of any set-off, till after he had advanced his money to Perkins, he had a right to retain the debt of 1343 dollars, which Perkins owed him on the distinct and subsequent transaction between them, out of the notes pledged to him jointly with Hughes & Armistead to secure the price of the tobacco.

The chancellor held, that Lynch's claim was just; and (not advertg, apparently, to the circumstance, that though Lynch alleged that he held two notes of Perkins for 1115 dollars each, yet he produced and exhibited only one note, that payable in April 1820) he decreed a perpetual injunction to any proceedings against Lynch to enforce the payment of the balance of his last note for 3633 dollars, which had been pledged by Perkins to Hughes & Armistead.

Gilliat appealed to this court; where the cause was argued by the attorney general for the appellant, and Johnson 496 *for the appellee; but it was so fully discussed by the judges, that it would be altogether superfluous to report the arguments of counsel.

CARR, J. The only question I shall examine, is, Whether, under the circumstances of this case, Gilliat had any lien on Lynch's notes pledged by Perkins to Hughes & Armistead as a security for the price of the tobacco, for the debt subsequently contracted by Perkins to him individually?

Every lien must be the creature of contract either express or implied. In Green v. Farmer, 4 Burr. 2220, lord Mansfield said, "The convenience of commerce and natural justice are in favour of liens; and, therefore, of late years, courts lean that way, 1. where there is an express agreement; 2. where it is implied from the usages of trade; or 3. from the manner of dealing between the parties in the particular case; or 4. where the defendant has acted as a factor." None of these grounds seem to exist in the case before us: for here was no express agreement, but so far from it, Gilliat admits, that he advanced the money without any agreement with Perkins, for indemnity from the notes; there is no usage of trade even alleged, to justify the claim; there is nothing in the manner of dealing between the parties in this particular case, to shew that Gilliat's advances were made with an understanding that the notes deposited were to be bound for them; and no factorage in the matter is pretended. The case before lord Mansfield was, I think, quite as strong as that before us: nor does it make any difference, in this respect, that he was deciding a case at law, and we in equity; for the action there was trover, which is an equitable action; and our decision here must be exactly the same as if Perkins, having paid off the debt to Hughes & Armistead for which the notes were deposited, had brought trover against them, or their partner Gilliat, for these notes. The case before lord Mansfield, was this: Heinzleman bought of Green certain goods, which he delivered to Farmer, a dyer, to be dyed on his account;

497 afterwards, H. agreed with Green, that he should have his goods back again; G. demanded them of the defendant, the dyer, and offered to pay him for dyeing them; but the defendant insisted on being also paid a debt due from H. (who had failed) for dyeing other goods, over and above the price of dyeing these. Lord Mansfield, after discussing the question with his usual learning and ability, concluded thus: "Here is no factor, no agent, concerned; no transaction but the mere manufacture of dyeing; no course of trade, or general usage, to create a specific lien; no particular circumstances of their method of dealing with H. The very manner of dealing shews they relied on his personal credit." And he held, that the defendant had no lien but for the price of dyeing the specific goods. In the course of his argument, he referred to two cases decided by lord Hardwick, ex parte Deeze, 1 Atk. 228, and ex parte Ockenden, Id. 235. The first was the case of a packer, who was allowed to retain cloth for other debts, besides what was due for packing: which, lord Mansfield says, when upon the ground, that by the course of trade, a packer has a lien upon all goods in his hands, being in the nature of a factor. The other case was thus: Matthews, a flour factor, employed Ockenden as his miller, who had considerable dealings with M. in grinding corn for him, on which account M. was generally indebted to O. in a large sum of money, who always had in his hands corn, meal, and sacks of M., sometimes more, sometimes less, but for the most part sufficient to answer the sum due to him; and for this reason, he gave M. a much greater credit than he otherwise would have done, as he always apprehended the corn, meal, and sacks, which he had in his hands, to be a security for the debt due from M. Matthews became a bankrupt, being indebted to O. in a considerable sum due by notes, and also leaving in the hands of O. a large quantity of wheat, some grinding and some ground into flour, with a great number of sacks, and which O. depended upon as having a security for his debt. The question before lord Hardwicke, on the petition of O. was,

498 *whether he should not be permitted to retain his whole debt out of the wheat, flour and sacks, or only his toll for grinding &c. Lord Hardwicke said, "It lies upon the petitioner to shew, he has any lien, on the corn &c. in his hands; and as to the specific lien he claims, I do not see there is a sufficient reason to consider it as such. In this case, no evidence has been produced of any contract, that the debt which was owing to the petitioner, should be a lien on the corn &c. Nor is there any evidence, that there is any general custom with respect to millers, that it should be a lien. There is then no specific lien, but what arises from that kind of bailment at law, proceeding from a delivery of goods for a particular purpose, as in the case of a horse standing in the stable of an innkeeper &c." And after going through the cases on the subject (and among them, Demaindray v. Metcalfe, Prec. in ch. 419, 2 Vern. 691, Gilb. Rep. 104,) he asked, "Suppose the corn factor had tendered the money for grinding the corn, and Mr. Ockenden had refused to deliver it, and he had thereupon brought an action of trover, could O. have set-off the antecedent debt? I am clearly of opinion that he could not, and would have had only an allowance pro tanto as was due for grinding the corn." The report in Atkins, states that the case was adjourned at the request of the petitioner's counsel, to the next day of petitions, being an affair of great consequence to trade and creditors in general. Lord Mansfield in Green v. Farmer, says he has a note of the case, and that in December following, no precedents to the contrary being produced, lord Hardwicke decided according to his opinion as reported by Atkins. I consider that a much stronger case than ours; for in that case, there was a course of dealing, during which Ockenden credited Matthews much farther than he would have done, but for the corn &c. generally in his hands, to which he looked for security: yet, as there was no agreement proved, nor general custom shewn, there was no lien. This subject of personal pledges and lien, is very fully examined by the master of the rolls, in Jones v. Smith, 2 Ves. 499 *jr. 372. There, personal securities were pledged for a specific debt; then a mortgage of real estate on a distinct transaction was given to the creditor; and afterwards, the same personal securities (first pledged) with others, were pledged to him for the balance of an account, the question was, whether the personal securities could be redeemed, without discharging what was due for interest on the mortgage? The master of the rolls, in his discussion of the question, first examined the law with respect to tacking, in the case of mortgages: he considered the cases on the subject, as not satisfactory, and admitted that the present practice has not been always the course. That present practice he stated thus: "Now, at least by the modern cases, it is laid down, that a mortgagee cannot tack a bond against the mortgagor, nor against the creditors, but may against the heir, merely to prevent circuity of action: why not (he asks) against the mortgagor, if the rule is, that where a man, having one security, lends more money to the same party, that person shall pay his whole debt or shall not redeem at all?" In support of this position, he referred to the case of Lowthian v. Hasel, 3 Bro. C. C. 162, where lord Thurlow said, "The only reason why the mortgagee can tack his bond to his mortgage, is to prevent a circuity of suits: it is solely matter of arrangement for that purpose; for, in natural justice, the right has no foundation. The principle explains the rule; and therefore it can go no further: the creditor having another specific security, cannot give him, in justice, any priority. There being no foundation in justice the only question is, whether the court is in the practice of doing it; and it has not done it in any case, but that of the heir, and merely to prevent circuity." Having established this point, the master of the rolls proceeded to cite cases, shewing that where two separate estates are mortgaged (the legal interest being absolutely, and at law irredeemably, conveyed) equity will not interpose in favour of the redemption of one without the redemption of both. He admitted there is no reason for this distinction, as it is impossible to say

500 why a *bond may not be tacked to a mortgage, as well as one mortgage to another; but thus the decisions have settled it. He then took a distinction between a mortgage and a pledge; "a mortgage is a pledge, and more; for it is an absolute pledge, to become an absolute interest, if not redeemed at a certain time: a pledge is a deposit of personal effects, not to be taken back, but on the payment of a certain sum, by express stipulation, or the course of trade, to be a lien upon them." In the case of a mortgage, the estate is absolute after forfeiture, and at law there is no remedy: equity, therefore, administers relief on its own principles. But, in the case of pledges, whenever the owner pays or tenders the money due, he may bring trover or detinue for the effects deposited; and when such cases come into equity, that court must decide them as a court of law would. In reviewing the cases on this subject, the master of the rolls took particular notice of Demandray v. Metcalfe, a case mainly relied on in the argument here. This case is differently stated in the several reports of it. In some of them it is simply the case of jewels pawned, and money borrowed on them; and afterwards two sums of money borrowed by the pawner, for which he gave notes; and the question was, whether his executor (the time for payment being passed) should redeem by paying the money taken up on the pledge, or should be held to pay that also subsequently borrowed? But the case appears to have been thus: Plaintiff for £110. pawned some jewels to Knight, who signed a writing that they were to be redeemed in twelve months, otherwise, for the £110. they were to be bought and sold: Knight, within a short time after, delivered over the jewels together with some plate of his own to Metcalfe, as a pledge for £200. Knight afterwards borrowed £38. and £50. of Metcalfe on promissory notes to be paid on demand: and Metcalfe by answer insisted it was agreed, that the pledge should be a security, as well for the money on the notes, as for that first lent; but could make no proof of any promise or agreement." The 501 Chancellor decreed, that the redemption *should only be, on paying for all the sums borrowed of Metcalfe, the goods of Knight which were pawned, being first applied. Though the master of the rolls in Jones v. Smith, did not expressly dissent from this decree, it is evident, I think, both from the principles he laid down, and the manner in which he treats the decision, that he disapproved of it: he noticed the quære tamen, annexed by Vernon to the case; and added, that, as reported by him, "it was as near as possible to the case of a mortgage: for a time was limited, viz. a year, when upon default, it was to be absolute;" and he proceeded immediately to cite with approbation, the cases of Green v. Farmer, ex parte Ockenden, Lowthian v. Hasel &c. which, in my mind, expressly overrule the principle of Demandray v. Metcalfe. He also cited Vanderzee v. Willis, 3 Bro. C. C. 21, where it was decided by lord Thurlow, that bankers having securities deposited for £1000. though the depositor at his death was indebted to them in a larger sum, had no lien further than the £1000. I know that the case of Jones v. Smith is said in 3 Ves. to have been reversed in parliament:

but the ground of reversal is no where stated, that I can find. The case is stated as authority in the later books, which treat on that subject, and in the books of general reference. I conclude, therefore, that the reversal was on some point of form or fact, not touching the authority of the case. Again, in ex parte Langston, 17 Ves. 227, lord Eldon lays it down, that if a pledge to secure money were made, and afterwards more money borrowed of the pawnee, and it is made out by his oath uncontradicted, that the subsequent advance was made on an agreement, that the pledge should stand bound for it, this would be supported by the court. In the case before us, Gilliat (the joint pawnee) so far from making oath, that his advance to Perkins was by agreement to be secured on the notes deposited, swears, that there was no such agreement. Ex parte Whitbread, 19 Ves. 208, was the case of a claim by the petitioner, of an equitable mortgage by a deposit of the lease of a public house to secure £1000.

502 *lent to the lessee on his promissory note; and the petitioner claimed also, a lien on the deposit for £100. subsequently advanced. Lord Eldon said, "When it was determined" (a determination against which he protested, though he felt bound by it) "that an actual deposit was to have the legal effect of an agreement in writing, it was for the money then due, and no more, unless the parol agreement, was also for future sums. If the original bargain did not look to future advances, no subsequent advance can be a charge, unless the subsequent transaction is equivalent to the original transaction. If it is equivalent to a re-delivery of the deed, receiving it back as a security for both sums, that will do; as it cannot depend on that mere form; but I shall require them to swear expressly, that when the sum of £100. was advanced, it was upon the security of the deposit." See also, Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. 277. From this review of the cases, it appears to me to be clearly settled, that no lien attached on the notes deposited, for the sum advanced by Gilliat to Perkins.

GREEN, J. It is affirmed both by Gilliat and by Hughes & Armistead, in their answers, that the tobacco sold to Perkins was their joint property, the sale a joint sale, and the notes of Lynch indorsed by him in blank, and deposited in the hands of H. & A. as a collateral security for the purchase money of the tobacco, were so deposited for their joint benefit, and that they were joint holders thereof. And the question is, Whether Gilliat is entitled to satisfaction out of the surplus of Lynch's rates, after satisfying the balance due at Perkins's debt to those parties jointly, for a debt due to him individually, contracted by Perkins, partly before and partly after the transaction of the sale of the tobacco and deposit of the notes, without any agreement by Perkins to that effect?

The deposit of Lynch's notes indorsed in blank, as a collateral security for a debt not equal to their amount, did not give to Gilliat and Hughes & Armistead, 503 an absolute property *in them on account of their negotiable character. On the contrary, they were bound by their contract, jointly, to return the notes, precisely in the form in which they received them, without a re-transfer by their indorsement, if Perkins paid his debt otherwise; or if not, then the surplus money, if they became entitled by his failure to resort to that collateral security for payment, and received its amount, either directly from Lynch, or by discounting his notes with any other; and this joint responsibility arising out of the original contract, could not be rendered several as to Perkins, by any act which they could do without his concurrence, either by one of them only receiving the surplus money, and retaining it in his hands, or by indorsing the notes to another in succession, instead of jointly. For, as to the immediate parties to a negotiable note, and as between an immediate indorser and indorsee, such a note has no peculiar character whatever, distinguishing it from any other contracts, however evidenced. It is open to all objections to the consideration, or want of consideration, and all set-offs and equities between those parties, which would be available in all other contracts not founded on a deed. It is only where a third party acquires an interest by indorsement for full value, that it acquires as to him the character of a negotiable security, entitled to the benefits of the law merchant, against all the other parties except his immediate indorser. These principles are too familiar to require support or illustration by authorities. If, then, Gilliat and Hughes & Armistead, severally or jointly, had received that surplus, and Perkins had brought an action for money had and received against them jointly, they could not have defeated that action, by showing that they did not receive or hold it jointly, but one only had received and held it. And the question is, Whether a debt due from him to one of them could be set-off, in such an action, or pleaded, or given in evidence, as a payment: certainly not as a payment, unless the transaction upon which it arose was intended as a payment; and, in this case, that was impossible; for when it took place, Perkins

504 *was not in any sense their creditor in respect to Lynch's notes deposited with them, and could never become so, unless they at the end of four years, should receive from those notes more than they were entitled to retain for his tobacco debt, or such part thereof as he might not pay otherwise; all of which was contingent. And Gilliat made the advance in question, not as a payment in advance of a contingent debt, which might possibly become due to Perkins from him and H. & A. at the end of four years, but upon the express agreement that Perkins should repay it under a bank acceptance at the end of sixty days. Discount is not payment: one is the extinguishment of a debt, by an express payment for that very purpose; the other, by the set-off of mutual debts; but both having the same effect, it has given occasion to the loose expression, that discount is payment, and to our practice under our statutes allowing lawful discounts to be given in evidence under the plea of payment. At the common law, no discount was admitted at law, except in a few special cases, noted by Viner under the head of Discount, in which the mutual liabilities arose from the very same transaction: nor in equity, unless from the nature of the dealings of the parties, or other circumstances, or proofs, an agreement to that effect could be fairly presumed; Downam v. Matthews, Prec. in ch. 580; Jeffs v. Wood, 2 P. Wms. 128; Hawkins v. Freeman, 8 Vin. Discount, A. pl. 26, p. 560, and lord Mansfield's argument in Green v. Farmer, 4 Burr. 2220. To remedy this, the statute of 4 & 5 Anne, (which was followed by our act of 1706, ch. 34,) and in England, the statutes of 2 & 8 Geo. 2, allowed mutual debts to be discounted, whether the parties had agreed to do so, either expressly or by implication, or not. But neither before nor after the statutes, did the court of equity ever allow a joint debt to be set-off against a separate debt. It could not be done under the statutes, and (as was said by the master of the rolls in Addis v. Knight, 2 Meriv. 121, in which he considered the preceding cases) "it is quite clear, that as at law, a joint cannot be set-off 505 against a *separate demand, the same rule prevails in equity." The only reported case to the contrary, is that of ex parte quinten, 3 Ves. 248, which is repudiated in ex parte Twogood, 11 Ves. 517. The case of ex parte Stephens, Id. 24, proceeded on the fraud. And the only case here, is that of Dunbar v. Buck et al., 6 Munf. 34, which was founded upon the case of ex parte Quinten, and in which the court allowed, against an individual claim of one partner, unliquidated damages against the partnership to be set-off in equity, even if it should have the effect of calling the partner who was not a party in the cause, and could not be made a party for any other purpose, to settle, in that cause, the whole partnership accounts. This was contrary to the settled rules, that joint cannot be set-off against separate demands, and that unliquidated damages can in no case be set-off at law, Freeman v. Hyett, 1 W. Black. 394; Howlett v. Strickland, 1 Cowp. 56, and, a fortiori, not in equity, Webster v. Couch, 6 Rand. 519, especially, as a court of equity cannot decree damages against a defendant in any case. Anthony v. Leftwich, 3 Rand. 238, and contrary to the prior cases of Scott v. Trent, 1 Wash. 77. Armistead v. Butler, 1 Hen. & Munf. 176, and Ritchie & Wales v. Moore, 5 Munf. 388, (where, in an action against two upon their note, a debt due by the plaintiff to one of the defendants, as offered was a set-off, and rejected; the precise case at bar, except that this is in equity, that at law) and also to the subsequent case of Porter v. Nekervis, 4 Rand. 359. In Rose v. Murchie, 2 Call, 409, while the court affirmed the same rule, it held that the payment made to one partner, was in fact made on account of the debt due to the partnership. The debt of Perkins due to Gilliat individually, could not in such an action be used in defence, either as a payment, discount, or set-off; nor could it avail as a defence, in an action of trover by Perkins against them for the notes, now paid off, except as to the balance due after satisfying the debt for which they were deposited as a pledge, Green v. Farmer,

4 Burr. 2214, nor in a suit in equity, since, if it were a defence in equity, it would be so at law, either in an action for money had and received, or in trover, which are equitable actions, in which nothing can be recovered that the plaintiff is not ex æquo et bono entitled to claim, and a court of equity must determine such a case as the law would, and decide it exactly as if an action for money had and received or trover had been brought by Perkins against Gilliat and Hughes & Armistead. I adopt the expressions of the master of the rolls in a similar case, which will be presently more particularly noticed.

The maxim, that he who asks equity must do it to the person of whom he asks it, applies and can be enforced effectually against the plaintiff asking it, only in cases where he is wholly destitute of any legal remedy; as where he has incurred a forfeiture, the effect of which he cannot avoid at law; or made a conveyance, which he cannot impeach in a court of law; or there is a judgment against him, which cannot be reversed. In such cases, he is under a necessity of throwing himself on a court of equity for relief; which is only given by the court, exercising a sound equitable discretion, upon equitable terms. But where a party has a legal right, capable of being effectually asserted at law, and calls for the assistance of a court of equity, because of some serious though not insurmountable difficulty at law, such as the settlement of an account, connected with the necessity of a discovery, or arising out of an equitable trust (as in this case, in respect to the surplus), or upon a collateral ground, such as to prevent an improper disposition of a subject pledged for the security of a debt, by which the rights of the party complaining may be affected (as is this precise case), there, the court can impose no condition upon the mere ground that the party applies to it for relief, and is bound to give that relief according to the legal rights of the parties. To attempt to do otherwise, would be utterly vain as to all the purposes of justice; for it would only remit the plaintiff to his legal rights, and involve the parties in a new litigation, which must ultimately be determined according to 507 *their legal rights, instead of enforcing them in a cause originally instituted properly in a court of equity. As if, in this case, the court were to hold that no relief should be given to Lynch, unless he would submit to the discount claimed by Gilliat, all it could do would be to dissolve the injunction; and then his defence at law would be perfect. There is no foundation for the court to decree the recovery of any thing against him, unless there be some equitable right in Gilliat, which he could assert as effectually in equity, as plaintiff, as he could as a defendant.

It is insisted, however, that if Gilliat's individual claim could not be available at law, in any form, against Perkins, yet that it is so in equity, upon the equitable principle, that when one holding a security for an existing debt, makes further advances to the debtor, he cannot reclaim the security, without first satisfying both the old and the new debt; and for this was cited the case of Demaindray v. Metcalfe, which is referred to in several books in an imperfect and confused way, but which may be ascertained from the whole, to have been thus: Demaindray borrowed money from Knight, and pawned jewels, to a much larger value than the money borrowed, as a security for its payment within twelve months, with a stipulation that in case of failure to redeem them, they should be the absolute property of Knight. Knight pawned them immediately, with some of his own plate, to Metcalfe, as security for a loan to the same amount; and afterwards borrowed of Metcalfe, two other sums, and died insolvent: after the expiration of twelve months, Demaindray having forfeited the property by his failure to pay, or tender what he had borrowed, filed his bill to redeem, upon the ordinary principle of equity relieving against forfeitures, as in case of mortgages of real estate. And the court held, that he could not redeem, but by paying his own debt to Knight, (which was equivalent to the original debt of Knight to Metcalfe) and also Knight's debts subsequently contracted to Metcalfe, after first applying the proceeds of the plate

508 pawned by Knight with the jewels. *It is impossible to conceive any reason justifying the imposition of Knight's debt upon the original owner of the jewels, as a condition upon which alone he was permitted to redeem them, except that, having forfeited the absolute property at law, he could have no relief but in equity, and there he could only have it upon doing equity to the defendant, who if he received the jewels from Knight without notice of Demaindray's equity, and as the property of Knight, and not otherwise, would be in the situation of a purchaser without notice, to the extent of his demands on Knight: no other case in respect to personal property pledged, upon any terms, has gone farther, or even so far as this; nor has any case ever occurred, in which a subsequent advance has been held to be a lien upon a prior security for a debt, unless by an agreement to that effect by the debtor, either express, or implied, from the nature or character of the transactions. It was on the principle of the last mentioned case, that the doctrine of tacking was founded in the case of mortgages; but that was applied only to cases of forfeited mortgages, never to those which were not forfeited; and that doctrine has been restrained by the more modern decisions to a very few cases. All the doctrine upon this subject, particularly in respect to the pledge of personal subjects as security, was very fully examined by the master of the rolls in Jones v. Smith, 2 Ves. jr. 372, in which he came to the conclusion, that, in such cases, subsequent advances cannot be tacked, unless by the agreement of the debtor, and decreed accordingly for the plaintiff, although there was strong ground to contend that there was an express agreement of the parties in writing to that effect. And in ex parte Langston, 17 Ves. 227, lord Eldon laid down the same principle, but allowed, that where the creditor affirmed on oath, that such an agreement was in fact

made, and that was supported by the circumstances of the transaction, and not contradicted in any way, it was sufficient proof of such agreement. The decree in Jones v. Smith was reversed in the house of lords, upon the question of fact (I am confident) for as far *as I can ascertain, the case, as it was in the house of lords, has not been reported, I suppose for that reason: and it is still cited as authority upon the questions of law, without noticing the reversal. I conclude confidently, that where personal property is pledged, generally, as a collateral security for a debt, or for any other specific purpose, without any agreement that it shall in any event be absolutely forfeited by the owner, no other lien can be imposed upon it for any other debt or purpose whatsoever, without an agreement to that effect, either express or implied from the nature and circumstances of the transaction; and that such an agreement cannot be inferred from the mere fact that a new liability has been incurred by the owner, especially if the holder claiming such a lien, does not affirm that there was such an agreement, and more especially, if he admits explicitly, that there was none such, as Gilliat does in this case. His declaration that he made the new advance, in the expectation that he would be indemnified out of Lynch's notes, cannot amount to a contract with Perkins to that effect, nor charge him with such an agreement. It is impossible to imply an agreement from any circumstances, short of positive proof of the fact, against the express admission that there was none; and if that were possible, an examination of the particulars of the transaction, out of which the new debt of Perkins to Gilliat arose, would conclusively negative the inference of any such agreement, and shew that Gilliat really had no such expectation that Lynch's notes would or could be made a source of indemnity to him, or if he had, that did not, in any degree, enter into the motives inducing him to make that advance.

Gilliat, then, has no lien for his individual advances to Perkins, on the notes of Lynch deposited by Perkins with Hughes & Armistead and Gilliat, for the single and specific purpose of securing his debt to them for the tobacco he had bought of them; nor has Lynch any qualified competitor in this cause, in respect to the balance yet due upon his notes. It is, therefore, unnecessary to make any inquiry as to the 510 *time or manner of his acquiring the notes of Perkins, which he claims to discount against the balance due upon his own notes, or as to the consideration he paid for them. If he holds them, he is entitled against Perkins to their full nominal amount, whenever and however he acquired them, and to a set-off accordingly.

But Lynch has exhibited only one of Perkins's notes, and adduced no proof as to the other; and the one exhibited is not equal to the balance due on his own notes. If he can offer no farther proof, what shall remain of that balance, after discounting them from the contents of the notes of Perkins which he has exhibited, will belong to Hughes & Armistead, as trustees for Perkins.

The decree should, therefore, be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to ascertain the amount of the discounts to which Lynch is entitled; and if they shall not be sufficient to extinguish the balance due upon his own notes, to dissolve the injunction as to the residue, perpetuating it as to the amount of the discounts established.

CABELL, J. This case presents the question, how far personal property pledged for the payment of a specific debt, shall be regarded as a security for a debt subsequently contracted?

The case may be simplified, by supposing that Gilliat was the sole creditor of the original debt, for which the pledge was made, as well as in that subsequently contracted; and that this suit had been brought against him, not by Lynch but by Perkins the debtor. This will be to place the case on a footing the most favourable to Gilliat. And I am clearly of opinion, that, even then, it must be decided against him, on principles which have never been departed from, in any english court of law or equity. The principles, on which this branch of the law depends, are most perspicuously laid down by lord Mansfield, in the case of Green v. Farmer. No man, having possession of the property of another, can resist the claim of the owner, either 511 *by set-off or otherwise, merely on the ground that the owner is his debtor.

To make such resistance, it is essential that he shall have a lien on the property; and a lien can be acquired only by contract express or implied. There is no difference, in this respect, between a court of law and a court of equity: for a court of equity will not regard any thing as a lien, which would not be regarded as a lien in a court of law also; as the case of ex parte Ockenden and Jones v. Smith, which have been mentioned by my brethren, clearly establish. Then, was there any contract, express or implied, in this case, that the pledged property should be a security for the subsequent debt contracted to Gilliat? Gilliat himself does not pretend that there was any express agreement: he admits there was none. Nor is there any circumstance from which we can imply an agreement, unless we can imply it from the single fact, that Gilliat required a pledge as a security for the first debt, and that he still held this pledge, at the time that he made the subsequent advance. But there never has been a case, in which that circumstance alone was held to amount to an agreement for a lien. Indeed, if that circumstance alone were sufficient, it would have put an end to almost all questions as to liens. In ex parte Whitbread, the lord chancellor said, "if the original bargain did not look to future advances, no subsequent advance can be a charge, unless the subsequent transaction is equivalent to the original transaction;" that is, as he explains himself, it must be "equivalent to a re-delivery of the thing pledged, and receiving it back as a security for both sums." So far from the circumstances of this case affording ground for implying a lien, they shew that none was intended by the parties. The doctrine, that he who asks equity, must do equity, has no application to a mere pledge of personal property. That doctrine is applied, sometimes, to forfeited mortgages, where the mortgagor brings a bill to redeem: and it is applied then, solely on the ground, that the mortgagee having acquired the legal title by the forfeiture, equity will not take that title from him, until he is paid all that the mortgagor owes him.

512 *But the decree of the chancellor should be reversed, for the reason mentioned by judge Green, and corrected as suggested by him.

BROOKE, P., concurred. So that the decree, though reversed for error in the details, was unanimously approved as to the principle.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Administrator d. b. n.—Capacity to Sue—Case at Bar.

—An administrator makes sale of personal property of decedent, partly for cash, partly on credit, and says on oath, in answer in chancery, that he did not mean to convert proceeds to his own use: before credit payment due, his administration is revoked, and administration de bonis non granted to another: HELD, administrator de bonis non entitled to sue for and recover the deferred payment of the vendee.

Foreign Attachment—Appeal by Garnishee—Effect.

—Upon a foreign attachment in chancery, against absent debtor and home defendant as garnishee, decree against absent defendant for debt, and against home defendant for a debt due by him to absentee, to be paid plaintiff in part of debt due him by absentee, the absentee being in default: the home defendant appeals: HELD, the home defendant cannot in the appellate court, contest the justice of the decree as against the absentee, but only so much of it as affects himself.

Administrators—Compensation to Agent—Case at Bar.

—An administrator contracts to sell slaves of testator's estate, partly for cash, partly on credit: contract made by an agent of administrator, who receives cash payment: the administrator's powers are revoked, so that the slaves sold cannot be delivered according to contract: and then administrator authorizes agent to retain the cash payment received by him on the executory contract for sale of the slaves, as compensation to agent for services to decedent's estate: HELD, this is not money had and received by agent to use of the persons from whom, but to use of administrator for whom, he received it, and administrator had a right so to dispose thereof.

Samuel W. Sayre, administrator of Philip L. Grymes late of the county of Middlesex deceased, on the 20th October 1808, sold to Thomas Cardineaux, agent in making the purchase for James Mather and Abner L. Duncan of *New Orleans, 513 forty-three slaves of Grymes's estate, for 10,033 dollars, whereof Cardineaux paid Sayre 4,233 dollars in cash, and for the payment of the residue within twelve months, he stipulated, that he would give such security in New Orleans, as Henry Heffernan, who was to accompany Cardineaux and the slaves thither, should approve; and if he should fail to give such security, it was stipulated, that the purchasers should retain only so many of the slaves as at a fair average value should be equal to the 4,233 dollars that had been paid in cash; and, in that case, the purchasers were to bear the expense of transportation of the slaves retained by them, and Sayre the expense of transportation of those which should be returned to him; but the whole were to be transported at the risk of the purchasers.

Sayre at the same time, by letter of attorney, empowered Heffernan to transact for him at New Orleans, all the business arising from the contract with Cardineaux, and also to make sale there of the other slaves of Grymes's estate, without limitation as to the number to be sold, or the terms of sale; and as compensation for these, and for sundry services previously rendered by Heffernan to Sayre, in managing the affairs of Grymes's estate, Sayre agreed to allow Heffernan a commission of ten per cent. on the amount of the proceeds of the sale of slaves already made to Cardineaux, and on the amount of the sales which Heffernan should effect in New Orleans, together with his reasonable expenses.

Heffernan did not accompany, but promptly followed, Cardineaux and the cargo of slaves, to New Orleans; and, in a letter to Sayre, dated the 13th December 1808, he informed Sayre of his arrival, and that Cardineaux's principals, Duncan and Mather, had offered the uncle of the latter, James Mather the elder, as surety for the deferred payment (5,800 dollars) of the price of the slaves sold to Cardineaux, but that he did not approve, and should not accept, that security.

On the 31st December 1808, Heffernan on the authority of Sayre's letter of attorney to him, covenanted for Sayre, 514 *to sell and deliver to James Mather the younger and William Kenner, a hundred slaves of Grymes's estate, for 40,000 dollars; of which the sum of 5,242 dollars was to be paid to Heffernan in cash; 14,758 dollars, upon the delivery of the slaves at New Orleans (subject to a discount of ten per cent. on 20,000 dollars, the amount of the first two payments); and 20,000 dollars four years from the date of the delivery of the slaves.

And, on the same 31st December 1808, Heffernan accepted an engagement of Duncan and the younger Mather, indorsed on the contract between Sayre and Cardineaux for the sale of the forty-three slaves to them, that they, Duncan and Mather, would be responsible to Sayre, for the deferred payment of the price of those slaves (5,800 dollars) though, as Cardineaux was the agent of Duncan and Mather in the purchase, they were already bound for the debt, and their engagement to pay it was no additional security. And Heffernan, at the same time, professing to act as the attorney in fact of Sayre, made a contract with Duncan and Mather, also indorsed on Sayre's contract with Cardineaux, whereby he extended the credit for the 5,800 dollars, which they owed Sayre on account of their purchase of slaves from him through the agency of Cardineaux, to four years; which extension of credit was expressed to be "in consequence of an advantageous contract that day entered into with Mather, Duncan,

&c." meaning (as it plainly appeared) the contract which he had made with Mather and Kenner, for the sale of an hundred slaves of Grymes's estate to them; and thus, it seemed, that Duncan, though not named in this contract, was interested in it.

Immediately after these transactions, Heffernan left New Orleans, and returned by sea to Baltimore; whence, on the 26th January 1809, he wrote a letter to Sayre, giving him a distinct and full account of what he had done in his agency, and explaining the reasons of his conduct therein; and mentioning particularly, that the cash payment of 5,242 dollars, which he had received upon the contract for the sale

515 of the hundred slaves of Grymes's estate, was the amount of his commission of ten per cent. (namely, on the aggregate of the proceeds of the sales of that parcel of slaves, and of the forty-three slaves sold to Cardineaux) and his expenses; and that he should retain that sum, being the stipulated compensation for his services. And, in this letter, he commended his transactions to Sayre's approbation, by telling him, that they "would secure to him (Sayre) a round sum of £8,000. which he thought, in honor and justice he might make his own:" (an intimation afterwards relied on to prove a confederacy between Heffernan and Sayre to defraud Grymes's estate). And, after Heffernan's return to Virginia, Sayre gave him a written acknowledgment, dated the 6th February 1809, that the 5,242 dollars he had received, was justly retained by him on account of his commissions and expenses, according to agreement.

Meantime, however, the court of chancery of Williamsburg, at the instance of the creditors of Grymes's estate, upon strong doubts of the fairness of Sayre's and Heffernan's conduct in respect to it, had taken all the slaves of the estate into its own keeping; and shortly afterwards, Sayre's letters of administration of Grymes's estate were regularly revoked, on account of his misconduct therein; and administration de bonis non was granted to Robert West, to whom possession of all the remaining slaves of the estate was delivered: and thus the delivery of the hundred slaves which Heffernan had sold in New Orleans as the agent of Sayre, was anticipated and prevented, and the execution of that contract intirely defeated.

In 1810, West as the administrator de bonis non of Grymes's estate, exhibited a bill (of foreign attachment) against Mather, Duncan and Kenner, residents of Louisiana, and Heffernan and Sayre home defendants, in the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg; wherein, after setting forth the facts above stated, he charged, That the whole of the transactions were, on the part of Sayre and Heffernan, a confederacy to defraud the creditors 516 of Grymes's estate, *and others interested in it, and to share the plunder between them; inferring this fraudulent design from the circumstances of the transactions, and, especially, from the suggestion in Heffernan's letter to Sayre of the 26th January 1809, that his proceedings would secure £8,000. to Sayre, which he thought, Sayre might make his own: That Heffernan betrayed his trust, when he accepted the engagement of Duncan and Mather, to fulfil the contract of Cardineaux, their own acknowledged agent in contracting the debt, instead of insisting on good security, or on a restoration of the property: That Heffernan had not the colour of authority to extend the credit of the debt of Duncan and Mather for the 5,800 dollars, the balance of the purchase money of the slaves they had bought of Sayre through Cardineaux's agency, from twelve months to four years; and therefore, that debt became due to Grymes's estate, on the 20th October 1809, according to the original contract; and West as the administrator de bonis non of Grymes, was entitled to demand it: that Heffernan having received of Mather and Kenner 5,242 dollars, on the executory contract made by him for Sayre with them, for the sale of the hundred slaves of Grymes's estate, and the execution of that contract having been defeated in the manner above mentioned, Heffernan was the debtor of Mather and Kenner, to that amount, as money had and received to their use; and this debt of Heffernan to the absent defendants Mather and Kenner, or at least Mather's moiety thereof, was liable to attachment in the hands of Heffernan, as a garnishee to satisfy the debt due from Duncan and Mather, to Grymes's estate. And the bill prayed, that Heffernan's debt to Mather and Kenner, should accordingly be attached in the hands of Heffernan, as garnishee, that he should be compelled to pay the same, and that the court would apply it to the satisfaction of the debt of Duncan and Mather to Grymes's estate.

Heffernan and Sayre, in their answers denied the fraudulent design and confederacy imputed by the bill, and Sayre's intention to appropriate the assets of 517 Grymes's estate *to his own use: and they insisted that they had full authority, respectively, for all they had done; that their transactions were advantageous to Grymes's estate; and that the money which Heffernan had received from Mather and Kenner, in advance, upon the executory contract for the sale of the hundred slaves, having been accounted for by him to Sayre, to his intire satisfaction, and appropriated to pay the stipulated compensation due Heffernan for his services to Grymes's estate, was Heffernan's own money to all intents and purposes.

There was an order of publication against the absent defendants, Duncan, Mather and Kenner; and they failing to appear and answer, the bill was regularly taken pro confesso as to them.

The chancellor dismissed the bill (with the plaintiff's consent) as to the defendants Sayre and Kenner; but he decreed, that the absent defendants Duncan and Mather should pay the plaintiff the balance of the purchase money of the forty-three slaves, bought by them of Sayre, through the agency of Cardineaux, with interest from the 20th October 1809, and that Heffernan should pay the plaintiff to be applied towards the satisfaction of the debt decreed against Duncan and Mather, one half of the money (Mather's) which Heffernan had received of Mather and Kenner, on the executory contract for the sale of the hundred slaves, with interest from the time he received it.

Heffernan immediately appealed from the decree, giving bond with surety to prosecute the appeal &c. in a penalty equal to double the amount of the money he was decreed to pay. The hearing of the cause in this court was delayed by a tissue of abatements, owing to the death first of Heffernan, then of West, and afterwards, of several successive representatives of Heffernan, of West, and of Grymes's estate, and by the failure of the representatives of the parties, from time to time, to sue out process to revive the appeal, with promptitude. It was at length revived in the names of Segar sheriff of Middlesex, and administrator *de bonis non of Heffernan, against Braxton, administrator de bonis non of Grymes; and was argued at this term, by Johnson for the appellant, and J. M'C. Wickham for the appellee.

I. Johnson objected, but neither the original plaintiff West, nor Braxton against whom the appeal was now revived, had any right, as administrators de bonis non of Grymes, to demand the debt due from Duncan and Mather to Sayre, the first representative of Grymes, upon the contract made by him with them, through their agent Cardineaux, whereby Sayre intended to convert, and did convert, the slaves of Grymes's estate to his own use. And he cited Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 51, as fully sustaining the objection.

Wickham answered, that, supposing this would have been an available objection for the absent debtors Duncan and Mather (who had not and could not have appealed from the decree) Heffernan could not make the objection. But, in truth, if the absent debtors were before the court, making the objection, it would not avail them. For, as both Sayre and Heffernan, in their answers, declared that it was not Sayre's intention to convert the money to his own use, the administrator de bonis non was entitled to demand the debt, upon a principle recognized in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, that though the slaves of Grymes's estate were converted into another fund by Sayre, the property was not altered in the view of a court of equity, because Sayre did not intend by such alteration to convert it to his own use.

II. Johnson said the money received by Heffernan of Mather and Kenner, upon the second contract for the sale of the hundred slaves, could not possibly constitute a debt from him to Duncan and Mather, the debtors of Grymes's estate upon the first contract made by Sayre with Cardineaux. But waiving this consideration, the money received by Heffernan was his own. He received it under an ample authority given by Sayre, who had full power to give him such authority: he was accountable to Sayre for it: he did *account to him for it; and Sayre authorized him to retain it, as the compensation for his services previously stipulated. Mather and Kenner had no right to recover the money they had paid Heffernan as money had and received to their use; not of Heffernan, certainly, for they paid it to him to be paid or accounted for to Sayre; and as to Sayre, they were not bound to forego their specific remedy against him; an action to recover damages, for his breach of the covenant made for him by Heffernan, for the sale and delivery of the hundred slaves. And supposing Sayre had no right to authorize Heffernan to retain the money; that it is, therefore, to be regarded as money belonging to Grymes's estate; and that the representative of Grymes might recover it of Heffernan in an action at law; he surely could not recover it in this suit, a foreign attachment in chancery, to sustain which it is essential that there should be a subject within the jurisdiction of the court, belonging to the absent debtor.

Wickham said, that by express provision of law (1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 49, p. 387). Sayre had no right to sell, but on the contrary, was interdicted from selling, the slaves of Grymes's estate, unless the other personal assets were insufficient to pay the debts, which was not shewn; no right, consequently, to authorize Heffernan to sell, or contract to sell, any of Grymes's slaves; and no right to stipulate or give any compensation to Heffernan out of Grymes's estate, for doing what the law positively interdicted. The covenant for the sale of the hundred slaves, was a palpable violation of Sayre's trust as the representative of Grymes; and could never have been specifically enforced. The money paid to Heffernan by Mather and Kenner, upon that contract, was paid upon a consideration that failed in the very inception of the contract; it was, in effect, paid without consideration. It was, then, money had and received by Heffernan to their use; he was bound ex æquo et bono to refund it to them. In the engagement indorsed by Heffernan on Cardineaux's contract, to extend the credit for the balance due thereon, from one year to four years, he declared *that his inducement to make that extraordinary agreement, was the advantageous bargain he had made for the sale of the hundred slaves, which he described as a contract made with Mather, Duncan &c. The &c. meant Kenner. Thus, it appeared, that Duncan was interested in the second as well as in the first contract. The money paid Heffernan on the second contract, was the money of Duncan, Mather and Kenner. And the portion of the debt thus contracted, by Heffernan to the three, which belonged to Duncan and Mather, or to either of them, was subject to be attached and condemned to satisfy the debt due by Duncan and Mather to Grymes's estate upon the first contract. Shaver v. White, 6 Munf. 110. As to Sayre and Heffernan, he said, it was impossible the court should countenance their conduct in these transactions: the actual sale of forty-three slaves of Grymes's estate, without occasion and against law (a proceeding, in which, obviously, Heffernan confederated with Sayre); the attempt to sell the residue by hundreds; the exorbitancy of the compensation stipulated to be paid Heffernan, for his assistance in this injustice to the estate; the fact of Sayre's allowing the money received by Heffernan, to be retained by him as compensation for his services, after the court of chancery had taken the estate from him, on account of his misconduct, and when the revocation of his letters of administration was certain; every circumstance of these transactions evinced the iniquitous character of them, and took from the parties all claim to countenance or favour.

CARR, J. The first point made in the argument for the appellant, was, that the administrator de bonis non could not support this demand, because the first administrator by the sale of the forty-three slaves had so converted the property, that it amounted to an administration, and the covenant by which the vendees of the slaves were bound for the balance of the purchase money, would enure, not to the administrator de bonis non, but to the representative of the *first administrator. And for this position the case of Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo was relied on. This question might well have been raised by the absent defendants, if they had appeared and given security, before the decree, or had used their privilege to open the decree within seven years; and though they did not appear, it was proper matter to be considered, and we must presume, was considered by the court below. But it is very questionable with me, whether the home defendants can raise it. The foreign attachment had two objects, perfectly distinct, 1. to get a decree against the absent debtors for a debt claimed to be due from them; 2. to get an order against the home defendant Heffernan to pay to the plaintiff whatever sum (to the amount of that debt) he might be found to owe the absentees. With respect to the debt claimed of the absentees, the home defendant was not called on to answer, and had nothing to do with it: as to that, the plaintiff had to produce evidence of his claim, and the court, if satisfied therewith, would decree against the absentees. The home defendant was called on simply to say, whether he owed the absentees any debt, and to what amount? If he admitted that he had received property or money from them, but claimed it as his own, the court would judge upon the allegations and proofs, whether it was his or theirs: if it adjudged the debt to belong to the absentees, it would decree, that the home defendant should pay it, (or so much as was proper) to the plaintiff. Of this decree, the home defendant might complain, and take an appeal from it: but such appeal, I apprehend, would bring before the appellate court, that part of the case only which concerned the appellant: the residue would remain unappealed from, and therefore not subject to the revision of this court. That this is so, seems apparent from several considerations: 1. By what right should the home defendant be empowered to appeal for the absentees? His answer does not put in issue the justice of the plaintiff's demand against them: he is not their agent: he claims nothing jointly with them.

That part of the decree from which he 522 appeals, so far from *being against them, is in their favour; for the money which the home defendant claims as his, that decree decides to be theirs, and orders him to pay it towards their debt to the plaintiff. Again: how can there be an appeal as to the absent defendants, when they have never entered their appearance in the cause? The law is express, that a day is to be given to the absentees to appear, and give security for performing the decree; if they fail, the court is to take such proof as the plaintiff offers, and, if satisfied therewith, shall make such decree as shall seem just &c. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 2, p. 474, 5. If the absentee, within seven years, shall return and appear openly, the plaintiff shall serve him with a copy of the decree; and thereupon, he may within twelve months, or if not served with the decree he may within seven years, appear in court, and petition to have the cause reheard; and upon giving such security as the court shall require, shall be admitted to answer the bill, issue may be enjoined, witnesses examined, and such other proceedings, decree &c. as shall seem just: but if the absentee shall not within twelve months after service of a copy, or if not served, within seven years after the decree pronounced, appear as aforesaid &c. the decree, so made, shall stand absolutely confirmed against such absentee. The decree of the court of chancery in this case, was pronounced in 1813, and in 1831, we are called on to reverse it; no appearance having been entered by the absentees; no security given. Suppose the absentees within seven years had wished to appear, where must such appearance have been entered? Assuredly in the court where the decree was pronounced. And this proves that the appeal of the home defendant did not bring up their part of the case; for it could not be depending both here and there at the same time. Again: the appellant gives a bond, which is saved if he prosecutes his appeal with success. Suppose the home defendant here had proved that he owed the absentees nothing, would he not have succeeded completely, and reversed the decree in every thing which connected him? One more consideration:

523 *the sum charged to be in the hands of the home defendant belonging to the absent debtor may not amount to a tenth part of the debt due from the absentee to the plaintiff: if the appeal brings up the whole case, there ought to be security given on the appeal, to cover the plaintiff's whole demand; for no one will deny, that if the absentees had appeared in the court below, and taken an appeal from that court, they would have had to give security to cover the whole demand against them; and yet would it not be most oppressive on the home defendant, to say that he should not be allowed to appeal, unless he gave security to cover the whole demand, when he has nothing to do with nine tenths of it? The appeal bond, in the present case, is not before us; but we see the amount in which it was directed to be taken; and that shews, that it was meant only to cover the sum which the home defendant was decreed to pay to the plaintiff. From these considerations, it is clear to me, that the case as between the plaintiff and absent defendants is not brought up by the appeal of Heffernan.

If it were, I should have no difficulty in saying, that trying the question by the very principles established in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, the administrator de bonis non might well recover against the absent defendants in the present case. This case falls within that class distinctly treated of there, where the executor has changed the property, as by investing money in the funds, transferring it from one particular stock to another, or the like, but this done for the benefit of the estate, and without intention of making the money his own, as is declared by Sayre in his answer, to have been the case here. In such cases, though the act may amount to a conversion at law, equity, looking at the quo animo, will follow the property, and consider it still unadministered.

It will be remarked, that the bill was dismissed by consent, as to Sayre the other home defendant, so that the single question before the court is this: did the chancellor err in decreeing that Heffernan should pay the money to the plaintiff, 524 *as so much money due from him, to the absent defendant Mather? I, to first thought the decree right; in which opinion, I was probably influenced by that strong disapprobation, which every ingenious mind must feel at the moral aspect of this whole transaction. But closer and more dispassionate examination has compelled me to change my first impression. Heffernan, in the sale of the hundred slaves to Mather and Kenner, acted solely as the agent of Sayre, under a written authority: he received the first payment in that character: and as there was no fraud practised by him towards Mather and Kenner (whatever he might have meditated towards the estate of Grymes) and as also, immediately on his return, he accounted with Sayre, to his satisfaction, for the money received, he could not in any point of view, be considered as having in his hands money or property belonging to Mather and Kenner or either of them. It is not material, therefore, to consider, whether, if the joint funds of Mather and Kenner had been in his hands, the interest of Mather in that fund could have been condemned to pay the debt of Mather and Duncan.

Upon the whole, I conclude, that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

The other judges concurred.

Pleading and Practice—Declaration—Averment of Notice—When Necessary.—When the obligation to perform a promise is dependent on something else to be done, and when from the nature of the case the knowledge of whether this preliminary act has been done lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff and could not reasonably be expected to be known to the defendant, unless the information was given him by the plaintiff, then such information must be given to the defendant before he can be held bound to the performance of his promise; and therefore, in such case, notice must be alleged in the declaration. James v. Adams, 16 W. Va. 259, citing, among others, the principal case, Austin v. Richardson, 3 Call 201, and Pasteur v. Parker, 3 Rand. 458.

and C. the younger of the wards having attained to full age, A. delivers to C. six slaves, the property of both wards in equal shares, and takes bond and surety from C. with condition, that, if B. returns to the country, or in any other manner claims his proportion of said slaves and their hires, and receive satisfaction from C. then obligation to be void &c. HELD, C. and his surety are bound by this bond though B. die without ever returning to country, to indemnify A. against the claims, of B.'s representative.

Same—Same—Breach of Condition—What Constitutes.

—One of distributees of B. sues D. as executor of A. his former guardian, for her share of B.'s moiety of the slaves, and recovers decree in chancery for value of share, but no legal representative of B. is party to that suit; and this recovery and payment of amount recovered, are alleged as breach of condition of C.'s indemnifying bond, in an action thereon against C.'s surety: HELD, it is a breach thereof; and defendant cannot, in this action, contest the regularity of the decree in chancery, or take advantage of any error in it: neither can he plead, that D. was never the executor of A.

Same—Same—Action on by Administrator d. b. n. of Guardian.—The money decreed to the distributee of B. against D. as executor of A. his former guardian, is paid out of A.'s estate: HELD the administrator de bonis non of A. is entitled to an action on the indemnifying bond given by C. to A. to recover the amount so paid, from C.'s surety therein bound.

John Thompson with John Lamb and Robert Lamb his sureties, executed a bond to Braxton Harrison, dated the 12th April 1807, in the penalty of 1000 dollars, with the following condition: "Whereas Braxton Harrison did take upon himself the guardianship of Emery Thompson and John Thompson, and whereas the said Emery is now absent, and hath been for several years, and the said John, who is the younger of the two, hath reached the age of twenty-one years, and they the said Emery and John owning jointly six slaves (that is, three each) and the said Emery not being present or in any way represented so as to receive his proportion, they are given up to the said John by his late guardian Braxton Harrison; now, the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the above named Emery Thompson returns to this country, or 526 in any other manner claims *his proportion of the said slaves and hire, and doth receive full and complete satisfaction from his said brother John, or any other person or persons, then this obligation to be void &c."

Thomas Poythress administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Braxton Harrison, the obligee, in 1825, brought debt upon this bond, in the circuit court of Charles City, against John Lamb, the only obligor then surviving; and, in his declaration, after setting out the condition of the bond in hæc verba, he alleged as breaches thereof, 1. that Emery Thompson had not returned to the country, or in any other manner whatever claimed his proportion of the slaves and their hires, and had not received full and complete satisfaction from his brother John Thompson, or any other person; 2. that Emery Thompson was dead, and that Sarah Harwood, one of his legal representatives, entitled by law to a distributive

tion was given him by the plaintiff, then such information must be given to the defendant before he can be held bound to the performance of his promise; and therefore, in such case, notice must be alleged in the declaration. James v. Adams, 16 W. Va. 259, citing, among others, the principal case, Austin v. Richardson, 3 Call 201, and Pasteur v. Parker, 3 Rand. 458.

share of his slaves and their hires, had never received the same of John Thompson, though she had often demanded it of him, and that James Harwood and the said Sarah his wife had brought suit in the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, against John Minge in the character of executor of Collier Harrison who was executor of Braxton Harrison, to recover the share of the slaves and their hires, to which the said Sarah was entitled as a distributee of the said Emery, in which suit the court of chancery decreed to Harwood and wife, against said Minge, as executor as aforesaid, the sum of 525 dollars, that being the share of the value of the slaves of Emery Thompson, to which they were entitled, which sum so decreed to Harwood and wife was actually paid to them by Minge out of the estate of Braxton Harrison.

The defendant Lamb put in, 1. a general demurrer to the declaration, upon which the court held that the law was for the plaintiff; and 2. the plea of conditions performed, on which an issue was made up.

And at the calling of the cause for the trial of the issue on the plea of conditions performed, Lamb tendered another 527 *plea, alleging, as a bar to the action, that John Minge in the declaration mentioned, against whom the decree in chancery was obtained by Harwood and wife, was not, at the time of that decree, or at any time before or since, the executor or the administrator or otherwise the representative of Braxton Harrison. But the court would not allow this plea to be put in; to which opinion Lamb filed a bill of exceptions.

At the trial of the issue on the plea of conditions performed, the plaintiff, to sustain the allegation in his declaration, of the payment, by Minge as executor of Braxton Harrison, out of the assets of his estate, of the amount decreed to Harwood and wife, offered in evidence, a feri facias sued out of the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, on the 11th February 1825 by Harwood and wife, against Minge as executor of Braxton Harrison, for the money decreed by that court to Harwood and wife, (amounting, principal and interest, to 525 dollars) to be levied de bonis testatoris if so much thereof should be found in Minge's hands, if not then de bonis propriis; and a receipt of Harwood, dated the 17th March 1825, and indorsed on the execution, for the 525 dollars the amount thereof, "received of Thomas Poythress." And then the defendant shewed, that the same Thomas Poythress, before the date of the feri facias and of his payment of the amount thereof, namely, on the 20th November 1823, was duly appointed the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Braxton Harrison. Whereupon the defendant moved the court to exclude the feri facias, and the receipt for the money from Poythress thereon indorsed, from going in evidence to the jury, as proof of the allegation in the declaration, of a payment by Minge out of the estate of Harrison: but the court overruled the motion, and admitted the evidence. Then the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff had no right to recover damages in this action, on account of any payment made by Minge of the amount of the decree in the declaration mentioned; which instruction the court refused to 528 give to *the jury. And to these opinions of the court the defendant filed a bill of exceptions.

The jury found for the plaintiff, the amount paid to Harwood and wife upon their decree in chancery, in damages: whereupon the court gave judgment for the debt claimed in the declaration (the penalty of the bond) to be discharged by the payment of the damages assessed by the jury, and the costs &c. Lamb appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by the attorney general for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee.

I. The attorney general said, the demurrer to the declaration ought to have been sustained. The sureties of John Thompson, in the bond to indemnify Harrison the guardian, were not bound beyond the express terms of the bond: they were bound to indemnify Harrison, only in case Emery Thompson should return to the country, or in any other manner claim his share of the slaves which had been delivered up to John; that is, in case he should return to claim, or should otherwise in his own person claim them. Now, the first breach assigned was, that Emery never returned, and never in any manner claimed, and never received of John, his share of the slaves: which shewed not any breach of the bond, but, in effect, that there was no breach of it. The second breach assigned, instead of shewing that Emery returned, or in any manner claimed his share, shewed that he was dead, and that one of his legal representatives had claimed and obtained a decree in chancery for her distributive share of his slaves; and then set forth a decree for a distributee of Emery, in a suit in which neither his administrator or other legal representative was a party, and in which the obligors in this bond were not parties; a decree, not against the plaintiff, the administrator de bonis non of Harrison, but against Minge his executor, and the amount of which, it was expressly averred, Minge had paid. But the condition of the bond imported no contract on the part of the obligors, to indemnify the obligee against 529 the claims *of the legal representatives of Emery, much less of his distributees: that was not in their bond. If the legal representative of Emery would have had a right to recover Emery's share of the slaves from his guardian, Emery's distributees had no right to sue for it, at law or in equity; and the obligors in this bond, not being parties to their suit, could not be affected by a decree, which, as described in the declaration, was plainly irregular and unjust. And as Minge paid the amount decreed to the distributee, Minge or his representative, if any body, had the right to demand indemnity of the obligors in this bond: the plaintiff, the administrator de bonis non of the obligee, was not entitled to the action. Besides, he said, though the condition of the bond bound the obligors to the indemnity, only in case Emery should return or in some manner claim his share, and in case John, or some other person for him, on such claim made, should not deliver him his share; yet the declaration contained no averment of any special request to the obligors in the bond, by the distributee of Emery, or any other person, to make good her share to her, and no averment that it was not made good to her by any other person than John.

Leigh submitted, that the condition of the bond could not, upon any just construction, be restrained to an indemnity provided for the guardian, against a claim to be made by Emery, in person, for his share of the slaves: it stipulated an indemnity against Emery's just claim, in case he should return and claim in person, or in case his claim should in any other manner be asserted; against his claim, whether asserted by himself, or by his representatives, or others claiming under him. And then, though the first breach assigned were allowed to be insensible and nugatory, the second was in substance, well assigned. It set forth a claim by one of Emery's distributees, of her distributive share of his moiety of the slaves, and a decree in chancery for the distributee against the executor of the obligee, for her share: the decree declared this distributee a representative of Emery, entitled to assert that claim; and 530 whether it rightly *so declared or not, the decree could not be questioned in this action; nor was its alleged irregularity at all material to the obligors in the indemnifying bond. It was, indeed, averred, that Minge the executor of the obligee, had paid the amount of the decree; but it was averred further, that he paid it out of the assets of his testator's estate; therefore the administrator de bonis non had a right to this action to recover the indemnity to the testator's estate, which, and not Minge the executor, had sustained the damage. As to the want of any averment of a special request upon the obligors to perform the condition of their own bond, or of the nonperformance of it by any other person than their principal, he submitted, there could be no necessity for any such averments, or at least, that the omission of them could not be fatal on a general demurrer.

II. The attorney general said, the plea that Minge was never the executor or otherwise the representative of Harrison the guardian of Emery Thompson, ought to have been allowed to be put in; because that fact evinced, that the decree obtained by Harwood and wife against him in that imputed character, which in truth did not belong to him, was collusive and fraudulent.

Leigh. The plea did not allege fraud or collusion. Minge did not deny in the court of chancery, that he was the representative of Harrison; and the decree was satisfied out of Harrison's estate. There could have been no collusion, no fraud, intended or practised.

III. The attorney general contended, that the evidence adduced to prove the breach of the condition of the bond alleged in the declaration, did not prove it: the probata, he said, did not correspond with the allegata. The allegation was, that the sum decreed to Harwood and wife, was actually paid by Minge out of the estate of Harrison; the proof, that it was actually paid by Poythress, and that, after he had been appointed administrator de bonis non of Harrison's estate, and of course, after Harrison's estate was in his own hands. The evidence, therefore, ought to have been excluded.

531 *Leigh said, it might well be intended, that Poythress made the payment as the agent of Minge.

BROOKE, P., delivered the opinion of the court. This is an action on a bond of indemnity, entered into by the appellant and his co-obligors, to indemnify Braxton Harrison, for delivering up six slaves, the property of his two wards, Emery and John Thompson, to John, against the claim of Emery, who was out of the country, and of those representing him in case of his death. The condition of the bond is awkwardly expressed; but it is susceptible of this construction only, upon due attention to the nature of the transaction, and the object of the parties.

The defendant put in a general demurrer to the declaration, and the plea of conditions performed.

The first assignment of a breach in the declaration, conforms with the words of the condition of the bond, and not the substantial meaning of it; and, if taken literally, is a felo de se; because if found to be true by the jury, it would avoid the bond and defeat the action. But the second assignment of a breach of the condition, is substantially good: it corresponds with the evident intention of the parties, in the construction it gives to the condition; and though somewhat informal, is good on general demurrer. The objection, that this assignment of a breach is bad, because the proper parties were not before the court of chancery when it made the decree therein relied on as a breach of the condition of the bond, has nothing in it; since, though there may have been error in the decree, it cannot be availed of by impeaching it here. Nor is the last objection to the declaration more sound: that it does not allege a special request to the defendant to indemnify according to the condition of his bond. Where a defendant has contracted to do a thing, upon the performance of an act by a stranger, notice need not be averred in the declaration, for it lies in the defendant's knowledge as much as the plaintiff's, and he ought to take notice at his peril; and, on the same principle, if 532 one *be bound to another to indemnify him against the acts of a third person, no notice of those acts need be averred. 1 Chitt. plead. 320, 321; 1 Wms. Saund. 117, note 2, and the cases there cited.

There is no error in the opinions of the circuit court, given at the trial of the issue, and excepted to by the appellant. It must be taken, that the plaintiff Poythress paid the money due on the decree of Harwood and wife, against Minge as the executor of Harrison, as Minge's agent, out of the assets of Harrison's estate, which, though then in the hands of Poythress as the administrator de bonis non, were liable to satisfy the decree against Minge the executor. And as the decree was satisfied out of Harrison's estate, Poythress his administrator de bonis non is entitled to recover the indemnity in this action.

The judgment is to be affirmed.

share of his slaves and their hires, had never received the same of John Thompson, though she had often demanded it of him, and that James Harwood and the said Sarah his wife had brought suit in the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, against John Minge in the character of executor of Collier Harrison who was executor of Braxton Harrison, to recover the share of the slaves and their hires, to which the said Sarah was entitled as a distributee of the said Emery, in which suit the court of chancery decreed to Harwood and wife, against said Minge, as executor as aforesaid, the sum of 525 dollars, that being the share of the value of the slaves of Emery Thompson, to which they were entitled, which sum so decreed to Harwood and wife was actually paid to them by Minge out of the estate of Braxton Harrison.

The defendant Lamb put in, 1. a general demurrer to the declaration, upon which the court held that the law was for the plaintiff; and 2. the plea of conditions performed, on which an issue was made up.

And at the calling of the cause for the trial of the issue on the plea of conditions performed, Lamb tendered another
527 *plea, alleging, as a bar to the action, that John Minge in the declaration mentioned, against whom the decree in chancery was obtained by Harwood and wife, was not, at the time of that decree, or at any time before or since, the executor or the administrator or otherwise the representative of Braxton Harrison. But the court would not allow this plea to be put in; to which opinion Lamb filed a bill of exceptions.

At the trial of the issue on the plea of conditions performed, the plaintiff, to sustain the allegation in his declaration, of the payment, by Minge as executor of Braxton Harrison, out of the assets of his estate, of the amount decreed to Harwood and wife, offered in evidence, a fieri facias sued out of the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, on the 11th February 1825 by Harwood and wife, against Minge as executor of Braxton Harrison, for the money decreed by that court to Harwood and wife, (amounting, principal and interest, to 525 dollars) to be levied de bonis testatoris if so much thereof should be found in Minge's hands, if not then de bonis propriis; and a receipt of Harwood, dated the 17th March 1825, and indorsed on the execution, for the 525 dollars the amount thereof, "received of Thomas Poythress." And then the defendant shewed, that the same Thomas Poythress, before the date of the fieri facias and of his payment of the amount thereof, namely, on the 20th November 1823, was duly appointed the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Braxton Harrison. Whereupon the defendant moved the court to exclude the fieri facias, and the receipt for the money from Poythress thereon indorsed, from going in evidence to the jury, as proof of the allegation in the declaration, of a payment by Minge out of the estate of Harrison: but the court overruled the motion, and admitted the evidence. Then the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff had no right to recover damages in this action, on account of any payment made by Minge of the amount of the decree in the declaration mentioned; which instruction the court refused to 528 give to the jury. And to these opinions of the court the defendant filed a bill of exceptions.

The jury found for the plaintiff, the amount paid to Harwood and wife upon their decree in chancery, in damages: whereupon the court gave judgment for the debt claimed in the declaration (the penalty of the bond) to be discharged by the payment of the damages assessed by the jury, and the costs &c. Lamb appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by the attorney general for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee.

February, 1881.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Assumpsit against Administrator d. b. n.—Joinder of Counts.—Statute of Limitations.—It seems, that in assumpsit against an administrator de bonis non, counts upon promises made by the executor or a former administrator of the deceased debtor, as such, may be joined with counts on promises by the deceased debtor himself, to save the statute of limitations; dubitante GREEN, J.

Same—Same—Averments.—But, in such case, the counts upon promises of the executor or former administrator, must distinctly aver the promises to have been made as executor or administrator; otherwise, they are bad upon general demurrer; per tot. cur.

Benjamin Harrison qualified, and acted for some time, as executor of William Harrison's will; but his authority (it appeared) was revoked; and administration de bonis non of the testator's estate with his will annexed, was granted to Richard Dunn. And then the appellant Bishop brought assumpsit, in the circuit court of Prince George, against 533 *Dunn administrator de bonis non &c. to recover a debt claimed as due him by the testator. His declaration contained eight counts; five, upon the promises of the testator in his lifetime; one, upon the promise of the defendant, the administrator de bonis non, made after the administration was granted to him; and two, upon the promises of Benjamin Harrison, made after his qualification as executor of William, and before his authority was revoked, in consideration of the debt due by the testator to the plaintiff; but these two counts did not aver that the promises of Benjamin Harrison, were made by him as the executor of William the testator. To the two counts founded on the promises of the executor before the revocation of his authority, the defendant demurred generally, and the court sustained the demurrer. To all the other counts he pleaded the general issue, upon which the jury found for him. And judgment being rendered for the defendant, the plaintiff appealed from it to this court.

Shands, for the appellant.

Spooner and Allison, for the appellee.

CABELL, J. The first question is, whether in this action of assumpsit against the administrator de bonis non, to recover a debt due from the testator, it was competent to the plaintiff to join counts on promises by the executor as executor, with counts on promises by the testator, in order to save the statute of limitations?

It is perfectly clear, that in an action against an executor or administrator (I mean an original administrator) such counts may be joined; and that that is the proper mode of declaring against executors, or administrators, to save the statute of limitations; 2 Wms. Saund. 117, e; 1 H. Black. 102; Epes's adm'r v. Dudley's adm'r, 5 Rand. 436. This position being admitted or established, it seems to me, that it must follow, as a necessary consequence, that such counts

534 *may also be joined, where the action is brought against the administrator de bonis non. It is clearly competent to an executor, by his promise to pay a debt of the testator, to exempt the case from the operation of the statute of limitations; and it is no devastavit in him to do so. If the executor die or be removed before he has paid the debt, it still remains a debt due from the testator; and the obligation to pay it devolves on the administrator de bonis non, who comes in the place of the executor, and is the representative of the testator. Why, then, may not the creditor, in an action against the administrator de bonis non, avail himself of the promise by the executor in the same manner as he might have done, if the action had been brought against the executor himself? It is said, there is no privity between the administrator de bonis non and the executor. Even if this were so, I do not see that it would affect the question under consideration. The right of the plaintiff to proceed against the administrator de bonis non, for a debt due from the testator, and which has been saved from the operation of the statute of limitations by a promise of the executor, depends, as I conceive, not so much on the idea of a privity between the administrator de bonis non and the executor, as on the right of the creditor to the debt due from the testator, and the obligation of the administrator as the representative of the testator, to pay all his debts, so far as the unadministered assets will extend. But, I am of

*Administrators.—Suits against.—Joinder of Counts.—It is perfectly clear that in an action against an executor or administrator counts on promises by the executor as such and counts on promises by the testator may be joined, and this is the proper mode of declaring against executors or administrators to save the statute of limitations. Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 55, citing principal case.

See further, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Suits against Administrator d. b. n.—Promise of Administrator.—A suit may be brought against an administrator de bonis non on a promise made by the administrator to pay a debt of his intestate. Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 57, citing principal case.

*Administrators.—Promise to Pay Decedent's Debt.—Effect on Statute of Limitations.—To the point that where a debt against an estate is known to be just, and is about to be barred by the statute of limitations, after the death of the testator or intestate, the personal representative may make a promise to pay, which will prevent the operation of the statute, the principal case was cited in Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 666.

In Seig v. Acord, 21 Gratt. 365, 370, it was held that a debt which is barred by the statute of limitation at the death of the debtor cannot be revived by the promise of the personal representative to pay it. ANDERSON, J. In delivering the opinion of the court, said that the principal case is not in conflict with this decision; that the opinion of the judges in the principal case were evidently given in reference to a case where the debt had not been barred in the life of the testator and the promise by the executor was not relied on to remove an existing bar, but to exempt the case from the statute of limitations. After quoting from the opinion of JUDGE CARR, to support his proposition, JUDGE ANDERSON says: "It seems to me, therefore, that as the law then stood [1831], as well as now, a debt against the decedent, barred by the statute of limitations in his lifetime could not be revived and made a charge upon the estate by the promise of the executor or administrator to pay it. And, consequently, if it was a debt due to the personal representative, in his own right, he could not obtain it out of the assets and charge the estate with it."

See further, monographic note on "Debts of Decedents" appended to Shores v. Wares, 1 Rob. 1.

*Same.—Suit against Representative Capacity.—In Kayser v. Disher, 9 Leigh 350, the first count in the declaration alleged "that the said defendant executor as aforesaid," by his promissory note, etc., was indebted, etc., to the plaintiff "as legatee;" and being so indebted, in consideration thereof, "he, the said defendant, as executor as aforesaid, promised, etc." This was held to be distinctly the form of the declaration against an executor in his representative character. Epes v. Dudley, 5 Rand. 437, and Bishop v. Harrison, 2 Leigh 532, were cited to support the decision.

opinion, there is a privity of estate between the administrator de bonis non and the executor. I know it was said by one of the judges of this court, in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 51, 55, that there is no privity between them. No person can respect that judge's opinions more than I do; but I must differ from him on this point. Besides, that was not the question before the court in that case: the real question was, whether it was competent for the administrator de bonis non to maintain a suit against the representatives of the deceased administrator, for assets of the intestate, which had been wasted, or converted to his own use, by the first administrator; 535 *and it was decided, not on the ground of the want of privity, but on the ground that the commission of the administrator de bonis non did not extend to such assets. In Dykes & co. v. Woodhouse's adm'r, 3 Rand. 287, the question was, whether an administrator de bonis non was entitled to an action of debt, or scire facias on a judgment obtained by an executor for a debt due to the testator. It appears from the authorities cited in that case, that the courts of England had formerly, for a great length of time, decided that the administrator de bonis non had no such right; and the principal ground of their decision was, that there was no privity between him and the first administrator. Two of the three judges of this court, who decided Dykes & co. v. Woodhouse's adm'r, did not say whether, in their opinions, there was or was not a privity between them: they did, however, decide, in opposition to the former decisions of the english courts, that the administrator de bonis non might enforce the former judgment, either by action of debt, or by scire facias; and if I were called to judge, by their arguments as reported, I should say, they thought there was a privity. Judge Brooke, the other judge, expressed himself positively, that there is a privity of estate. And whatever may have been the opinion of the english judges in former times, I am inclined to believe, that at the present day, it is admitted in England, that there is a privity between the administrator de bonis non, and the former administrator. This manifestly appears to have been the opinion of lord Kenyon and of Ashhurst justice, who decided the case of Hirst, adm'r &c. v. Smith, 7 T. R. 182. That case was assumpsit by an administrator de bonis non, to recover a debt due to the plaintiff's intestate. The declaration contained one set of counts on promises made by the defendant to the intestate, and another on promises made to the former administrator. The plea was the statute of limitations. A verdict having been found for the plaintiff, the counsel for the defendant moved in arrest of judgment, "because no promises was laid to have been made to the plaintiff, but 536 to the former *administrator, between whom and the plaintiff there was no privity." Lord Kenyon said, "The defendant's objection rests on this broad foundation, that there is no privity between the former administrator and the plaintiff, the administrator de bonis non. But that proposition certainly is not true in its extent. Suppose the former administrator had entered into an agreement for the sale of the lease of a chattel interest belonging to the intestate, and had died before the agreement was completed, the administrator de bonis non, stands in such privity of estate, that he would be compelled to carry the agreement into execution." And Ashhurst, J., said, "As it is alleged that the promise was made to a person from whom the plaintiff deduces his title, and between whom and the plaintiff there is a privity of estate in law, it is the same as if it had been stated that the promise had been made to the plaintiff himself, because the law recognizes the relation." Here, then, is a case where the administrator de bonis non was plaintiff claiming the benefit of a promise made to the former administrator, and which was decided in his favor, expressly on the ground of privity. The case supposed by lord Kenyon, is more opposite to that now before us; a case where the administrator de bonis non would be defendant, and where the effort would be to bind him to the performance of a promise made by the former administrator; and he says he would be bound on the ground of privity. This produces a symmetry in all the parts of the law in relation to this subject. An administrator de bonis non, when plaintiff, will be entitled to the benefit of judgments and promises rendered for or made to the executor or former administrator, according to the case of Dykes & co. v. Woodhouse's adm'r and Hirst v. Smith; and, when defendant, he will be subjected to judgments and promises rendered against or made by the executor or former administrator, for debts due from the testator or intestate; Cro. Car. 167.

Upon the whole I am decidedly of opinion, that, if the two counts founded on the promises of the displaced executor, 537 *in this case, had been properly framed, the demurrers to them ought to have been overruled.

But there is a fatal objection to them. The promises laid in them, are not stated to have been made by the executor as executor; which is absolutely necessary to justify their being joined with counts on promises made by the testator; Brigid v. Parks & al. ex'rs &c., 2 Bos. & Pul. 424; 1 Chit. plead. 205, 6. The reason of this is obvious: the judgment on promises by the testator, would be de bonis testatoris; the judgment on promises by the executor not stated to have been made by him as executor, would be de bonis propriis. On this ground, I think the judgment should be affirmed.

CARR, J. Agreeing with my brother Cabell in the view he has taken of this subject, I should not have said a word but for the purpose of correcting or rather explaining a proposition of mine. too broadly stated, in Wernick v. M'Murdo.

The demurrer to the counts in the declaration founded on the promises of the displaced executor, presents two questions: Whether the assumpsit of the executor can bind the administrator de bonis non? and if it can, Whether the executor's assumpsit be well laid in those counts?

That the promise of an executor, or of an administrator to whom full administration is committed, will bind the estate of the testator or intestate, so far at least as to take the case out of the statute of limitations, is well established. All the books of practice give us the forms of declaring in such cases, and shew us also, that these promises may be joined in the same declaration with counts on promises of the testator or intestate, for the reason, that the judgments will be the same on both, a judgment de bonis testatoris. But, it is said there is no privity between the executor or first administrator and the administrator de bonis non; and Wernick v. M'Murdo is referred to. Upon examining that case, I find that I have said, in so many words, there is no privity between them. I was speaking

538 ing then of the distinction *between the executor of an executor, and the administrator de bonis non: the privity of representation was in my mind; and, as the administrator de bonis non does not claim by, through or under, the former executor or former administrator, I said there was no privity between them. The proposition, taken as I intended it, is correct; but certainly not so, in its broadest extent. There is that sort of privity of estate between them, which enables the executor or first administrator to bind the administrator de bonis non, by his acts properly done while in office. The case put by lord Kenyon in Hirst v. Smith, is apt to illustrate this: he says "suppose the former administrator had entered into an agreement for the sale of a lease of a chattel interest belonging to the estate, and had died before the agreement was completed, the administrator de bonis non stands in such privity of estate, that he would be compelled to carry that agreement into execution." And this is the voice of reason, as well as authority. The executor or administrator represents the testator or intestate completely; he has the legal estate; and it is necessary that he should have it, both for its management, and for the safety of those who deal with him. When he has made a contract as to any of the property, which he had a perfect right to make, and another has thereby gained an interest in that property, his subsequent death or removal cannot affect that interest. In truth, the question does not seem to me to be one of privity, but of power. Here was a debt claimed of the testator: to whom was the creditor to look? To the representative. He applies to the executor while the debt is yet untouched by the statute of limitations, and tells him, here is a debt due me by your testator, and here is the proof of it: it is a debt due by simple contract, and I must sue at once. The executor replies, I see the debt is just, and I tell you before this witness, that I will pay it; therefore, you need not bring suit, but give me time, till money of the estate comes to my hands. The creditor waits; the executor dies; an administrator de bonis non is appointed: shall he say to the creditor, the promise of the executor does not

539 *bind me, nor take your debt out of the statute? Surely, no. The promise does bind him, or rather the estate, at least so far as to remove the bar of the statute; for the executor was clothed with full power to do what he did.

As to the other point, the counts in question are fatally defective. The promises of the executor on which they are founded, are not laid, as they ought to have been, as promises made by the executor as executor.

GREEN, J. I concur in affirming the judgment upon the demurrer upon the defect of the counts in question, in stating the character of the assumpsit by the executor of Harrison. Upon the general question, whether in an action against an administrator de bonis non for a debt originally due by the decedent, the plaintiff can avail himself to any purpose of the assumpsit of the executor or former administrator, I refrain from giving any opinion, having formed no decided one, as the question does not arise in the cause. My impression is, however, that he cannot; and that there is a difference in principle, between the case of a suit by an administrator de bonis non and that of a suit against him, and between the effect of an assumpsit by a debtor of the decedent, made to the former administrator, and an assumpsit by a former administrator to a creditor of the estate.

BROOKE, P., said, his impressions upon the general question which had been discussed, concurred with the opinion of Judge Cabell upon it; but it was not necessary to decide it; since, upon the other point, the fatal defect of the particular counts in question, the judgment must be affirmed.

February, 1831.

Equity Jurisdiction—Determination of Property Rights.

—Bill in chancery, stating that plaintiff is entitled to fee simple and absolute estate in certain real and personal property held by her; but that defendants insist she has only a life estate, remainder to them; and praying a decree declaring and settling her rights: HELD, the court has no jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

Mary Tabb derived from her father, by descent and distribution, a large estate real and personal; and, in November 1800, she being then an infant, and about to marry Bathurst Randolph, articles of agreement were entered into between them, the declared object of which was, to settle her fortune (with certain exceptions) upon her and her heirs. The marriage took place; a son was born; she attained to full age: and then she and her husband joined in a deed con-

Equity Jurisdiction—Determination of Property Rights.—In Bush v. Martins, 7 Leigh 330, it was held that a party in possession of slaves, and claiming them by the former owner's absolute gift in his lifetime, cannot come into equity to be quieted in his title against the donor's executory legatee, to whom the slaves are bequeathed in the event of the claimant's death without leaving issue. CARR J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I think there can be no sound distinction taken between this case and that of Randolph v. Randolph. The principle there decided, is, that the court has no jurisdiction to call before it a remainderman whose right may never come in esse, at the instance of a person in possession, and claiming a right adverse to his." TUCKER, P., in his concurring opinion, said: "The case of Randolph v. Randolph is, I think, conclusive of this: and it was decided, not only upon express authority, but in strict conformity with the general principles of the court of chancery, which disclaims any interference with legal titles. In this case, though the interest of the remaindermen is but contingent, yet their title, such as it is, is a legal title, and cannot be drawn in question in equity. The decision of that court upon the naked question of title, in a case where there is not, and never may be, a subsisting dispute with respect to the right of property, would indeed be an anomaly."

See further, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Philpen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 487.

veying all of her estate comprised in the marriage articles, to R. E. Meade, who re-conveyed it to the husband. Upon this, her mother as the next friend of her infant son &c. exhibited a bill in chancery against Randolph and wife, to set aside their deed to Meade, and his re-conveyance to Randolph, and to have the marriage articles specifically executed. The chancellor dismissed the bill, but on appeal to this court, the decree was reversed. See the report of the case, Tabb & al. v. Archer & al. and Randolph & al. v. Randolph & al., 3 Hen. & Munf. 399, 431, 2. And this court directed, that the deeds from Randolph and wife to Meade, and from Meade to Randolph, should be cancelled: and "That the said Bathurst Randolph and Mary his wife should, within a certain time to be limited by the court of chancery, by deed of bargain and sale or other sufficient conveyance, convey to such person or persons as the court of chancery should name as trustees for that purpose, all the estate, real and personal, which was of the said Mary on the 19th November 1800, (except as in the marriage articles was excepted) together with the progeny of 541 the slaves, and the *increase of the stocks of horses &c. if any, which had come to the hands or possession of the said Randolph and Mary his wife, or either of them, or of any other person to the use of them, or either of them; the lands and other real estate, in fee simple, and the slaves and other personal estate in absolute property; upon trust, to permit the said Randolph to take and receive the rents, issues and profits of the same, during the joint lives of the said Randolph and Mary his wife and their issue (if any) without resorting to or applying any of the original stock to that purpose; and from and after the death of either of them the said Randolph and Mary his wife, to permit the survivor to take and receive the rents, issues and profits, in like manner, for the like purpose, under the like restriction; and from and after the death of such survivor, to hold the said estate real and personal so to be conveyed to them, to the use of all and every child or children of the said Mary, born or to be born of her present marriage, which should be living at the time of the decease of the said Mary, and the descendants of such of the children of the said Mary as might die before her (if any such there should be), as parceners, in parcenary, agreeably to the 16th section of the statute of descents; and in default of such issue of the said Mary living at the time of her death, then, from and after the death of the survivor of them the said Randolph and Mary his wife, the trusts so to be created to cease and determine, and the estate embraced by the said marriage articles, and settlement so to be made, to descend and pass to such persons, and in such proportions, as if such articles and settlement had never been made."

This decree was entered in the court of chancery in June 1809; the deeds executed in violation of the marriage articles, were annulled; and the chancellor appointed trustees, and directed Randolph and wife, on or before the tenth day of the term next after they should be served with a copy of the decree, to make and execute to those trustees, a good and sufficient deed conveying and settling the subject in conformity *with the decree of this court.

But there the business stopped; no such deed was ever executed, and so the legal estate was never vested in the trustees named by the chancellor; nor did they ever take upon themselves the trust, nor even (it seemed) have any notice of their appointment.

Bathurst Randolph the husband, and the issue of the marriage (there were two children), being all dead, Mary the wife, exhibited her bill in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth the facts as above detailed; complaining, that, though all possibility of issue of the marriage was now gone, and though all the purposes of the settlement were accomplished or at an end, yet her next of kin, namely, her mother, brothers and sisters, insisted, and counsel advised them, that she had only a life interest in the estate, with remainder to them, and this claim operated as a clog upon the property, which she insisted was now wholly and absolutely her own; making her mother, brothers and sisters, and the trustees named by the chancellor's decree of June 1809, parties defendants; and praying a decree of the court declaring and settling her rights. The trustees, in answer to the bill, said they had never had any thing to do with the subject, and had either never heard, or had forgotten, that they were appointed. And the defendants, the next of kin to the plaintiff, in their answer, said they did not admit the construction and effect of the decrees upon the subject, to be as the plaintiff claimed they were, and submitted the matter of law to the court.

The chancellor, declaring that it was not competent to him to give any other construction to the marriage articles than that which the court of appeals had given to them, without saying what that construction was, dismissed the bill.

The plaintiff appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Johnson for the appellant; briefly upon the merits, as to which he thought there could be no doubt; but he very earnestly endeavoured to maintain the jurisdiction of the court of 543 chancery to entertain *such a bill as this; which was the point of difficulty in this court.

CARR, J. The court has no difficulty as to the construction and effect of the former decree of this court, directing the settlement, according to the marriage articles between Bathurst Randolph and his wife Mary, the plaintiff in this suit. The whole aspect of the case, and all the reasoning of the court in its decree, lead to the same conclusion. Here was an infant with a large estate real and personal: it was important to protect her property from the marital rights of her intended husband, and to provide for the issue of the marriage: her mother, therefore, procured the marriage articles to be executed. The sole object of them, as this court properly concluded, was a provision for the wife, the husband, and the issue of the marriage. The articles were between the intended husband and wife alone; no consideration moved from any other person; no collaterals were the objects of any of its provisions. The fee simple and absolute property being in the wife, was so far to be restricted as was necessary for these purposes, but no further. Therefore, this court, after directing a formal settlement to be made, in conformity with its understanding of the marriage articles, expressly declared and provided, that it should be inserted in the settlement to be made, that if, and whenever, those purposes should be accomplished, or become impossible, the trusts should cease, and the estate be and remain as if the settlement had never been made. And is not this precisely the present state of the case? The children of the marriage all dead without issue; the husband dead, so as to render it impossible that there ever should be issue of the marriage; the marriage agreement and settlement being now as if they had never existed; must not the plaintiff Mary have the same rights in her estate as she originally had?

This point of the case, therefore, has presented no difficulty to the court; and if the deed directed by this court
544 *to be made to trustees, had been made, and they had thus been clothed with the legal estate in the property, and the plaintiff had filed her bill to have the estate reconveyed to her, upon the ground that the purposes of the trust were satisfied; the court would have had no difficulty in decreeing the prayer of such a bill. But the present is a different case. By the decree of this court and the court of chancery, the deeds executed by Randolph and wife, to Meade, and by Meade to Randolph, were annulled; and the deed to the trustees, never having been executed by Randolph and wife, the original title, the fee simple in the land, and absolute property in the personality, are now vested in the wife, as at first, free from all control. She has also the use, possession and enjoyment of all her property, and no one is disturbing her. What right, then, has she to come into court? The trustees, clearly, can give her no interruption, and have never dreamed of interfering. But she complains that some of her next of kin, and some persons learned in the law, are of opinion, that under the decree of this court, she has only a life estate in her property, and her mother, brothers and sisters, and their descendants, are entitled to the remainder in fee; and it is to settle this question, that a decree is asked of the court. Has the court jurisdiction of such a case? This is neither a bill of peace, a bill quia timet, nor a bill to perpetuate evidence; but a bill calling on a court of equity to decide, whether the plaintiff has a fee simple, or an estate for life only, in real and personal estate; and the defendants, who are brought forward to litigate this title, are remaindermen, at most, whose titles, according to the plaintiff's shewing, may not come in esse during their lives. The cases are, we think, decisive to shew, that such a bill cannot be entertained. Welby v. Duke of Rutland, 2 Bro. P. C. 39; Pelham v. Gregory, 3 Id. 204; Adderly v. Sparrow, in canc. Hill, 1779, Mitf. plead. 154; Devonsher v. Newenham, 2 Scho. & Lefr. 197, in which last case, lord Redeade reviews the cases on the point. And upon this ground, and on this only, the chancellor's decree dismissing the bill, is to be affirmed.

February, 1831.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Forthcoming Bond.—Motion to Quash—Record on Appeal.—Upon a motion to quash a forthcoming bond, for defects apparent on the face of the execution on which it was taken, an appellate court will regard the execution as part of the record, though not made so by any express order to that effect.

Same.—Variance between Execution and Bonds.—Effect.—A fi. fa. is directed to the sheriff of Campbell, but is delivered to and levied by the sergeant of Lynchburg, who takes a forthcoming bond upon it, reciting that the writ had been directed to the sergeant: Held, the writ gave no authority to the sergeant, and no warrant to him to take the forthcoming bond, and that the bond is variant from the execution, and therefore the bond ought to be quashed.

Same.—Who May Move to Quash.—It is competent to the obligors in a forthcoming bond to move to quash it for irregularity.

A writ of fieri facias sued out of the hustings court of Lynchburg, by Miller against Marshall Couch, was directed to the sheriff of Campbell county, but was delivered to the sergeant of Lynchburg, by whom it was levied on the property of Marshall Couch, who gave a forthcoming bond, with John Couch his surety, for the delivery of the property at the day and place of sale. The bond being forfeited, and the hustings court having, on the motion of Miller, awarded execution upon it against Marshall Couch the principal, Miller, at a subsequent term,

Forthcoming Bonds.—See generally, monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

†Same.—Motion to Quash—Record on Appeal.—It seems that on a motion to quash a forthcoming bond, the appellate court will regard the execution as a part of the record. Harwood v. Creel, 8 W. Va. 581, citing principal case.

And in Central Land Co. v. Calhoun, 16 W. Va. 372, it is said: "If there be a judgment by default on a forfeited forthcoming bond, the appellate court will regard the execution as a part of the record; but if there be a variance between it and the execution, the judgment will be reversed. When, therefore, there is a judgment by default, it is very proper to recite in it that the execution, as well as the bond was produced and inspected by the court; and such is the form of a judgment by default laid down by Robinson. See Conway Robinson's Forms, page 274, and Glascok's Adm'r v. Dawson, 1 Munf. 605, and Preston v. The Auditor, 1 Call 471. But the appellate court will not regard such a variance. If the defendant appeared in the court below and made no objection to such variance, and did not make the execution a part of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise. See Bonaughs v. Freeman's Ex'r, 2 Munf. 236; Burke, Adm'r v. Levy's Ex'r, 1 Rand. 1. But if the record shows affirmatively, that it was objected to in the court below, because of defects in the execution, and that it was for that reason quashed, the execution will be inspected, though not more formally made a part of the record. See Couch v. Miller, 2 Leigh 545. The principal case is also cited in Ayres v. Lewellin, 3 Leigh 614.

‡Same.—Variance between Execution and Bond.—Effect.—Where there is a material variance between the execution and the forthcoming bond, the bond must be quashed. Holt v. Lynch, 18 W. Va. 571, citing principal case and Glascok v. Dawson, 1 Munf. 605. In this case (Holt v. Lynch), the execution was against four persons, but the forthcoming bond recited that the execution was against three. This was held to be a material variance for which the bond should be quashed.

Same.—Quashing for Defects.—To the point that it is competent for a court to quash a forthcoming bond for defects and irregularities, the principal case was cited in Wallace v. McCarty, 8 W. Va. 109. See also, foot-note to Dowman v. Chinn, 3 Wash. 109.

moved for award of execution against John Couch, the surety; and he made a cross motion to quash the forthcoming bond, "for defects apparent on the face of the execution upon which it was taken." The hustings court quashed the bond.

The fieri facias was not made part of the record, by any express order of the court, or by a bill of exceptions to the judgment spreading it on the record; but it was subjoined to the judgment by the clerk, and certified to be the execution on which the forthcoming bond was taken.

Upon comparison of the bond with the fieri facias, the bond appeared regular and corresponded with the execution, 546 *in all respects but this, that the execution was directed to the sheriff of Campbell, whereas the condition of the bond stated, that the writ was directed to the sergeant of Lynchburg, that it had been levied by him, and that he had taken the forthcoming bond.

From the judgment of the hustings court quashing the forthcoming bond, Miller appealed to the circuit court of Lynchburg. The circuit court held, that the fieri facias was to be regarded as part of the record, but that there were no defects, apparent on the face of the execution upon which the forthcoming bond was taken, as the hustings court supposed, nor any other error apparent on the record of the proceedings, to justify the quashing of the bond; and, therefore, reversed that judgment, and remanded the case to the hustings court, for further proceedings on Miller's motion for award of execution. And then Couch appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. 1st, If the fieri facias is not a part of the record, the judgment of the hustings court must be taken to be right, since there will then be nothing in the record by which it can be impugned, or by which, indeed, its correctness can be examined. And the fi. fa. is nowise made part of the record, nor can an appellate court look into it at all. Jones v. Hull, 1 Hen. & Munf. 212; Bronaugh v. Freeman, 2 Munf. 266; Burk v. Levy, 1 Rand. 1. 2dly, If the fi. fa. can be regarded as part of the record, it was directed to the sheriff of Campbell, and gave authority only to that officer; the sergeant of Lynchburg had no authority to levy it, and no warrant to take the forthcoming bond upon it; and the bond falsely reciting that the execution under colour of which it was taken, was directed to the sergeant, was fatally variant from the execution: therefore, the judgment of the hustings court quashing the bond, was right. So quacunqve via data, the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and that of the hustings affirmed.

547 *The attorney general, contra.

The fi. fa. is part of the record, and may be looked into here, since the forthcoming bond was impugned, in the court below, for defects apparent on the face of the execution on which it was taken, and may be impugned here, for variance from the execution, or for want of warrant given by the execution to take the bond. Glascock's adm'r v. Dawson, 1 Munf. 605. The reporter, indeed, seems to have thought, the court looked into the execution in that case, because the judgment was by default: but the court intimated no such reason. The cases cited by Mr. Johnson only decide, that upon appeal from a judgment on a forthcoming bond, the execution cannot be looked into here, for the purpose of raising objections here, not taken in the court below. And if the execution is no part of the record, in this case, and so may not be looked into by this court; then, here is a forthcoming bond perfectly regular on its face, quashed by the hustings court, for no cause apparent on the record whatever. The court will not intend that such a judgment is right. Beale v. Willson, 4 Munf. 380. But, looking into the execution, and comparing the forthcoming bond with it, the bond is good. The only objection to it, that the execution was directed to the sheriff of Campbell, but was levied by the sergeant of Lynchburg, and the forthcoming bond of course taken by him, is obviated by the provision of the statute, that an execution or other process, appearing duly served in other respects, shall be deemed good, though not directed to any sheriff. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 107, p. 512. The plaintiff might have struck out the name of the sheriff, and inserted that of the sergeant. In our practice, the direction of the process has always been considered, and is, mere form. Purcell v. Richardson, per chancellor Taylor, 4 Hen. & Munf. 405. Besides, it seems very doubtful, whether a forthcoming bond can be quashed on the motion of the obligors. For, though the obligee may move to quash it for fatal irregularity, in order that he may have the benefit of his original 548 judgment, of which the forthcoming bond, however defective, operates *as a complete satisfaction, so long as it remains in force, yet a forthcoming bond, irregular and bad as a statutory bond, is good as a common law bond; and the obligee is entitled to an action upon it, though not to the summary remedy given by the statute. Hewlett v. Chamberlayne, 1 Wash. 367; Johnstons v. Meriwether, 3 Call, 523. To allow the obligors to quash their own bond, is to allow them not only to defeat the summary statutory remedy, but the common law rights and remedies, which accrue from it to the obligee.

Johnson said, the only effect of the statute referred to, was, that an execution or other process left blank as to the direction to the officer, should be regarded as directed to any officer to whose hands it should come; but this could not be, where the process was expressly directed to a particular officer. As to the right of the obligors in a forthcoming bond, irregularly taken or faulty on its face, to move to quash it, they were the parties especially entitled to such a motion; and it had been often done. He mentioned Meze v. Hoover, 1 Leigh, 442.

The attorney general said, the point was not made in that case, or in any other: it passed sub silentio.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. It is objected in this court, by the counsel for the appellant, that the execution not having been made a part of the record, by any express order of the hustings court, or by a bill of exceptions filed for that purpose, it is not competent to the appellate court, to look into it, and to compare it with the bond, for the purpose of ascertaining, whether it gave authority for taking the bond, or whether the bond was in any manner variant from it: and we are referred, in support of this objection, to the cases of Jones v. Hull, Bronaugh v. Freeman, and Burke v. Levy. It is true, that in those cases, the court did refuse to look into the executions. But, in all of them, the defendants, though they appeared in the court below, had made no objection to the bonds, on the ground of their being unauthorized 549 ized by or variant from *the executions. This court said, their failure to make such objections in the court below, furnished ground to presume that the bonds had been rightly taken, so far as related to the executions, and therefore it would not look into the executions, to see whether that was in fact the case or not. The principle on which those cases were decided, does not apply to that which is now before us; for here, it is expressly stated, that the bond was objected to by the defendant, and quashed by the court, on account of defects apparent on the face of the execution. This necessarily made the execution a part of the record, and imposes on the appellate court the duty to look into it, as the only means of testing the correctness of the judgment appealed from. The propriety of this course, in such a case, is much stronger than if the judgment had been by default, for want of the appearance of the defendant. Yet, it is clear, that even if the judgment had been by default, the court would look into the execution, and compare it with the bond, as was done in Glascok v. Dawson.

Looking then into the execution, the question arises, whether it was a warrant to the officer for taking the forthcoming bond? The execution was directed to the sheriff of Campbell but it was levied by the sergeant of Lynchburg, by whom also the bond was taken. It has been decided in England, that meane process, and even that kind of meane process, which operates only in the nature of a summons, can be executed, only by the sheriff of the county to whom it is directed. Chase v. Joyce, 4 Mau. & Selw, 412. See also Grant v. Bagge, 3 East, 128. And it never was doubted, but that this was the case at common law, as to final process of execution. This principal of the common law has not been changed by any of our statutes, except in one particular; that an execution, writ or other process, appearing to be duly executed in other respects, shall be deemed good, though it be not directed to any sheriff. That, however, is different from this case, where the execution was in fact directed to a particular sheriff. It 550 *gave authority to that sheriff, and to him only; nor could he transfer that authority to any other. And even the plaintiff himself, having once made his election, to direct his execution, to the sheriff of a particular county, cannot revoke that election, but by recalling the execution, and taking out a new one. On this ground, the judgment of the circuit court is to be reversed, and that of the hustings court affirmed.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Partnership*—What Constitutes—Contingent Participation in Profits—Case at Bar.—B. owner of a public ferry, leases it to F. two years, in consideration of $1000 paid him by F. in cash; and it is agreed between the parties, that if the neat profits of the ferry do not yield F. $2000 within the two years, F. shall hold over the term, until the profits yield the $2000, and if the profits give more than $2000 within two years, the surplus shall be equally divided between them: H.L.D. this contract does not constitute a partnership between B. and F. in the ferry, and B. is not liable for losses by negligence at the ferry, during the term of F.'s tenancy thereof.

Case, in the circuit court of Greenbrier, brought by Anderson against Bowyer, as the owner and keeper of a public ferry at the Cliffs on New River, to recover damages for the loss of a horse and of a parcel of salt, put into Bowyer's ferry boat, to be safely transported across the river for the toll established by law, which the declaration charged to have been drowned and lost by reason of the insufficiency of the boat, and the negligence of Bowyer and his servants. Plea, not guilty. Verdict and judgment for Anderson, for 325 dollars damages.

At the trial, Bowyer, to prove that he was not liable to make good the loss, offered in evidence an agreement between him and one

Feamster; whereby, in consideration 551 of *1000 dollars cash, paid by Feamster to Bowyer, he let and leased the ferry to Feamster, for the term of two years, to commence nine months after the date of the agreement, at which time possession was to be given to Feamster; and Bowyer agreed to furnish Feamster good and sufficient boats during the term, a hand to assist in case of high waters or necessity, and board &c. for one ferryman to be employed by Feamster, for which the latter was to pay him 20 dollars per annum: and it was agreed between the parties, that if, in consequence of Feamster's expenses in hiring and keeping a ferryman, and the damages he might sustain by accidents, Feamster should not make the full sum of 2000 dollars by the profits of the ferry, within the term of two years, then he should remain, and keep full possession of the boats and ferry, from the expiration of that term, until he should make the intire sum of 2000 dollars; but if the money collected during the said term should amount to more than 2000 dollars, the surplus should be equally divided between the parties. It was during the term of two years, that the injury happened of which Anderson complained. Whereupon, the court instructed the jury, that the agreement between Bowyer and Feamster, proved a partnership between them in the profits of the ferry, at the time the injury happened to Anderson; and that Bowyer (and Feamster also) was liable to him for the loss he had sustained. To this opinion, Bowyer filed exceptions; and appealed from the judgment to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellee. The question was, upon the construction and effect of the agreement between Bowyer and Feamster, whether that constituted a partnership between them in the ferry and its profits?

CARR, J. "Partnership," we are told, "is a voluntary contract between two or more persons, for joining together their money, goods, labour and skill, or either or all of them," upon an agreement that the gain or loss shall be proportionally divided between them, and having for its object, the advancement and protection of fair and open trade." Let us examine the agreement before us, and see how it comports with this definition. The first part of it, certainly, imports a lease of the ferry for two years, in consideration of 1000 dollars paid by the lessee to the lessor before the commencement of the lease, with an agreement on the part of the lessor, to furnish good and sufficient boats, a hand to assist on extraordinary occasions, and board &c. for the ferryman to be employed by the lessee, at the rate of 20 dollars a year. And if the agreement had stopt there, all must have agreed, that it had not a single feature of a partnership. The doubt arises upon the stipulations contained in the sequel of the agreement. Do they change the character of the contract, and convert it from a contract of lease into one of copartnership? Where is the community of interest, the community of profits, the community of possession, in the social subject? The first part of the contract expressly stated, that Bowyer leased the ferry to Feamster, for the full term of two years, to commence nine months after the date of the contract, when possession was to be given: that surely meant a several exclusive tenancy in Feamster, not that joint tenancy which partners have. The latter part of the contract nowise changed that feature of it: it not only contemplated the continuance of Feamster's possession for two years, but expressly stated, that if within that term he should not receive 2000 dollars, he should remain, and keep full possession, until he should make that intire sum. So far, there was certainly nothing social, either as to possession or profits. But it was added, that if during the two years, Feamster should receive more than 2000 dollars, the surplus should be divided equally between him and Bowyer: and this, it was contended, gave that participation in the profits, which made it a partnership. I cannot think so. It is a participation purely contingent, and seems to have been thrown in simply as some counterpoise to the provision which 553 *enabled Feamster to hold beyond the two years, if he should not within that time make the 2000 dollars. In 3 Kent's comm. 8, we find it laid down upon authority, that "the contract, must be for the common benefit of all the parties to the association, and though the shares need not be equal, yet, as a general rule, all must partake of the profit, in some rateable proportion, and that proportion, as well as the mode of conducting the business, may be modified and regulated by private agreement, at the pleasure of the parties." Upon every view I can take of the subject, there was no partnership here, and consequently, no right in the plaintiff to recover of Bowyer for the default of Feamster.

There is a feature in this contract between Bowyer and Feamster, which, it seems to me, may go a good way in explaining its nature. The consideration of the agreement was 1000 dollars, advanced and paid by Feamster at its date, though his lease was not to commence till nine months after. Rents are the fruits, the returns, of land; and it is very rarely that we see them paid in advance. Is it not natural to suppose, that Bowyer, being pressed for the immediate use of the money, fell upon this scheme for raising it, by anticipating the profits of his ferry; and that Feamster, seeing his necessity, took advantage of it, to insist on holding the lease, till he should receive from it double the sum advanced? It was thought two years would give this sum: but Feamster was determined to make assurance doubly sure, and therefore, had the provision inserted, that, if from the expenses incurred, or damages from accidents, he should not receive 2000 dollars, within the two years, he should hold on till he should receive that sum: and then Bowyer added, that if during the two years, more than 2000 dollars should be received, the surplus should be divided. This may be called conjecture; but it seems to me, the natural and probable explanation of the transaction; and I mention it as another consideration to shew that no partnership adventure was intended.

554 *BROOKE, P. There may be a partnership in a ferry; but, as a ferry is not ordinarily the subject of partnership and trade; the terms of the contract by which it is made so, ought to be more clear than in cases in which the subject is one of ordinary trade and partnership. It is not uncommon in farming leases, which are somewhat analogous to a lease of a ferry, that the rent is stipulated to be paid in a certain portion of the profits; yet no partnership is inferred from that circumstance. The lessor is not subjected to any claim for the expenses of cultivation &c. In the contract before us, the consideration paid by Feamster was the 1000 dollars: no partnership account was necessary to ascertain that. The stipulation in the lease, that if, in the event, he received more than 2000 dollars, within the term of two years, the surplus profits were to be divided between the parties, was entirely contingent; and the interest of Bowyer in them could not be considered as making him a partner in the whole trade of the ferry. It was only intended by the parties, to apportion the rent more nearly to the value of the ferry, in an event which, for aught that appears, never happened. A communion of interest in the profits and loss of a trade, is essential to a partnership. Coope v. Eyre, 1 Hen. Black. 37. There was no such communion of interest in this case. Feamster had paid his 1000 dollars in advance; and was to receive 2000 dollars in the profits of the ferry after deducting loss by accidents, such as freshes &c. and if not in two years, he was to hold over until he did receive that sum in those profits. Bowyer had no common interest in the profits; he was not to receive a cent of them. I think the circuit court erred in its instructions to the jury.

CABELL, J., concurred.

GREEN, J., dissented. He said, I think this is a case of partnership. The contract in substance and effect was this: Bowyer agreed to put in his ferry, to keep up good and sufficient boats at his own expense, to furnish a hand to assist *on extraordinary occasions, and board &c. for a ferryman, to be employed by Feamster, at 20 dollars per annum: Feamster was to employ a ferryman to work the boats, and to superintend the ferry himself: and each was to receive a moiety of the profits (after deducting the expenses, namely, the wages of the ferryman, his board &c. and damages from accidents) for two years, or till the profits should amount to 2000 dollars, of which Bowyer's moiety was paid him in advance: and if more than 2000 dollars accrued within the two years, the parties were to divide the surplus. And the lease was given to Feamster for two years, as a security for Bowyer's performance of the contract on his part, in consequence of Feamster's advance of the 1000 dollars to him, and for no other reason.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded to the circuit court for a new trial to be had, with directions that no such instruction should be given &c.

Garland v. Ellis.

March, 1881.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Special Bail*—Sci. Fa.—Demurrer.—A demurrer to a sci. fa. upon a recognizance of special bail, is regular practice.

Same—One Sci. Fa. against Three Bail—Effect.—In a joint action of debt against three obligors, three persons severally undertake, by several recognizances, as special bail for each of the three defendants; after judgment, creditor sues out one sci. fa. against the three bail, upon their several recognizances: HOLD, they cannot be joined in one sci. fa. and that the sci. fa. is naught, and ought to be quashed.

In debt, in the county court of Amherst, by Ellis against Henry Ballinger, Richard Ballinger and Thomas Richeson, Garland, Muse and John Richeson, by several recognizances, severally undertook as special bail for the defendants; viz. Garland for Henry Ballinger, Muse for Richard *Ballinger, and John Richeson for Thomas Richeson. And Ellis having recovered judgment in that action, afterwards sued out one scire facias against the three special bail of the three defendants respectively, reciting their several recognizances, and requiring them to shew cause if any they could, why the plaintiff "should not have execution of their debt against them, according to the form and effect of their recognizances severally entered into as aforesaid &c." They all pleaded null tiel record; but Garland pleaded some special pleas in bar, and demurred generally to the scire facias. The county court sustained the demurrer and quashed the scire facias. Ellis appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the judgment, overruled the demurrer, and remanded the cause to the county court to be proceeded in. And then Garland appealed to this court.

Stanard for the appellant, maintained that the judgment of the county court was clearly right. Undertakings of the three special bail were perfectly several and distinct, each having entered into a several recognizance for one of the three defendants; and the plaintiff could no more join them in one scire facias, than he could join three distinct and several obligors in three separate bonds in one action of debt.

Johnson, contra, endeavoured to shew, that it was irregular to demur to a scire facias upon a recognizance of bail. It was not necessary to the defence of the bail. The scire facias shewed the whole foundation of the claim; and if it did not shew sufficient ground to charge the bail, no judgment could be given against him.

GREEN, J. There is no doubt a scire facias may be demurred to. Tidd's prac. 213; Wood v. Commonwealth, 4 Rand. 329. And the demurrer in this case was well founded. A scire facias against special bail is founded upon the recognizance, as the gist of the action, not upon the original judgment against the principal. That and the 557 proceedings *upon it are only inducement to the action, and to the proof that the recognizance has been forfeited. In this case, the three several persons entering into recognizances, severally, as the bail for the three defendants respectively, were under no joint obligation or responsibility to the plaintiff, and he could, in no possible event, be entitled to an award of execution against them jointly, on their several recognizances. The objection to a joint scire facias against them, is as fatal as it would be to a joint action against several upon several and distinct contracts. The demurrer was rightly sustained, and the scire facias quashed, by the county court.

Judgment of the circuit court reversed, and that of the county court affirmed.

Couch v. Hooper.

Assumpsit*—Conditional Promise to Pay Debt of Another—Condition Must Be Strictly Performed.—A. is prosecuting debt against B. the surety of C. and C.'s father agrees in writing to pay the debt with interest, if A. will dismiss his suit against B. at A.'s own costs: A. dismisses his suit generally: in assumpsit by A. against the father, upon his conditional promise to pay the debt: HOLD, A. was bound to perform the condition strictly, in order to entitle himself to enforce the promise, and having dismissed his suit generally instead of at his own costs, he cannot recover upon the promise.

Same—Same—Averment.—And though the father subsequently approved A.'s dismissal of his suit against the son's surety generally, yet A. not having averred such subsequent ratification in his declaration on the father's promise, that fact cannot avail him.

Assumpsit, in the circuit court of Buckingham, by Hooper against Couch, upon a special promise, which the declaration stated thus: Allen Couch (a son of Couch, the defendant in this action) and one Coughlan, his surety, executed a bond to Childers for 135 dollars, which Childers as-558 signed *to Hooper, who brought suit upon it, against Coughlan, the surety; and pending that suit, Couch, the defendant in this action, wrote a letter to Hooper promising to pay him, within two years, from the date of the letter, the amount of the debt claimed of Coughlan as the surety of Couch the son, with interest from the date of the bond, upon Hooper's dismissing the suit he had brought for it against Coughlan the surety, at his Hooper's own costs; upon the faith of which letter and the promise therein contained, Hooper did dismiss his suit against Coughlan, at his own costs; of which Couch, the defendant in this action, had notice; by reason whereof, Couch became bound to pay Hooper, the plaintiff, the amount of the said debt with interest; and being soliable, in consideration thereof, assumed upon himself and promised Hooper, to pay him the same &c. Couch pleaded the general issue. And at the trial, he filed a demurrer to the evidence, in which Hooper joined.

The evidence was, 1. The letter written by the defendant to Hooper, containing the promise laid in the declaration (the contents whereof were precisely as the declaration stated them) with proof of the genuineness of the letter. 2. Proof, that the letter was sent to Hooper by Coughlan's special bail in Hooper's action against him; that Hooper refusing, at first, to accede to the proposition it contained, the letter was held by the bearer, until about six months after, when Hooper acceded to the terms, and thereupon the letter was delivered to him; and that the defendant was informed of Hooper's rejection of the proposition when first made to him, and of his acceding to it afterwards, of the delivery of the letter to him, and of his dismissal of his suit against Coughlan, generally, and gave his approbation to that late delivery of the letter, and to this dismissal of his suit by Hooper (but of these facts the evidence, to say the least, was very doubtful). 3. The record of Hooper's suit against Coughlan; whereby it appeared, that Hooper dismissed that suit, not, however, at his own costs, according to the condition stipulated in Couch's letter, but generally.

559 *The jury found for Hooper, subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrer to evidence. The circuit court held, that the law upon the demurrer, was for the plaintiff, and gave Hooper judgment for the damages found by the verdict. Couch applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Johnson for the plaintiff in error; Daniel for the defendant.

BROOKE, P. Upon the evidence adduced by Hooper, and demurred to by Couch, it clearly appears, that Hooper did not comply with the condition of the offer made him by Couch, to pay the debt specified in his letter making the offer. That condition was, that Hooper should dismiss the suit he was then prosecuting against Coughlan the surety of Couch's son, at his Hooper's costs. But instead of doing that, Hooper dismissed the suit generally, leaving the defendant in that suit to pay his portion of the costs. Nor can the supposed ratification of that dismissal of the suit, if established by the evidence (which is doubtful) avail Hooper; since this matter is not alleged in the declaration, or put in issue by the pleadings: so that, if the suit had been dismissed generally, as it eventually was, upon the first tender of the letter of Couch to Hooper, the objection to such a dismissal of the suit would not have been obviated.

The judgment is to be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

March, 1881.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Sheriffs*—Failure to Return Execution—Motion by Debtor in Creditor's Name.—A fi. fa. sued out by C. against P. is delivered to the sheriff, and P. the debtor pays the amount of the execution to C. the creditor; the sheriff fails to make due return of the execution: Held, P. the debtor cannot maintain a motion in the name of C. the creditor against the sheriff for a fine for failing to return the execution, even though the debtor were a party injured thereby.

Same*—Same—Motion against Sheriff—Judgment Discretionary.—Neither the statute which gives a motion against a sheriff for a fine for failing to return an execution, nor the statute which gives a motion to a sheriff against his deputy to recover the amount of fines imposed upon the sheriff for the alleged defaults of the deputy, is imperative on the court to give such judgments, but the court, in its sound discretion, may give or deny judgment in such cases.

Same*—Judgment against Sheriff for Default of Deputy—Liability of Deputy.—Judgment is rendered against a sheriff for a fine for the alleged default of his deputy, the sheriff making no defence, nor giving any notice to the deputy of the proceeding; this judgment is erroneous in point of law, and unjust upon the merits: Held, in such case, the sheriff is not entitled to recover the amount of the fine from the deputy.

A fieri facias, sued out in March 1812, returnable in May following, by Matthew Calvert against Lewis Parham and Robert Wallace, upon a judgment of the county court of Southampton, was delivered to Fletcher, the deputy of Chapman, sheriff of Brunswick. Fletcher indorsed the fact and the date of the delivery of the process to him; and then (it appeared) handed it to Wallace the surety, who was also a deputy of Chapman; and Parham (as he alleged) paid the amount to Wallace; but Wallace, if he received the money, never accounted for or paid it to Calvert, and the execution was not duly returned. Chapman afterwards found it among Wallace's papers, and indorsed upon it, that it had been put into the hands of his deputy Fletcher, who, so far as he could learn, never acted upon it; that he himself, owing to ill health and the belief that his deputy had done his duty, had not acted upon it at the time; and that it had since come to his hands too late to execute, having been found among the papers of Robert Wallace, another of his deputies.

Wallace, it seemed, was dead.

561 *It appeared, that Parham sued out a fieri facias in September 1812, returnable in November following, against one Harvey, upon a decree of the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, for 167 dollars with interest from the 2d May 1812, and costs; that he sent this execution, by the same Robert Wallace, to the sheriff of Southampton where the debtor resided, with an order to the sheriff, indorsed on the execution, to pay Wallace the amount thereof when made; and that Wallace delivered the execution to Samuel Calvert, sheriff of Southampton, and directed him when he should make the money, to satisfy the execution of Calvert against Parham out of it. Parham alleged, that this direction of Wallace was improper and unauthorized, as he had himself already paid the amount of Calvert's execution; but, in settling with the sheriff of Southampton, he allowed the amount of Calvert's execution to be deducted from the proceeds of his own execution against Harvey, and to be retained, according to the disposition which had been made by Wallace, and received only the surplus. And thus, he paid the amount of Calvert's execution twice, though Calvert only received the money retained for him by the sheriff of Southampton.

Six years after these transactions, namely, in November 1818, a motion was made in the county court of Southampton by Samuel Calvert (the same who had been the sheriff of Southampton, to whom Parham's execution against Harvey had been delivered) as the executor of Matthew Calvert, against Chapman, the sheriff of Brunswick, for a fine, for the failure to make due return of Calvert's execution against Parham. The notice on which this motion was made, stated that it was made for Parham's benefit; but Calvert had not authorized the motion to be made in his name, nor was he even apprised of it. The notice (as appeared on the face of the proceedings) was insufficient, having been served only nine days before the motion, instead of ten days at least, as the law requires in such cases. But Chapman not appearing to make defence, judgment 562 *was given against him by default, for a fine of five per cent. per month, on the amount of the execution, from the return day thereof, amounting to 476 dollars. Chapman exhibited a bill to the county court of Southampton in chancery, setting forth all the facts of the case, of which he was then fully apprised and particularly, the error of the judgment in respect of the insufficiency of the notice on which it was rendered, and praying relief against an injunction to the judgment, on the ground that it had been obtained against him by surprise, and of its injustice; but, in the event, the injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed, probably because the surprise was denied by the answer, and was not proved to the satisfaction of the court. Then Chapman obtained a supersedeas to the judgment from the circuit court of Southampton, by which the judgment was affirmed. Upon this, and upon Parham's release of all but 200 dollars of the fine he had recovered, Chapman acquiesced, and paid the 200 dollars to Parham.

And then he made a motion in the circuit court of Brunswick, against his deputy Fletcher, to whom Calvert's execution against Parham had been delivered (as was evidenced by his own indorsement upon it) to recover the 200 dollars of Fletcher, being the sum actually paid by him to Parham, on account of the fine which had been adjudged against him, for not making due return of that execution. The circuit court rendered judgment for Chapman against Fletcher, for the 200 dollars and costs. Fletcher filed a bill of exceptions to this judgment, setting forth all the facts of the case as above detailed, and appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, said, that the statute, which authorized the imposition of a fine upon a sheriff, for failing to make due return of an execution put into his hands, was not imperative upon the court to impose the fine, in every case in which an execution is not duly returned: it only enacted that, in such case, "it should be lawful 563 for the court, ten days previous notice being given, upon the motion of the party injured, to fine the sheriff, at its discretion," five per cent. per month on the amount of the execution. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 47, p. 542. The fine recovered by Parham in Calvert's name against Chapman, for the failure to return Calvert's execution against Parham, was, in every view, irregular, erroneous and unjust. The injustice done to Parham, was not done by Fletcher, but by Wallace whom Parham had trusted. Calvert had no pretence to demand the imposition of the fine, for he had received the amount due him six years before. Parham had no authority to use his name: Calvert gave him none, and he had no pretence to be substituted to the benefit of Calvert's remedy against the sheriff for this fine. And the notice on which this motion was made against Chapman was insufficient; being only nine days notice, whereas the law requires ten. The judgment was rendered against Chapman by his default, and his deputy Fletcher had no notice of the motion against his principal. If he had made the defence which was open to him, it was impossible such a judgment should have been rendered against him. It was owing, then, wholly to Chapman's own gross neglect to make defence, that this fine was imposed upon him; and accordingly he compromised the controversy with Parham; as he had a right to do, certainly; but that only served to evince, that he had no claim to retribution from his deputy. Neither was the statute providing the summary remedy by motion for the sheriff against his deputy, to recover from the deputy, fines imposed upon the sheriff on account of the deputy's default, imperative upon the court to give judgment of retribution to the sheriff, in all cases of fines imposed upon him for the alleged default of the deputy, without regard to the circumstances and justice of the case: that statute also only enacted, that in such cases, it shall be lawful for the court, to give judgment for the sheriff against that deputy, for the amount of the fines imposed on the sheriff on account of the deputy's default. 1 Rev. Code, ch.

564 *78, § 33, p. 283, 4. The sheriff suffering an erroneous judgment to be given against him, could never make that the ground of a claim to retribution from the deputy; Drew v. Anderson, 1 Call 51. Here the sheriff did submit to a judgment palpably erroneous (as being rendered on insufficient notice, if for no other reason) and so unjust, that, but for his own gross neglect, such a judgment never could have been rendered.

The attorney general, for the appellee, insisted, that the debtor as well as the creditor in an execution, might be, and often was, a party injured, within the meaning of the statute, by the failure of the sheriff to make due return of the process; and endeavoured to shew, that Parham was a party injured by the failure to make due return of Calvert's execution against him, and that he had a right to use Calvert's name to demand the penalty for that default. The amount of Calvert's execution against Parham, was certainly paid to Calvert out of the proceeds of Parham's execution against

Harvey; and due return of Calvert's execution, would have enabled Parham to recover the money he had himself paid upon it. But the proceeding on Calvert's motion could not now be examined: the fine had been imposed on Chapman; certainly, without any collusion between him and Calvert or Parham; imposed on him for his deputy Fletcher's default. To deprive him of redress against his deputy, it surely was not enough to shew that the judgment for the fine against him, was erroneous; seeing that the county court rendered the judgment, and that the circuit court to which he appealed, held that there was no error in it. He said, a judgment against the sheriff for the default of his deputy (no collusion appearing) bound the deputy: Graves v. Webb, 1 Call, 443; Hooe v. Tebbs, 1 Munf. 501. In the statute giving the summary remedy to the sheriff, the words that it may be lawful for the court to give judgment on motion upon ten days notice, refer to the summary nature of the proceeding, which but for the statute would not be lawful, and only serve to 565 *shew, that it was not intended to take away the common law remedy; but, as to the case, in 'which it may be lawful for the court to give redress in this summary way, the words of the statute leave nothing to discretion: "where any fine &c. has been assessed &c. or may be assessed &c. against any sheriff &c. for or on account of the default or misconduct of any deputy of such sheriff" (that is, in all such cases, without any exception) "it shall be lawful for the court to give him judgment for the same against the deputy, in a summary way, upon motion &c."

GREEN, J. No court of justice, in the exercise of a sound discretion, could have imposed any fine whatever upon a sheriff, under the circumstances of the case upon Calvert's motion for the benefit of Parham against Chapman, if the facts now appearing, had been before it. The statute authorizing the imposition of fines upon officers failing to make due returns of executions, does not imperiously require that they shall be imposed in all possible cases of such failure, but leaves that (as it was at common law) to the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised in reference to the circumstances of each particular case; going beyond the common law only so far as to impose a limit upon the amount of the fines, and giving them to the party injured instead of the public. M'Dowell v. Burwell's ex'ors, 4 Rand. 317. In this case, Calvert, in whose name the motion against Chapman, the sheriff, was made, was not injured, nor was his testator, by the failure to return the execution in question; for the amount of the execution was satisfied to one or the other of them soon after the return day, and six years before the motion was made, out of the property of the debtor, by an arrangement sanctioned by him, if not made with his approbation. Neither the plaintiff in the execution, nor his executor ever complained of the failure to return the execution: for though the motion against the high sheriff was made in the name of the 566 latter, it was done without his authority or consent, by Parham, *the debtor in the execution, for his own benefit, under an idea, that he being a party injured by the failure to return the execution, was substituted by law to the rights of the plaintiff, as against the sheriff. If it were true, that Parham was a party thereby injured, that fact, surely, could not lay the foundation of a recovery in the name of Calvert, who had suffered no injury, for his benefit; whether it would, or would not, have enabled him to recover by motion for a fine in his own name. The idea of substitution was unfounded, even if a court of law had the power of a court of equity on that subject; since the plaintiff in the execution having received full satisfaction, had no rights against the sheriff to which any one could be substituted. I can see the inducement that led Parham to take this strange course. The execution in question was against Parham and Wallace his surety, and was delivered to Fletcher, one of Chapman's deputies; Wallace was also a deputy, and Fletcher handed the execution to him. Parham in his answer to Chapman's bill in chancery, affirms that he paid the amount of the execution to Wallace, but he does not prove that affirmative allegation not responsive to Chapman's bill. He says too, that he confided an execution in his favor to Wallace, to be delivered for him to the sheriff of Southampton, and that Wallace appropriated a part of the proceeds of that execution to the discharge of Calvert's execution against him and Wallace, without his assent; but the payment in that way, is not only fully proved, but proved to have been made with the approbation or sanction of Parham. Thus Wallace was indebted to him according to his account to the amount of Calvert's execution, he having virtually paid it once to the plaintiff, and once to Wallace. And his scheme was, six years after the transaction, and after Wallace was dead, to charge this upon the sheriff, as an official transaction on the part of Wallace his deputy; but instead of pursuing that claim, directly in his own name, he resorted to the extraordinary contrivance of using 567 tion) the name of his creditor who *was satisfied, but not more than satisfied, to get it of the sheriff, in the shape of fines for not returning the execution; and succeeded in getting the judgment for more than four times the amount of the execution.

With a full knowledge of all these facts, and with full proof of them in his power, the high sheriff made no defence; and a judgment was rendered against him, erroneous in point of law, being given upon a notice of nine days only. He then sought relief in equity upon the double ground of surprise, and upon the merits, (which he stated fully, and proved completely,) but failed in getting any relief. He then obtained a supersedeas to the judgment, which was affirmed by the circuit court; and he thereupon acquiesced in the judgment (Parham releasing all but 200 dollars of the fine) though manifestly erroneous in a point of which he was fully informed, as well as in the result of the suit in chancery, though that also was erroneous, if he really had a good excuse for failing to defend himself at law.

If this case depended upon the principles of the common law, we could not hesitate to say, that such proceedings to which Fletcher was no party, and of which he does not appear to have had any notice, could not bind or affect him in any way, except to prove the fact that they existed. But we have a statute (upon which, I have no doubt, the judgment appealed from was founded) providing "That when any fine &c. has been or may be assessed &c. against any sheriff &c. for the default or misconduct of his deputy, it shall and may be lawful for the court, to give judgment against the deputy, his heirs, executors &c. for the full amount thereof against the deputy, upon motion &c." I cannot think that this statute imperatively requires the court to give judgment against the deputy, in all cases in which a judgment has been rendered against his principal, founded upon the deputy's alleged default, for the full amount of such judgment, without regard to the question, whether such a default had existed, as would be a just foundation for any fine against the principal, or to the default and neglect *of 568 the principal to make a defence, of which he was apprised, and which would have been effectually available, or to give notice to his deputy so as to enable him to make that defence for him. Such a construction would, in effect, prevent the inquiry, whether the deputy had been in default or not; and would take away the discretion, implied in the declaration, that it shall and may be lawful for the court to give judgment &c. contrary to the principles of the common law. If such be the intention explicitly declared by the statute, it must be carried into effect according to its literal terms, no matter how flagrant the wrong inflicted by it. But if it is in any degree equivocal in those points, we are bound to construe it according to the reason of the common law, as near as may be; 19 Vin. abr. Statutes, E. 6, p. 512, and the cases there cited. This statute is equivocal in those particulars: and I am of opinion, that the intention of the legislature was only to give a summary remedy by motion in lieu of the common law action, and to extend it (contrary to the common law maxim that personal actions die with the person) to the heirs and executors of the party offending.

The other judges concurred. Judgment was reversed, and judgment entered for appellant.

Specific Performance—Verbal Agreement to Convey Land*—No Consideration—Case at Bar.—J. being

Specific Performance—Verbal Gift of Land.—It may be regarded as settled law in this state, and in Virginia, that a verbal donee of land—a child, who, under the verbal gift, has taken possession of the land and improved it,—has a right to demand in a court of equity a specific performance of the contract by the execution of a deed by the father, thereby consummating his verbal gift. This was so held in Shobe v. Carr, 8 Munf. 10, decided as long ago as 1811, and this case has been repeatedly followed or recognized as law by numerous Virginia decisions ever since. See Darlington v. McCoolle, 1 Leigh 36; Reed v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh 569; Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh 66; Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 305.—GREEN, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Frame v. Frame, 32 W. Va. 476, 9 S. E. Rep. 908.

In Burkholder v. Ludlam, 30 Gratt. 262, the prinwealthy and childless, verbally agrees with his brother C. who is poor and has a large family of children, that if C. will forego his intention to move to the west, and move to and settle on a tract of land of J. near his residence, J. will convey the land to him in fee; C. induced by this promise, executes the agreement on his part, but without incurring any expense or loss in so doing: Held, there was neither a meritorious nor a valuable consideration to support the agreement, and equity cannot decree specific execution against J.'s heirs.

In a suit in the superiour court of chancery of Winchester by Charles Reed against Abraham Vannorsdale and his wife Anne, who was the devisee of her first husband James Reed deceased, the case alleged in the bill, and proved by the evidence, was thus:

Charles Reed was the brother of James Reed. Charles was poor and had a large family of small children; James was wealthy, and had no children. Charles resided in the county of Hardy, but had come to a fixed purpose to move to the western country, in the hope of bettering his condition, and making some provision for his family. James resided in Hampshire, and being apprised of Charles's purpose of migrating to the west, to divert him from it, he not only stated to him his ability, as well as his desire and intention, to place him in independent circumstances, and to make him and his children the chief objects of his bounty, but he purchased a tract of land near his own residence in Hampshire, and promised Charles, that if he would remove to this land, and settle himself upon it, he James would bear all the expenses of his removal, and would convey the land to him in fee simple. Induced by this promise, particularly, with other assurances of favor and bounty to himself and his children, Charles abandoned his design of moving to the western country, moved from Hardy to the land in Hampshire, (James defraying the expense, according to his promise), settled himself upon it, 570 and enjoyed the use and profits of it during James's life. But it was not proved or alleged, that Charles incurred any principal case was also cited as not being in conflict or at all inconsistent with the decision in Shobe v. Carr, 8 Munf. 10; and it is noted that CABELL, J., in the principal case, took occasion to say that if it had appeared that expense or loss had been incurred by the donee in foregoing his intention to move to the West, and in moving to and settling on the land promised him by the donor, he would have been of opinion that specific execution ought to have been enforced. In this case (Burkholder v. Ludlam), it was held that a court of equity will compel the conveyance of the legal title of land claimed under a parol gift, supported by meritorious consideration, and by reason of which the donee has been induced to alter his condition and make expenditures of money and valuable improvements upon the land.

In Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 312, 313, STAPLES, J., speaking for the court, said: "This court has repeatedly expressed its disapprobation of those pretended contracts based upon declarations by parents of intentions to make certain specific provisions for children, in consideration of supposed services rendered or sacrifices made by the latter. Such promises are generally made in the freedom and confidence of domestic intercourse, and without a suspicion that they constitute legal obligations. The efforts constantly made to enforce them fully vindicate the statute of frauds and perjuries. Reed's Heirs v. Vannorsdale & Wife, 2 Leigh 569; Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh 66."

The principal case is also cited and its decision approved in Goodwin v. Bartlett, 43 W. Va. 334, 27 S. E. Rep. 325.

On the subject of specific performance, see further, foot-note to Griffin v. Cunningham, 19 Gratt. 571, and monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 8 Gratt. 248.

expense, or loss of any kind, by his compliance with his brother's wishes. James, by his will devised the land in question to his wife Anne, who afterwards married Vannorsdale. And the object of the bill was to have a specific execution of James's promise to convey the land to Charles in fee simple.

The plaintiff died pending the suit, and it was revived by his heirs. The chancellor dismissed the bill; and the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant.
S. Taylor, for the appellee.

BROOKE, P. The promise and agreement of James Reed, alleged in the bill, is satisfactorily proved. Charles Reed being very poor, and having a large family, and James being relatively rich, and having no child, he was, in some degree, morally bound to provide for his needy brother and family: but a court of equity does not take cognizance of such imperfect obligations. Even in the case of parent and child, equity will not decree the execution of an agreement to provide for the child, though the parent is morally bound to provide for him, unless the agreement is under seal, so that at least nominal damages may be recovered upon it at law. In Darlington v. McCoole, 1 Leigh, 36, the principle was laid down by the court, that there must be a valuable or meritorious consideration, or a court of equity will not aid a defective conveyance, much less enforce a naked agreement, though it be in writing. In the case before us, there was neither a valuable nor meritorious consideration. And there is no case, in which equity has decreed specific execution of an agreement, even one in writing under seal, founded on the imperfect obligation to provide for a brother or other collateral relation. In Vernon v. Vernon, 2 P. Wms. 594, specific execution of the covenant was decreed, upon the consideration, that Henry, the elder brother of Thomas Vernon who executed the covenant.

571 He had devised *him an estate worth £10,000, with a limitation over to his brothers, upon his dying without issue; a limitation, which, though void, created a strong moral obligation on Thomas to provide for his brothers, which might have influenced him when he executed the covenant to do so. That was stronger than the mere natural obligation of one brother to provide for another. In the case before us, the promise to convey the land, was a naked promise, without any obligation of the character of that in Vernon v. Vernon; and it was a parol promise, on which an action at law for damages could not be maintained.

GREEN, J., concurred.

CABELL, J. I am of opinion to affirm the decree of the chancellor, on the ground of defect of consideration; the consideration proved, in this case, being neither valuable nor meritorious. But I take occasion to say, that if it had appeared, that Charles Reed had incurred necessary expense or loss in executing his part of the agreement, I should be of opinion that specific execution of it, on the part of James Reed and his heirs, ought to be enforced.

Decree affirmed.

*Hardin's Ex'ors v. Hardin.

March, 1881.

Chancery Jurisdiction—Title to Slaves—Discovery.*—

Bill in chancery, by plaintiff against the executors of his deceased father and a purchaser under them, claiming slaves under parol gift of the father in his lifetime, accompanied by delivery of possession, and praying discovery of the increase of the slaves, of which bill shews plaintiff was not ignorant, and a decree for the slaves, and their increase before suit brought as well as pendente lite, and an account of profits: HELD, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

Berry, Hardin exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Staunton, against Benjamin Hardin and Nathaniel Landcraft executors of Isaac Hardin deceased, and Samuel Bailey; setting forth, that Isaac Hardin, who was the father of the plaintiff, in his lifetime, made a parol gift to him of two slaves, Anderson a boy, and Mourning a woman, and delivered him possession thereof, which he held for two years, and till the death of his father the donor: that, after the death of the donor, his executors claimed these slaves and the increase of the female, then three in number, as part of the testator's estate, (to be sold, and the proceeds divided among his children, according to his will and codicil) inventoried them as part of the testator's estate, and obtained possession of them: that they offered the slaves for sale at public auction, at which the plaintiff asserted his claim to them and forbade the sale, in which the executors persisted notwithstanding: that at the sale, the plaintiff bad for the slave Anderson, but he was sold to the defendant Bailey, a higher bidder, for 580 dollars, on a credit of twelve months: that the plaintiff also bad at the sale, for the woman Mourning and her three children; and they were cried out to him at the price of 900 dollars; but, he being unable to give security for the purchase money, according to the terms of the sale, it was agreed between him and the executor Benjamin Hardin, that Benjamin should take the woman and her children at the same price, and if the plaintiff could make good his claim to them under the gift of his father, they should be surrendered to him; and accordingly

Bill of Discovery—Facts Known to Plaintiff.—In Armstrong v. Huntons, 1 Rob. 327, it is said: "It is perfectly clear as a general rule, that in a bill to substitute an equitable for a legal forum, a prayer for a discovery, without any averment showing its materiality or necessity, is naught. If this court has tolerated a departure from this rule, in regard to slave property (Gregory's Adm'r v. Marks's Adm'r, 1 Rand. 355), it has been where the necessity for a discovery was supposed to be incidental, at least prima facie, to the nature of the demand; as where the suit is to recover a stock of slaves, after a considerable lapse of time, and there has been such an increase as would raise a fair presumption that the plaintiff is ignorant of their names, ages, and residence. But even under such circumstances, if it may be inferred from the statements in the bill, or the evidence in the cause, that no such difficulty in point of fact exists, a court of equity will not take cognizance of the case, unless there be some other ground for the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction. Hardin's Ex'ors v. Hardin, 2 Leigh 572."

To the same effect, see the principal case cited in Hale v. Clarkson, 23 Gratt. 47. In each of these cases, it was held that, in a bill in equity to recover slaves, the only ground of equity jurisdiction be a call for a discovery of facts which the evidence shows the plaintiff knew at the time, or had the means of knowing, the bill should be dismissed with costs.

held the possession thereof; that the plaintiff was advised, that his title to the slaves in question, under the gift of his father, was valid, and that his proper and most effectual remedy to recover them and their increase and hires and profits, was in the court of chancery; for that, in a court of law, several suits might be necessary, the recovery of the specific property might be avoided by the removal of it, the increase of the females pendente lite could only be recovered by a subsequent action, and some difficulty might be opposed to the recovery of the slave Anderson at law, in consequence of the plaintiff's public bidding for him at the sale: therefore, the bill prayed, that the defendant Bailey should be restrained from paying the purchase money of the slave Anderson, to the defendants the executors of Isaac Hardin, and should be decreed to deliver that slave and account for the profits thereof to the plaintiff, or to pay him the purchase money he had bidden for him with interest; and that the defendant Benjamin Hardin should declare on oath, how many children the woman Mourning now had, their names and sexes, and should be decreed to deliver them, and to account for and pay the profits thereof, to the plaintiff; and general relief.

The executors of Isaac Hardin, in their answer, denied the alleged gift of the slaves in question, by their testator to the plaintiff; and they said, he well knew the number, names and sexes, of the increase of the woman Mourning, of which he pretended to want a discovery; but, however, they gave a list of them. And the defendant Bailey answered, that he had bought the slave Anderson at a public sale, without notice of the plaintiff's claim, at which sale the plaintiff was also a bidder and his competitor; and that he had actually paid the purchase money to the executors before the suit was brought; and he insisted, that he had a right, at all events, to hold the property.

There was a volume of depositions touching the questions of fact in issue. The chancellor thought the parol gift of the slaves to the plaintiff by his father, was satisfactorily *proved; and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant Bailey, the purchase money of the slave Anderson, if he had not already paid it to the executors, and if he had, he was entitled to recover the same of them; and that he was entitled to recover of the defendant Benjamin Hardin, the woman Mourning and her increase and the profits thereof: therefore, he directed an account to ascertain whether Bailey had paid the purchase money of Anderson to the executors, or how much thereof he had paid them; and an account of the profits of Mourning, and her children. From which decree, the defendants the executors of Isaac Hardin, appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellant, and Johnson for the appellee. In this court, it turned chiefly on the question of jurisdiction, though it was argued on the merits also; and Johnson endeavoured to maintain the jurisdiction of the court of chancery, upon the grounds suggested in the bill.

GREEN, J. I have carefully examined the fifty depositions filed in this case, taken at an expense of more than a dollar each; and throwing out all the evidence of the appellants, and the circumstances which repel the claim of the appellee to the slaves in question, I do not think there is a scintilla of proof in the record, that they ever came into his possession, or remained with him, as a gift from his father, for one moment of time. I refrain from the discussion of this mass of evidence, because it is unfit for the decision of a court of equity, if it were doubtful, as perhaps it ought to be considered, from the circumstance that the court below thought the evidence sufficient to support the claim. A jury is a more competent tribunal to determine this question with the witnesses before it, than either this court or the chancellor; and might have determined it at an expense of one fifth or one tenth of the cost of this proceeding. Nor was there a shadow of ground upon which 575 *a court of equity could entertain this double suit, of detinue as to some of the slaves, and trover as to one of them, against different parties. There was no difficulty in prosecuting suits at law; no uncertainty as to the names, ages or sexes of the increase of the female slave; no discovery necessary; no difficulty as to a fair adjustment of damages; and the rights of the parties would have been settled not only at a tythe of the expense, but in one tenth of the time, which this suit has produced and consumed.

CABELL, J. I am also decidedly of opinion, that the evidence in this case, does not establish gift of the slaves contended for by the appellee; and that, even if that were a doubtful question, there was no ground for coming into a court of equity. The plaintiff could not, from the facts stated in the bill, have been ignorant of the names, ages or sexes of the slaves in controversy. The question of title, depending exclusively on parol testimony, was peculiarly proper for a jury; nor was there any other question in the cause, which could not have been decided as correctly by a jury, as by a commissioner.

The other judges concurred.

Decree reversed, and a bill dismissed with costs.

*Miller v. Crews.

Chancery Jurisdiction—To Injoin Proceedings under Execution*—Case at Bar.—M. a non-resident of the state, causes a fl. fa. to be levied on tobacco, corn &c. in possession of L. the debtor; and C. who claims a legal right to the goods, joins L. in a forthcoming bond for the delivery thereof at the time and place of sale: HELD, that C. if he has the legal right he claims, has a plain remedy at law, by action against the sheriff; and, therefore, cannot ask the interference of a court of equity to injoin M.'s proceeding under his execution and upon the forthcoming bond.

William Long, by deed dated September 18, 1819, duly recorded in the county court of Amherst, mortgaged to Thomas Crews, and William, Betsey and Nancy Brydie, two tracts of land in Amherst, about forty slaves, some furniture, and stocks of horses &c. to secure a debt of 8,320 dollars due by him to Crews, and a debt of 10,081 dollars which he owed to the Brydies. The deed appointed the 20th day of the same month, for the payment of the first debt, and the 25th, for the payment of the last; and provided, that the mortgagor should hold and enjoy the subject till he should make default of payment, and that from and after such default, the mortgagees might "enter upon, have, hold, possess and enjoy," the whole subject, real and personal, "and receive and take the rents, issues and profits thereof, without hindrance &c. until the debts should be fully paid off and satisfied."*

*See generally, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457; monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518; monographic note on "Executions" appended to Paine v. Tutwiler, 37 Gratt. 440.

In October 1819, the mortgagees exhibited a bill in chancery, against the mortgagor and sundry of his judgment creditors, who had levied executions on the personal part of the mortgaged subject, praying injunctions to restrain the creditors from proceeding on their executions, a foreclosure of the mortgagor's equity of redemption, and a sale of the subject to satisfy the debts due the mortgagees. And, on the hearing of that cause, in May 1822, the chancellor decreed, *that unless Long should pay the mortgagees the debts due them, and the costs of suit, within six months, his equity of redemption should be foreclosed, and that the marshal of the court should sell the whole of the mortgaged subject for cash, and after defraying expenses, pay the mortgagees the debts and costs due them, and pay the surplus, if any, to the mortgagor, and make report of his proceedings in order to a final decree.

At the same term, Boyd Miller, a creditor of Long, exhibited a bill against Crews and the other mortgagees, praying, upon grounds therein set forth, that the execution of the decree of foreclosure and for the sale of the mortgaged subject, should be suspended: upon which the chancellor, instead of suspending the execution of the decree, made an order, directing the marshal to retain in his hands till farther order, so much of the proceeds of sale as should be equal to the debt which Miller claimed of Long. This order was rescinded in October 1822.

In November 1822, Miller recovered a judgment for debt against Long as the surety of one Penn, in the county court of Amherst, upon which he ordered a fieri facias to be issued. While the clerk was in the act of making out this execution, Long came into the office with one Wright, and acknowledged a deed of trust, dated the 18th November 1822, whereby he conveyed to Wright the crop of tobacco, which had been made by Long in the year 1822, on the lands mortgaged to Crews and the Brydies by the mortgage of September 1819, (Long having continued to occupy the mortgaged premises during that year, and having worked the mortgaged slaves &c. on the land, to make the crop,) upon trust, to secure a debt which Long owed to Joseph Echols, and for which Crews was his surety. And this deed was thereupon duly recorded. But it appeared, that Echols was not apprised of the execution of it at the time; and it did not appear, that he ever claimed under it.

Miller proceeded to take out his execution, delivered it to the sheriff, and caused it to be levied on the crop of *tobacco and 120 barrels of indian corn, and a small parcel of oats and fodder, then on the mortgaged lands, and in Long's possession, being parcel of the crops of 1822. Whereupon, Long gave a forthcoming bond, wherein Crews joined as his surety, for the delivery of the property at the time and place of sale.

And then Crews exhibited his bill against Miller, Long the mortgagor, and the Brydies his co-mortgagees, setting forth the facts above stated; and alleging, that the whole subject mortgaged by Long's mortgage of September 1819, was very inadequate to satisfy the debts thereby secured to him and the Brydies; insisting, that the whole profits of the mortgaged subject, accruing after forfeiture thereof by Long's default of payment, and during the pendency of the bill to foreclose the mortgage, and, particularly, the crops of 1822, made and reaped after the decree of foreclosure, were, by the express provisions of the mortgage, applicable to the mortgage debts; and if not, that Crews, who was the surety for Long to Echols, had a right to insist, that the tobacco should be sold, and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of that debt, under Long's deed of trust of November 1822; and praying an injunction to restrain Miller from farther proceedings under the execution he had caused to be levied on the crops of 1822, and on the forthcoming bond taken thereupon; and general relief. The injunction was awarded.

Miller, in his answer, insisted that the mortgage of September 1819, itself, was a fraudulent contrivance to protect Long's property from his creditors, and if not, that the mortgagees, having permitted Long to retain the intire possession, management and control of the mortgaged subject, had no right, as against his other creditors, to the profits thereof that accrued during Long's possession; and that, as to the deed of November 1822 to secure the debt to Echols, that was manifestly a contrivance of Long, to anticipate and defeat Miller's execution, and a contrivance in which Echols took no part, and of which he had no knowledge, 579 *and neither had claimed under the deed, nor, as against Miller, could claim under it.

The chancellor on the hearing, supposing the mortgage of September 1819, and the proceedings of the mortgagees under it, to be fair, nevertheless dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill. From which decree Crews appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for appellant, and by Stanard for the appellee, very fully upon the merits; but Stanard also contended, that, taking the case upon Crews's own shewing in his bill, it was not a proper case for relief in equity, since if Crews, or if Echols had right, they had also a plain legal remedy. And upon this question as to the jurisdiction, this court decided the cause.

CARR, J., delivered the opinion. It has been settled, by the case of Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25, and many other cases, that where a party has a complete remedy at law, he shall not be entertained in equity. Here, if Crews had any title to the crops raised on the land during the year 1822, it was a legal title, the legal estate being in him after forfeiture of the mortgage. So if the deed executed by Long to Wright for Echols, was operative at all, it conveyed the legal title of the tobacco to Wright, the trustee, and he might have sued at law. Whoever had the legal title might have sued the officer in trespass or trover, and had no need to come into equity. Nor is this a case of that complexion which equity will look upon with favour. Decree affirmed.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Sheriff—Motion against—For Poor Rates—Lapse of Time.—T. sheriff of B. for the years 1803 and 1804, collects the poor rates; and in November 1823, the Overseers of the poor commence proceedings against him by motions for balances unaccounted for: HELD, after such a lapse of time the motions ought not to be entertained.

Heartwell Tucker was the sheriff of Brunswick for the years 1803 and 1804, and in each of those years, gave three official bonds with surety (according to the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 11, 12, p. 278), one for the due collection of the public taxes; one for the due collection of all levies, and all fines, forfeitures and amercements; and the other for the due collection of officers' fees, and the due performance of all of the duties of the shrievalty. In each of the years 1803 and 1804, the Overseers of the poor for the time being, assessed poor rates of 1s. 9d. on each tytheable in the county, and made orders directing Tucker, the sheriff, to collect the same; in pursuance of which he undertook and made the collection. But he did not settle his account of collections of these poor rates and of his disbursements, with the Overseers of the poor, at the expiration of his shrievalty; nor was he then, or shortly after, called to account by them. In 1810, the Overseers of the poor for the time being, made an order directing their clerk to call upon him, and other sheriffs, to settle their respective accounts as collectors of the poor rates, and in case they should fail to make such settlements, and to pay the balances due from them, respectively to make motions against them, respectively, for the balances. It did not appear, that any thing was done by the clerk under that order. In June 1816, the Overseers of the poor for the time being, appointed Thomas Gibbon their agent; and Gibbon, in 1817 or 1818, spoke to Tucker on the subject of the balance supposed to be due from him: Tucker

581 *said he owed nothing: he did not shew any discharge, but told Gibbon, that if he would go to his house, he would shew him his papers: Gibbon, however, without calling upon Tucker at his house, or even mentioning the subject to him again, put the case into the hands of the then commonwealth's attorney for the county, that he might make motions for the balances claimed. But no motions were then made against Tucker.

In November 1823, the Overseers of the poor for the time being, gave two several notices to Tucker, of motions to be made against him in the county court of Brunswick, for the balances due from him upon his collection of the poor rates of the years 1803 and 1804. These motions, after several continuances, were tried in the county court: and upon the trial, the Overseers of the poor, after shewing the facts above stated, presented accounts officially stated by their clerk; wherein they debited Tucker with the gross amount of the poor rates for the respective years 1803 and 1804, at 1s. 9d. per tytheable; and credited him with his commissions on the same amount, for the collection, and with such disbursements as their books shewed to have been made by him; and thus shewed a balance of 496 dollars due from him for the years 1803, and a balance of 515 dollars for the year 1804. They gave Tucker no credit for insolvencies; and it was proved, that he never returned any list of insolvents, even with respect to the public taxes, for either year of his shrievalty. Whereupon, the county court gave judgments against Tucker, upon both motions, for the whole of the balances; that is, for 496 dollars on account of the poor rates of 1803, and for 515 dollars on account of those of 1804.

Tucker appealed from these judgments to the circuit court of Brunswick, which reversed them both, and dismissed the motions at the costs of the Overseers of the poor; and then, they appealed to this court.

582 *The cause was argued by Johnson for the appellants, and the attorney general for the appellee. Several objections were taken by the latter, to the proceedings and judgments of the county court, and discussed at the bar, which the court took no notice of, in giving judgment, and which, therefore, need not be stated. The court rested its decision upon a single point; the great length of time that elapsed before the Overseers of the poor asserted their claim.

BROOKE, P., delivered the opinion. Every plaintiff ought so to present his case to the court, that judgment may be rendered in his favor, without, in any degree, doing injustice to the defendant. From this principle, the proceedings and judgments of the county court, in these cases, exhibit a total departure. The judgments rendered against the sheriff, were for much larger sums than it was possible he could be justly accountable for. The court made no allowances for insolvencies, which must have amounted to a very considerable sum. The assessments for the support of the poor, were imposed, like the county levies, not upon property, but on persons: it was a capitation tax on all tytheables; that is, all males above the age of sixteen, and female slaves above that age: whereas the public taxes were assessed on property only. There would of necessity, therefore, be a greater loss in the collection of the county levies and poor rates, than in the collection of the public taxes. The levies and poor rates were assessed on all, whether they had property or not; and such of them as had none, could not be compelled to pay by distress, the only remedy for enforcing payments: in the case of the public taxes, those who had taxable property were generally able, and compellable to pay, by distress, if necessary. Now, we know, that the loss by insolvencies, in the collection of the public taxes, is always very considerable; the sheriff being required to return a list of insolvents as to public taxes, for the examination of the county courts, in order to enable the auditor to settle his accounts of the taxes col-

*See generally, monographic note on "Sheriffs and Constables" appended to Goode v. Galt, Gilm. 152; monographic note on "Laches" appended to Peers v. Barnett, 12 Gratt. 410.

583 lected. *In the case of county levies

and poor rates, the sheriff is not required to make a return of insolvencies to the court, but is intitled to a credit for all insolvencies which he can shew on the settlement of his accounts. The failure of the appellee, therefore, to return a list of insolvents in respect to the public taxes, can have no effect in this case; since such a return would have afforded no information as to the amount of insolvencies, for which he ought to have credit, upon the settlement of his accounts of the collection of the poor rates.

Those insolvencies probably amounted to a large proportion of the balances claimed as unaccounted for. This state of things renders it really impossible to ascertain the insolvencies in the collection of the poor rates of 1803 and 1804; yet great injustice will be done the sheriff, if no allowance is made for them. This difficulty, it was argued, ought to have been removed by the appellee: but the answer is, that the negligence that has produced it, is in a greater degree imputable to the appellants than to him. Upon these notions made against the sheriff at so late a day, it is impossible to do him justice. In the case of Ross v. Darby, 4 Munf. 428, the court held, that a lapse of less than twenty-two years, connected with other circumstances, was sufficient to discharge a sheriff from a claim for clerk's fees, on the presumption of payment. The case is not exactly analogous to this: but the policy and justice of fixing some limitation to such claims, is not the less strong in the present case. The delay to prosecute these claims for twenty years in each case ought not, under the other circumstances attending them, to be countenanced.

The judgments of the circuit court are affirmed.

584 *Harris v. Harris.

April, 1831.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Continuance—Absence of Material Witness*—Delay.—

Upon a motion for a continuance, upon the ground of the absence of a material witness, the court, if it sees cause to suspect that the party is mistaken or that his object is delay, may examine him as to what he expects to prove by the absent witness.

In an action for slander, brought by John Harris against William Harris, in the circuit court of Nelson, the following slanderous words were charged in the declaration, to have been spoken by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff, viz. that the defendant had said, "that the plaintiff, as the agent of William Moon, had defrauded Moon in the purchase of wheat." and "that the defendant had matters fixed to prove the plaintiff a rogue." And in justification of these words, the defendant pleaded, that the plaintiff as the agent of Moon, a purchase of wheat for Archibald Taylor, did defraud Moon, as purchaser for Taylor, in this, that the plaintiff had purchased a crop of wheat of one John Roberts, at the price of 175 cents per bushel, for and upon his own account, and the price of wheat and flour having greatly fallen in the market, the plaintiff afterwards imposed — bushels of that same parcel of wheat, by delivering the same to Moon or to Taylor, falsely and fraudulently representing and pretending, that he had purchased the wheat for Moon or Taylor, at the price of — per bushel as aforesaid, and requested Moon or Taylor to receive the wheat of him, and to allow him, as their agent, the said price of — per bushel for the same, when in fact, the plaintiff had purchased the said parcel of wheat, at his own risque and on his own account, and not as the agent of Moon or Taylor: wherefore, the defendant was well justified in speaking the said words &c. Upon this plea, an issue was made up.

When the cause was called for trial, the defendant moved for a continuance, on the ground of the absence of Archibald 585

*Taylor, who had been duly summoned as a witness for him, and whose testimony he swore was material: and examined by the court, as to the points on which he deemed Taylor's testimony to be material, he stated, that he expected to prove by him, that a crop of wheat which the plaintiff had purchased from John Roberts at a high price, had afterwards been sent to Taylor, and delivered to him as wheat purchased for him by his agent Moon, through the instrumentality of his plaintiff, who was employed by Moon to purchase wheat for Taylor; that he Taylor had paid 175 cents per bushel for this wheat, the same price at which the plaintiff had bought it; and that when Taylor received it, he did not know that the plaintiff had purchased it on his the plaintiff's own account, but supposed that it had been purchased by his agent Moon, for account of him Taylor: and the defendant farther stated, that he expected to prove by other witnesses, that the plaintiff had in fact purchased the wheat on his own account at 175 cents per bushel, and had afterwards imposed it on Moon, as wheat purchased for Taylor at that price. Upon this, the plaintiff agreed to admit, that Taylor had received the wheat from Moon, as Wheat bought for him by Moon, and that Taylor when he received it, knew the plaintiff had bought it on his own account; and to admit also, that the plaintiff had bought the wheat at 175 cents per bushel, though not on Taylor's account, but for another person, who had thrown it on the plaintiff's hands; but he denied, that he had imposed the wheat on Moon, as wheat purchased for Taylor, and alleged, that he had sold the wheat as his own property to Moon for Taylor, at 162½ cents per bushel, which was the price Taylor paid him for it; all which he was ready to prove by Moon, then present in court and attending as a witness. Upon this, the court not regarding the evidence which the defendant said he expected from Taylor, material to his defendant, and recollecting also that the cause had twice before been continued at the defendant's instance, under circumstances which induced the court to suspect that 586 *the object was delay, overruled the motion for the continuance: to which the defendant filed exceptions.

*Continuance—Absence of Material Witnesses.—On this subject, the principal case was cited in Walton v. E. 32 Gratt. 865; Welch v. Com., 90 Va. 821, 18 S. E. Rep. 378; Phillips v. Com., 90 Va. 403, 18 S. E. Rep. 841; foot-note to Hewitt v. Com., 17 Gratt. 627. For further information, see monographic note on "Continuances" appended to Harman v. Howe, 27 Gratt. 676.

Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for 500 dollars damages; from which the defendant appealed to this court.

Nicholas and Stanard for the appellant: Johnson for the appellee. The questions argued were, 1. Whether the evidence which the defendant stated he expected from the absent witness Taylor, was material; 2. Whether the court had a right to examine the party as to the testimony which he expected from the absent witness, and thus to compel him to disclose his defence? Anthony v. Lawhorn, 1 Leigh 1, and Millstead v. Redman, 3 Munf. 219, were cited.

CABELL, J. The first and main question is, Whether the evidence expected of Taylor as stated by the defendant, was material to his defence? To decide this question, it is necessary to compare the evidence with the facts stated in the plea; for when the defendants in an action of slander pleads justification, and the issue is made up, on the facts set forth in the plea, it is to those facts the evidence must relate. The substance of the plea is, that the plaintiff had purchased wheat on his own account, at 175 cents per bushel, and afterwards when the price had fallen, fraudulently delivered it to Moon or to Taylor, falsely representing that he had bought it as the agent of said Moon or Taylor, and requested Moon or Taylor to receive it, and to allow him as agent aforesaid, the same price of 175 cents per bushel. This plea would be supported by evidence, that the plaintiff, after having purchased the wheat on his own account, had made the fraudulent delivery and false representations, stated in the plea, either to Moon or to Taylor. Did the defendant expect to prove by Taylor, that the plaintiff had made the fraudulent delivery and false representations to Moon, or did he expect to prove that he had made 587 them to Taylor? Not to Taylor, certainly; for *his statement as to the evidence he expected to adduce, shews that he intended to prove that the plaintiff had imposed the wheat on Moon, as wheat purchased for Taylor; and that he expected to prove this, not by Taylor, but by other witnesses. He did not pretend, that Taylor could prove the price originally given for the wheat, or that it was sent or delivered to him by the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff had made any representations to him on the subject. The testimony of Taylor, therefore, was not material; and, consequently, his absence afforded no ground for the continuance of the cause.

I do not think that the question as to the propriety or impropriety of compelling a party to disclose what he expects to prove on the trial, arises in this case; for it does not appear that the defendant objected to being examined on the subject. I should not be disposed to encourage such a practice, except in cases where the judge may suspect, that the party is mistaken as to the materiality of the testimony, or that he is influenced by a desire to delay the trial unnecessarily. And as, on such occasions, the judge, before whom the motion for a continuance is made, has better opportunities of forming correct opinions as to the motives of the party, than this court can have, I think a considerable latitude of discretion ought to be left to the judges of the courts below, on this subject.

The other judges concurred. Judgment affirmed.

April, 1831.

(Absent COALTER and GREEN, J.)

Chancery Jurisdiction—Partnership Bonds—Complete Remedy at Law—Case at Bar.—M. and D. merchants and partners, contract debts to L. for which M. in the name of the firm of M. & D. with R. as surety, execute bonds to L. in 1799 and 1801: D. dies: M. lives till 1818, and then dies insolvent, the principal of the debts due L. with interest from 1816 remaining unpaid: R. the surety is perfectly solvent: in 1821 L. without bringing suit on the bonds against R. the surety, exhibits bill in chancery, against the representatives of D. the administrator of M. the surviving partner, and R. the surety, to charge D.'s estate with the debts, or to have payment of them from the parties, according to their respective liabilities. Held, that L. had a clear and complete remedy at law, by action on the bonds against R. the surety, and, therefore, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

Chancery Jurisdiction—Partnership Debts.—See principal case distinguished in Sale v. Dishman, 3 Leigh 560, in which case it was held that a court of equity has jurisdiction to subject the estate of a deceased partner to the payment of a partnership debt where the surviving partner proves insolvent. As to chancery jurisdiction, see generally, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.
Partnership—Bond of individual Partner for Partnership Debt—Effect in Equity.—Unless it appear that the note or bond of an individual partner is designed to be accepted in discharge of the partnership, it will not have that effect in equity. Thus, if a judgment be obtained against a surviving partner, on notes of the firm, the judgment is, at law, an extinguishment of the original notes (for, transit in rem adjuclcatum); and so in case of a bond, it would be, at law, an extinguishment of the simple contract; yet, in both cases, it would be in equity a partnership debt still. This principle, I understand, to be distinctly recognized by this court in Williams v. Donaghe, 1 Rand. 800, and in Linney v. Dare, 2 Leigh 588. TUCKER, P. in Sale v. Dishman, 3 Leigh 566, 568. See also, opinion of CARR, J. in same case (561).

Same—Death of One Partner—Liability of His Estate for Partnership Debt.—A court of equity has always looked upon the representatives of a deceased partner in the light of a surety for the partnership debts, as chargeable only in the event of the insolvency of a surviving obligor. GALT v. Calland, 7 Leigh 601, citing principal case, and Sale v. Dishman, 3 Leigh 448, 561, 567. To the same effect, the principal case was cited in Jackson v. King, 12 Gratt. 506, and Foot-note to Galt v. Calland, 7 Leigh 596, containing extract from Jackson v. King, 12 Gratt. 507. The right to charge the estate of a deceased partner for the debt of the firm is a creature of the court of equity, and it will be administered only upon its own terms and according to its general rules and principles. And, it may be waived by the creditor, or it may be lost by the course and conduct which he adopts; and thus the equity which he would otherwise have had, will be entirely repelled. This is recognized as the law by J. CARR in Linney v. Dare, 2 Leigh 588, 596, and by J. TUCKER in Sale v. Dishman, 3 Leigh 588, 567. LAW, J. delivering the opinion of the court in Jackson v. King, 12 Gratt. 507. And the creditor by his laches, may put an end to his equity against the estate of deceased partner. Jackson v. King, 12 Gratt. 514, citing principal case.

Same.—On the subject of partnership, see generally, monographic note on "Partnership" appended to Scott v. Trent, 1 Wash. 77.

Linney exhibited a bill in July 1821, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, setting forth that the mercantile house of Murray & Dare having become indebted to him, in the course of trade, in the sum of £254. a bond for the debt was executed to him, on the 16th November 1799, by Murray, in the name of the house of Murray & Dare, and by James Ross, in the name of the mercantile house of Colin & James Ross, as surety for Murray & Dare; and that Murray & Dare having contracted a farther debt to Linney of £440. and Dare having afterwards died, a bond for this debt also was executed to him on the 1st May 1801, by Murray as the surviving partner of that house, and James Ross in the name of the house of C. & J. Ross, as the surety. That the interest was regularly paid by Murray, upon the first debt, till the 1st December 1816, and on the last, till the 1st January 1817, but the whole of the principal of both debts, with interest thereon respectively from those dates, remained due. That Murray afterwards died insolvent, and administration of his estate with his will annexed was granted to Warren Ashley. That Dare died intestate; and administration of his estate was committed to Lewis Halliday deceased, then sheriff of Spottsylvania; to whose hands there came assets of Dare's

589 *estate, derived from the social effects of Murray & Dare, to a larger amount than the debts due to Linney, a great part of which assets he distributed and paid over to Dare's widow and children, his distributees; but there were funds of Dare's estate remaining in his hands at his death, of which he had rendered no account, and which had either been converted by him to his own use, or came to the hands of Waller Halliday his executor. That administration de bonis non of Dare's estate was committed to Hugh Mercer sheriff of Spottsylvania. And that Colin Ross of the house of C. & J. Ross was dead, and James Ross was his administrator. The bill made Waller Halliday the executor of Lewis, Mercer the sheriff and administrator de bonis non of Dare, the distributees of Dare, Ashley the administrator with the will annexed of Murray, and James Ross as administrator of Colin Ross, and as surviving partner of C. & J. Ross, parties defendants; and prayed, that the defendants, or some of them, according to their respective liabilities, might be decreed to pay the plaintiff the debts due to him with the interest thereon; and general relief.

The defendant Ross, in his answer, stated, that he joined in the bonds to Linney, as surety for Murray & Dare, who had jointly contracted the debts, that house being at the time perfectly solvent; that Lewis Halliday, the first administrator of Dare, received of Murray, the surviving partner, about 5000 dollars of the partnership funds, part of which he distributed to Dare's widow and children, and retained the residue in his hands till his death; and that Murray had died insolvent. And he insisted, that Dare's estate was still liable in equity for the debts due to Linney, and ought to be applied to the payment of them, in exoneration of the surety.

The defendant Waller Halliday answered, that though it was true, that administration of Dare's estate was committed to his testator Lewis Halliday, as the then sheriff of Spottsylvania, yet he took no part personally in the administration; it was confided 590 to and conducted by Stapleton *Crutchfield, one of his deputies; and as no part of Dare's estate was ever in fact in his testator's hands in his lifetime, so none of it came to the hands of the defendant his executor.

The defendant Ashley answered, that his testator Murray died insolvent, and that he had fully administered the effects he left.

The distributees of Dare, in their answer, alleged that Ross, the surety in the bonds held by Linney, was perfectly solvent, and objected to the jurisdiction of the court: that the plaintiff's case was not proper for relief in equity. And they declared their belief, founded on circumstances which they stated, that the debts due to Linney, were not the social debts of Murray & Dare, but the individual debts of Murray, and that Ross joined him in the bonds, not as surety for Murray & Dare, but for Murray individually. But, if these were the social debts of Murray & Dare, yet they insisted, that Dare was not bound by the bonds which Murray executed for them in the name of the house; that the bonds, however, extinguished the simple contract debts for which they were given; but, supposing they did not, Linney must rest his claim, as against Dare's estate, on the original assumpsit of Murray & Dare; and against such claim upon the original assumpsit, they pleaded the statute of limitations.

As to Mercer, the sheriff and administrator de bonis non of Dare, the bill was regularly taken pro confesso.

There was proof, that the debts due to Linney, for which the bonds of the 16th November 1799 and the 1st May 1801 were executed by Murray and Ross, were the social debts of the house of Murray & Dare; that Murray was regarded as solvent as late as November 1817; that he had retained in his hands, out of the social funds of Murray & Dare, upon settling the accounts of that concern, ample means to satisfy the debts due to Linney, and it was owing to Linney's indulgence, that payment was not early obtained of him; that he died insolvent; and that Ross the surety was perfectly solvent.

591 *And it appeared, that Lewis Halliday the first administrator of Dare, obtained a decree of the county courts of Spottsylvania in March 1810, against Murray the surviving partner of Dare, for £1468. with interest &c. The accounts upon which this decree was founded, shewed, that this was Dare's share of the surplus of the partnership effects, over and above the debts due from the house; and, particularly, after crediting Murray for the amount of the debts due to Linney, for which Murray was liable though he had not paid them, which credit was allowed him by the commissioner, who stated the account, expressly "on the presumption that Dare's representatives would be absolved from any responsibility for those debts to Linney."

Linney died pending the suit, and it was revived in the name of his administrator.

The chancellor dismissed the bill with costs, without prejudice to any claim which the plaintiff could maintain at law against the defendant Ross or against Dare's administrator.

Linney's administrator appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Johnson for the appellant, and by Stanard and Harrison for appellees. The first question was, whether the case was proper for relief in equity? and upon the supposition that it was so, many other points were raised and discussed at the bar; but the cause was decided upon the point of jurisdiction.

CARR, J. There were many questions raised in the argument at the bar and ably discussed: but the first, necessarily, was as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity to relieve in such a case. It was objected to the jurisdiction, that Murray and Ross having executed bonds to Linney for the debts in question, and Ross the surety being proved, and admitted on all hands, to be perfectly solvent, Linney had a plain and complete remedy at law, and therefore, could not be entertained in equity. We have decided over *and over again, that equity will not entertain jurisdiction, where the remedy at law is clear and complete: the general doctrine, indeed, is too well settled to be discussed. The case of Hoare v. Contencin, 1 Bro. C. C. 27, seems to me exactly like the present, so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned. It was thus: the defendants being concerned in a speculation in tea, borrowed, by their broker, a large sum of money from the plaintiffs, who filed a bill, against two of the principals who were alive and solvent, the assignees of one who had become bankrupt, and the representatives of the other who had died; contending that they were all bound (though not named) by the act of their broker, and stating the whole as a partnership transaction. It was objected, for the defendants, that this was a matter merely at law; that the plaintiffs, upon their own shewing, ought to have brought their action against the two surviving and solvent partners who were liable to the whole demand. The plaintiffs' counsel contended, that the bill was well brought; and, among other arguments, urged, that, it would prevent circuity of action, for if a recovery was had at law against the solvent partners, they must go into equity, to recover against the assignees of the bankrupt, and the representatives of the deceased partner. Lord Thurlow said, "It is of great consequence, that it should be understood, what are the bounds between the jurisdiction of courts of law and courts of equity; because, otherwise, much difficulty will arise from parties being put to a great expense, to try here what should be tried at law; and, what is worse, a party would be permitted to go on here, for legal consequences, although the court must send it to law, to try the legal right. The question is, whether this case differs an iota from the common case of an action at law. What do you desire? Distribution? Do you not contend, that you have a right against all and each of these parties? Here all the equity is, that if one party cannot pay, the other shall; the question is merely between the defendants. Can the plaintiff bring all the parties before the court, to try the right *between them, when he has

nothing of his own to try? It is true, that where he has an equitable demand, the plaintiff must bring all the parties interested before the court." After several other remarks, he concluded: "It would have been tried at law, at the expense of about £100. Here is an immense quantity of pleadings and depositions, an enormous expense, to bring in question a demand which is merely at law." And he dismissed the bill with costs. Let us see, for a moment, how aptly this case fits the one before us. Linney had a complete and plain remedy at law: he had only to sue Ross on his bond, get a judgment, and his money was made; for all admit that Ross is wealthy. Instead of this suit at law against one, he files a bill against numerous parties, whose responsibilities, if established, are several and various. He resorts to the expensive and cumbrous machinery of a suit in chancery, with bills, and answers, and depositions, and reports, and exceptions &c. instead of an action of debt on a plain bond. And the case has already been in court ten years, instead of as many months which it might have taken to get judgment on the bond. For this change of forum, the bill does not assign the semblance of a reason. But several were given in the argument. It was said, that it was to save circuity of action, and to put the burden at once where it ought to lie. But lord Thurlow tells us, it is no part of the plaintiff's business to be anticipating the equities which may arise between others, in consequence of his recovery at law; that he can come into equity, for no such reason; but must pursue his legal remedy, and leave it to those concerned, to fix the debt where it ought to rest. Again, it was said, that though the plaintiff might sue at law, he had an equal right to pursue Dare's representatives in equity; as a party, having a bond with surety and a mortgage for the same debt, may sue the surety at law, or go into equity to enforce his mortgage, or pursue his remedies in both courts at once, if he choose. It is certain he may do this: he proceeds, in each case, on the deed of the debtor, and the bill is to enforce the *real security. But is the case before us like that? Murray & Dare owed these debts by simple contract to Linney: Murray with Ross as surety, executed two bonds for the debts: these bonds, at law, extinguished the simple contract debts: the execution of them, and the death of Dare, threw on Murray the whole legal responsibility. Dare's representatives could not be touched at law; and though, in equity, neither the giving of the bonds, nor the death of Dare, discharged them from the debt, yet it materially changed their situation. Their liability was, now, neither immediate nor absolute. Watson says, "At law the executor of the deceased partner is not liable to be proceeded against by the partnership creditors. But if they find the surviving partner not responsible, they may come upon the deceased partner's estate in equity." Gow also lays it down, that the surviving partner must in the first instance be called on; and it is settled he says, that upon the insolvency of the surviving partner, the representative of the deceased may be resorted to in equity. Wats. on Part. 368; Gow, 460. And lord

Eldon has said, (ex parte Kendal, 17 Ves. 527,) "that in many cases the representative may be entitled to say to the creditor, who chooses to make the demand, that justice requires the surviving partners to pay the debt: they are to be considered the principals: he is merely a surety." These authorities shew, that the two remedies do not exist simultaneously, but the creditor must first resort to the surviving partner, and on his insolvency, to the representative of the deceased partner. In all my examinations (and they have been laborious) I have not found one single case, where the creditor has been permitted to pursue the representative of the deceased partner in equity, until he had sued the surviving partner at law, and shewn a defect of assets, or such partner had been declared bankrupt. But it is said, that Murray is dead insolvent; and though Ross is bound in the bonds, he is only a surety. I answer, this does not authorise a resort to equity: while

Ross is solvent, the remedy at law is clear and complete; nor does the fact of his being a surety alter the case. There are thousands of bonds given with sureties, sometimes one, sometimes many: if this doctrine were correct, whenever the principals died, the obligee might file his bill in equity, either to make the representatives of the principal pay, or to settle the equities, and equalize the contribution between the sureties: but who ever heard of such a course? Linney, then, I think, with the bond of Ross in his hands, on which he had brought no suit, had no right to file this bill in equity against the representative of Dare. But, supposing this difficulty removed, we are told this right to pursue the representatives of the deceased partner, may be lost: that it is "a demand in equity only, and to be enforced only upon equitable principles;" and "the right standing only on equitable grounds, if the dealing of a creditor with the surviving partners has been such, as to make it inequitable that he should go against that fund" (the estate of the deceased partner) "he would not, upon general rules and principles, be entitled to the benefit of that demand;" per lord Eldon, in ex parte Kendal. [And judge Carr went into an examination of the peculiar circumstances of this case, and, upon the merits, declared his opinion to be, that Linney had no well founded claim in equity, against Dare's representatives; but, as the other judges concurred with him in declining the jurisdiction, his remarks on the case, in the other point of view, are not reported.]

CABELL, J. If Linney had pursued his legal remedy on the bonds in the proceedings mentioned, without being able to obtain satisfaction of his debts; or if it appeared that Ross, the surety to those bonds, was insolvent, as well as Murray; then he would have an equity to claim satisfaction from the estate of Dare, the deceased partner, unless that equity should be rebutted by circumstances sufficient to produce that effect. But as no suits at law have been prosecuted on those bonds, and as it is certain that Ross, the surety, is solvent, I am of opinion that Linney had no right to come into a court of equity against the representatives of Dare. Upon this ground, without deciding any other question arising in the cause, or discussed at the bar, I am for affirming the decree.

BROOKE, J., concurred. Decree affirmed.

Young v. Gooch and Brown.

April, 1831.

(Absent CABELL and COALTER, J.)

Real Estate—Contract for Purchase of—Ratification by Commonwealth—What Constitutes.—A county court, empowered by act of assembly in 1784, to select a place on which to establish an inspection of hemp and hemp warehouses, and if the proprietor of the ground will not erect the warehouses, to cause them to be erected at public expense, but not empowered by the law to purchase the ground itself for the commonwealth, contracts with the proprietor to purchase the ground itself, and orders payment of the purchase money thereof out of the treasury, and the same is paid to the proprietor accordingly: the commonwealth holds the ground till 1797, when the inspection is discontinued, and thenceforth till 1816, when an act of assembly is passed, claiming this ground as the property of the state, putting it under care of the executive, and directing it to be sold: HELD, that the actual holding possession under the contract of the county court, and the assertion of the right of property by the act of 1816, are a ratification of the contract made for the purchase of the ground by the county court, and a sanction of the contract.

Same—Claim of Land in Possession of Commonwealth—Remedy of Claimant.—If the commonwealth is in actual possession of land, an individual claiming the same, cannot enter upon that possession, but must resort to his petition of right: and, if he enters, and is ousted by actual force, by the officers or agents of the commonwealth, having lawful orders to do the act, he cannot maintain trespass against them.

To a declaration in trespass quare clausum fregit, by Young against Gooch and Brown, in the circuit court of Henrico, the defendants pleaded, 1. The general issue: 2. A special plea, in substance, that the locus in quo was a lot in Richmond, which was, on the day of the supposed trespass complained of, the property and in the possession of the commonwealth, and so under the superintendence of the executive; and the plaintiff having, on the same day, unlawfully entered and trespassed on the lot, so being the property and in the possession of the commonwealth, by erecting a fence upon it, and digging the soil, the executive ordered the defendants, who were the lawful officers of the government bound to obey and execute its lawful orders in that behalf, to forewarn the plaintiff from persisting in his said trespass, and if notwithstanding such warning he still persisted, to remove the said fence; and the defendants gave the plaintiff warning accordingly, and he not regarding the same, and persisting in his said trespass the defendants in pursuance of the order of the executive, as lawfully they might and were bound to do, caused the fence so by him erected, to be pulled down, and the possession of the lot to be retained by the commonwealth, whose property it was, and in whose possession it then was and yet continued; which was the trespass supposed and complained of in the declaration: and 3. Another special plea varying from the other, in only alleging that the locus in quo was in the lawful possession of the commonwealth, at the time of the trespass complained of, without asserting also that it was the property of the commonwealth. Upon these pleas issues were made up.

At the trial, the plaintiff filed two bills of exceptions, and the defendants filed one, to opinions and instructions of the court given to the jury.

1. The plaintiff having adduced evidence, that the defendants had forcibly entered upon lot number 194, in Richmond, whereof he claimed the title and possession, and pulled down an enclosure recently put there by him, which was the trespass complained of; the defendants, on their part, shewed an order of the county court of Henrico, made in December 1784, in these words; "Charles Lewis, the proprietor of a piece of ground, on which it is intended to erect warehouses for the reception of hemp, in this county, agreeably to the act of assembly, for 598 establishing an inspection of hemp, appeared in court, and refused to build the same; whereupon it is ordered that J. Y., R. A., and J. B., or any two of them, be appointed commissioners to let the building of the said warehouses, agreeably to the directions of the said act." And another order of the same court, made in January 1787, in these words: "Ordered that the treasurer pay to Charles Lewis the sum of £145. for the lot number 194, on which the hemp-houses stand, agreeably to the valuations thereof made and returned." And a receipt of Charles Lewis for the £145. paid him at the treasury, on the 3d April 1787, "for the lot," according to the order of the county court. And then the defendants adduced evidence to prove, that the lot in question was put into the possession of the commonwealth in 1784, by consent of and contract with Lewis, the former owner; that a hemp warehouse was built upon it, and a public inspection of hemp there established; that the inspection having in fact gone down in 1797, the warehouses were removed by order of the government in 1801; that the lot was always reputed to be public property, and rated as public property on the books of the commissioner of the revenue and 599 by *the assessors of property in Richmond, and had been represented to be so by the plaintiff himself, prior to his taking possession thereof; and that the commonwealth, through the officers of government, had exercised divers acts of ownership over it from 1809 to 1814. The defendants also gave in evidence an act of assembly concerning the public property in the city of

*The act of May 1784, ch. 37, 11 Hen. stat. at large, p. 412. This statute provided, that public warehouses for the reception of hemp, should be kept at or near Richmond, Alexandria and Fredericksburg; and authorized and required the justices of the courts of the counties wherein the inspections were established, to select proper places for the warehouses and inspections; and to cause the owners of the places so selected to be summoned to court, there to declare whether they would undertake to erect good and sufficient warehouses; and if they undertook them, to require bond with surety of them for the due performance of such undertaking; and if they refused to undertake them, then to contract for the erection of such warehouses, and to certify the charge to the treasurer, who was directed to pay the same &c. The act also established the inspections at the places so to be selected; and authorized the inspectors to receive of the exporter or manufacturer, 1s. 3d. per cwt. of hemp inspected, and directed them to account for and pay one half thereof to the treasurer, or to the proprietor, as the case might be. It was agreed on all hands that this act gave no authority to the county court of Henrico, to purchase for the commonwealth, the property of the site it selected for the warehouse.—Note in Original Edition.

Richmond passed the 28th February 1816.† And they announced, that they should rest their defence on the ground, that the commonwealth had been in actual possession of the lot in question from 1784 till the passing of the act of February 1816, and thenceforth, till the plaintiff took the possession and made his fence thereon, which was some short time before the act complained of by him as a trespass; that the plaintiff had unlawfully intruded upon the lawful possession of the commonwealth; and that, though the defendants, being and acting as the agents and officers of the commonwealth, had forcibly entered and expelled the plaintiff from the possession of the premises so by him unlawfully acquired, yet the plaintiff could not maintain this action against them, for forcibly expelling him from such his possession acquired by such his unlawful intrusion on the lawful possession of the commonwealth. Whereupon, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that under the act of May 1784, it was not competent to the county court of Henrico, or for any other officer or functionary of government, to acquire the fee and freehold of the lot in question; that, under that act, it was only competent to the county court to acquire, for the commonwealth, the use of the lot as a site for a hemp warehouse, and as an easement; that, as the fee and freehold of the lot could not, and no more than an easement could, be lawfully acquired by or for the common-600 wealth, so the fee and freehold *of the lot was not acquired, but only an easement therein, and the commonwealth never had any right to the fee and freehold, but only to the easement; that the commonwealth's possession necessarily followed and was co-extensive with her right; and that her possession of the easement did nowise divest, but was perfectly compatible with, the possession of the fee and freehold in the original owner of the soil. But the court refused to give this instruction, and gave a charge to the jury, to the following effect: That the act of May 1784 made no provision for acquiring title to the commonwealth of the lands on which the hemp warehouses were to be erected, or for the payment to the proprietor, of either the fee simple value or the annual rent of the lands; but only directed the county courts to select the sites for the warehouses, and if the proprietor refused to erect them, to cause them to be erected at public expense, and to certify the charge for erecting them, to be paid at the treasury; and authorized the inspectors to receive of the exporter or manufacturer 1s. 3d. per cwt. of the hemp inspected, and required them to pay one half to the treasurer or to the proprietor; that is (as the court supposed) to the former, in case the warehouses were erected at public expense, or to the latter, if they should erect them. That there was nothing in the statute, however, to prevent the commonwealth from obtaining the possession, not of an easement merely, but of the land itself; since, though the only object of obtaining the possession, was to erect the warehouses, yet one and perhaps the best mode of effecting that purpose, was to obtain actual possession of the land, as, in case of destruction of the warehouses by accident or time, it might be proper to rebuild them; and it might be, that the proprietor would refuse to permit the warehouse to be erected, without being paid the fee simple value of the land, and the county court, acting for the commonwealth, might refuse to pay that value, without having possession of the land given to the public: that thus it might be, that the privilege of erecting the warehouses, could not 601 *in fact be exercised, without obtaining possession of the land itself. That there was nothing in the law to inhibit the commonwealth from holding such possession. That possession of the lot in question, might be lawfully acquired by contract with the proprietor. That, if the jury should find from the terms of the bargain appearing from the evidence above stated, or any other that should be adduced, that it was the intention of the proprietor to part with the possession of the lot itself, though he never conveyed, or made any formal contract in writing to convey the same to the commonwealth, and that the agents of the commonwealth, in conformity with that intention, did take possession of the lot in question, the commonwealth ought to be protected in the possession thereof, to the same extent as an individual would be protected, who should have purchased the lot, paid the purchase money, and became possessed thereof. That the actual possession by the commonwealth for a series of years, would enable her to maintain trespass, or to defend herself in an action of trespass. And that the commonwealth, being once in possession of the lot itself, must be presumed to continue in possession, till actual ouster, notwithstanding the removal of the hemp warehouse, and the discontinuance of the hemp inspection on the premises. To this charge the plaintiff filed exceptions.

2. The plaintiff then offered in evidence, a deed of gift, executed by Charles Lewis and Susan his wife, to their son Gilley Marion Lewis, dated the — day of — 1784, and recorded in Henrico county court on the 6th September 1784, conveying lands to G. M. Lewis, the son, whereof the lot in question was parcel; and a deed of bargain and sale, executed by G. M. Lewis and wife to the plaintiff Young, dated the 26th May 1818, and duly recorded in the same court in June following, conveying the lot number 194, now in question, to the plaintiff. In this last deed there was a special warranty

602 effect: That whereas the lot conveyed by the deed, had been therefore in the possession and occupancy of the commonwealth, and used as a hemp warehouse; and whereas, by force of the provisions of an act of assembly passed in the year 1792, and of the discontinuance of the warehouse and the inspection, the right and title of the lot had reverted to the said G. M. Lewis, and he upon the resumption of his original estate therein, had become bound to pay the sum which had been before received of the commonwealth on account thereof, with interest from the date of the receipt: therefore, the lot was conveyed to Young without general warranty, and for the farther consideration that Young undertook to pay, or otherwise to acquit Lewis, of all sums which might be claimed by the commonwealth, for the purchase money paid for the lot. Upon this, the defendants moved the court to instruct the jury, that, unless the plaintiff shewed, that G. M. Lewis, from April 1787, the date of the receipt of the £145. for the lot, by Charles Lewis, from the treasury (as mentioned in the plaintiff's first bill of exceptions) to May 1818, the date of his deed to Young, made some claim on the commonwealth for that sum of money for which Charles Lewis's receipt was given on the treasury books, or asserted title to the lot for which the money was so paid, the jury ought to presume that the money was so paid to Charles Lewis in April 1787, with G. M. Lewis's assent; and that the deed of G. M. Lewis to the plaintiff, admitted that the money so paid, had been duly paid, and it was not competent to the plaintiff claiming under that deed, to question that fact. But the court, considering these as questions of fact, refused to give such instructions: and the defendants excepted.

3. The evidence mentioned in the first two bills of exceptions, having been given to the jury, and other evidence having been adduced by the defendants tending to prove a 603 *long possession by the commonwealth of the lot in question, and the evidence of both parties having been gone through, the defendants' counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, That if they found, that the commonwealth had been, for more than thirty years, in possession of the lot on which the trespass complained of was alleged to have been committed, and that possession continued until the plaintiff's entry; and that the plaintiff had entered upon the possession of the commonwealth; and that the defendants, as officers of government, acting under orders of the executive, had, within four or five days after such entry of the plaintiff, entered upon the lot: then, though the defendants so entered with force and with a multitude of people, but using no more force than was necessary to remove the enclosure recently put there by the plaintiff; and though the plaintiff's previous entry had been peaceable, there being then no actual occupant of the premises; and though, at the time of the plaintiff's entry, he was entitled to the mere right of property therein, and continued entitled to the mere right, at the time he was forcibly turned out of possession by the defendants; yet the plaintiff could not maintain this action. And the court did so instruct the jury. To which opinion and instruction the plaintiff excepted.

Verdict and judgment for the defendants; from which Young appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. The second bill of exceptions in the record, was filed by the appellees, and is of no other importance now, but that it serves to shew the character of the intrusion of the citizen upon the property claimed by the commonwealth, which her officers thought themselves justified in repelling by actual force, and that it may also serve to introduce and explain the instruction last moved for by the defendants and given by the court. It was no lawless intrusion, but a peaceable entry of the citizen, under a claim of title, or rather under a title, paramount to any right of the commonwealth, upon property

*This was a mistake: there was no such act of assembly ever passed, that I can find.—Note in Original Edition.

604 which at the time was vacant. *The circuit court erred in refusing to give the instructions prayed by the plaintiff, and in the charge which it did give to the jury, stated in the plaintiff's first bill of exceptions. The only organ of the commonwealth competent to the acquisition of real property, is the legislature; and the acts of the legislature (public or private) the only authority, under which the officers of government can make such acquisition for the state; and to those acts only can the courts of justice look, to ascertain the nature and extent of the rights acquired. The act of May 1784, certainly, did not authorize the county court of Henrico to purchase the fee and freehold of the lot in question, or the officers of the treasury to pay the purchase money. The public wanted nothing but an easement: the legislature authorized the county court to acquire that, and no more: and no more could in fact be acquired than could lawfully be acquired. It is not certain (as the circuit court seems to have been aware) that the purchase of the fee and freehold of the lot was really intended: it is most probable, indeed, that the purchase of the easement was all that was intended. For though the order of court of January 1787, directs the payment of £145. for the lot agreeably to the valuation thereof made and returned; yet that might as well mean the easement as the property itself; in like manner as in the common order of a county court to pay the assessed value of a piece of ground, upon which a new road is opened, the language, however general, is always expounded by the law and the purpose, and understood to import a compensation for the easement, not for the property. It may be said, that the price, in this case, was the full fee simple value of the land, and, therefore, the contract was for the land; but non constat that it was the full value; and if it was, the full value ought to have been paid for an easement like this, which though it left the freehold in the proprietor, was likely to deprive him and his heirs forever of the beneficial use. The full fee simple value of lands upon which public roads are run, is generally paid to the 605 proprietor. But be this as *it may, the contract made by the county court of Henrico with Charles Lewis, ought to be expounded by the law under which the court was acting: the county court ought not to be charged with usurping powers not delegated to it, nor the officers of the treasury suspected of paying money out of the treasury without any appropriation, nor the citizen supposed to have parted with his rights of property beyond what was required for the public service: and, upon the facts then before the court and jury, it ought, in point of law, to have been intended, that the county court meant only to acquire an easement, and Lewis to part with his rights only to that extent. It would be most strange and most mischievous, if a county court opening a new road, should make a general order to pay the proprietor the assessed value of the land, and then that the county should be allowed to claim the land, on the ground that the county had paid for it, and whenever the road should be discontinued, to sell the stripe of land to the highest bidder. In such a case, there can be no doubt, the law would hold that the fee and freehold remained in the proprietor, and would protect his right of property, not only after the discontinuance but during the continuance of the easement. Our case is the same in principle; the same in fact, except that the proprietor has not to contend with a single county, but with the whole commonwealth. And seeing that this act of May 1784 made no express provision for compensating the owners of the lands selected as sites for the hemp warehouses, in case they declined to build the warehouses, but in that case reserved one half of the fees of inspection to the treasury, leaving the other half to the inspector, it ought surely to be intended, that the county court, sensible of this gross injustice, meant to compensate the owner of the lot in question for taking his property, nolens volens, for public use as an easement, according to the constant and familiar course in like cases, rather than to purchase the property itself without warrant of law. The just legal inference from the facts before the court and jury, was, 606 that the commonwealth *had only acquired the easement. But the circuit court told the jury, if it found from the terms of the bargain, appearing from the evidence then before it, or any other that should be adduced, that it was the intention of the proprietor to part with the lot itself, and that the agents of the commonwealth took possession of it in conformity with that intention, the commonwealth ought to be protected in the possession, to the same extent that an individual would be in a like case; which certainly means, that the jury might infer a contract for the sale and purchase of the property from the facts then in evidence. The circuit court told the jury, there was nothing in the act of May 1784, to interdict the commonwealth from purchasing the fee and freehold. And surely there was not. But there was nothing in the law to authorize the officers of the commonwealth to make such a purchase; and the constitution forbade them to do it without warrant of law. Then, as to the possession of the commonwealth, that was only co-extensive with her rights: if she cannot be dispossessed, so neither can she be a disseisor. If she had only an easement, her possession ceased, when the inspection was discontinued. But this charge of the circuit court was erroneous, even upon the principles it assumed: the jury was told, that the actual possession of the commonwealth for a series of years, would enable her to maintain trespass, or to defend herself in an action of trespass. But how can the commonwealth sue or be sued in trespass?

The instruction stated in the plaintiff's last bill of exceptions, supposes this state of facts: that a citizen having the right of property in a parcel of land, and finding the land wholly unoccupied and vacant, enters upon it peaceably, and encloses it; but the commonwealth had previously been in possession of this land for thirty years, and that possession continued till the time of the entry made by the proprietor of the mere right of property: and the jury is told, that, if within four or five days after his entry, the officers of government expel the citizen by 607 actual violence * (not carried farther than the purpose required), the citizen cannot maintain trespass against them. How the law would have been, if the commonwealth, or her agents, or any person claiming under her, had been in actual possession at the time of the citizen's entry, and he had made a forcible entry, and her officers had peaceably re-entered, is not the question. The reverse of that state of facts was the case before the court. The property was unoccupied and absolutely vacant; the citizen, holding the right of property, entered in peace; the commonwealth's officers expelled him with actual force. The instruction given by the court contradicts the whole doctrine of forcible entry and detainer.

Stanard and Nicholas, for the appellees. Whether the county court of Henrico contracted to purchase for the commonwealth, and Lewis to sell, the lot itself, which had been selected for the site of the hemp inspection in 1784, was a question of fact, which the circuit court left to the jury, upon the evidence the parties had already adduced or might adduce. It was not the province of that court, nor is it of this, to decide upon the sufficiency of the evidence. The jury found the fact.

It is admitted, that the act of May 1784, did not authorize the county court to purchase the property of the land it selected for the hemp inspection, nor the treasurer to pay the purchase money, if the county court contracted for such purchase. But it cannot be denied, that it was competent to the legislature to have given such authority to the county court and to the treasurer; and, if it gave not the authority originally, to ratify and sanction the act after it was done. Now the purchase was ratified, on the part of the commonwealth, by the allowance of the payment of the purchase money out of the treasury; by the taking possession of the subject under the contract of purchase, and the holding thereof, not only during the continuance of the inspection, but long after the inspection had gone down, when the possession could only be referred to a contract and claim of the treasury, any more than to purchase the property itself: the one was not more without any express warrant of law, than the other would have been. It is obvious from Gilley M. Lewis's deed to Young, that they were both aware, that the property was in the commonwealth; for the claim to it is therein stated to be founded on an act of the legislature remitting it to the original owner, upon the condition of his refunding the purchase money paid out of the treasury with interest.

As to the last instruction, the law is well settled and clear. It is not lawful for a citizen to make entry upon property in possession of the state. Even in the case of an individual, a possession of twenty years takes away the right of entry from the owner of the mere right of property: it gives the right of possession. Young's entry, therefore, was every way wrongful. And if a person having a right of entry, enters with a strong hand, and forcibly ousts the party wrongfully in possession, the party ousted cannot maintain trespass. That is a possessory remedy. The rightful possessor may oust the wrongdoer by force, without giving him any civil remedy, though he may make himself liable to a criminal prosecution. Argent v. Durrant, 8 T. R. 403; Doe v. Reade, 8 East, 353; Adams on Eject. 76, 78; Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. Rep. 152.

609 *Johnson, in reply, insisted that the authorities cited did not sustain the proposition contended for; and that no such principle could be applied, to the case of a party claiming, not under a conveyance, but under a mere verbal contract with another, claiming, in truth, only as the tenant at will or at sufferance of the owner of the legal title, so as to justify the claimant of the equity, in forcibly ousting the owner of the legal estate, from a possession peaceably acquired by him. The commonwealth never had any adversary possession: her possession was only permissive, from the beginning. Neither did the circuit court found its last instruction upon the supposition that her possession was an adversary one, but upon the fact of her possession, simply, whether adverse or otherwise.

As to the supposed ratification of the purchase made by the county court of Henrico in 1784, by the act of the legislature of February 1816; that argument assumes the very point in debate. If the county court contracted only for an easement, if by the law under which it was acting, it could acquire nothing more, it can hardly be pretended, that the act of the legislature in 1816, under pretext of ratifying the act of the court, can convert it into a purchase of the property, and ratify the supposed purchase. The act of February 1816, was probably passed under a misapprehension of the rights of the public: if not, it was an unjust and unconstitutional appropriation to the commonwealth of the property of the citizen.

CARR, J. The act of 1784, certainly gave the county courts no power to purchase ground for the erection of the hemp warehouses. It seems from the orders of Henrico court, that, in the commencement, it intended only to have the buildings erected, after the owner of the lot refused to undertake them; but it is equally clear to me, that after the buildings were put up, the court found it could make no terms with the owner of the lot, short of paying him the full price of the fee; and then it decided (as in common sense 610 *and reason it must) that if the public was to pay the full value, it would buy the lot; and, therefore, in its order of January 1787, it directed the treasurer to pay Lewis £145. for the lot, on which the hemp warehouses stand agreeably to the valuation thereof made and returned. This speaks as plainly (to my understanding) as language can, that this money was paid (not for an easement, a privilege, or any thing, but) for the lot itself, which lot had been valued. And on a copy of this order, the treasurer took a receipt for the £145. as paid "for the lot." If in this purchase and payment, the court and the treasurer overstept the limits of their power, it was surely competent to the assembly to ratify their acts; and the maxim tells us omnis rati habitio retro habitur atque mandato æquiparatur. This sanction the legislature has given, I think, 1st, by taking and holding many years under the purchase, and 2ndly, by the act of 1816, expressly recognizing it as public property then in possession of the commonwealth, putting it under the superintendence of the executive, and directing the sale of it, and the application of the purchase money. It will be remarked, that both instructions of the circuit court, excepted to by the plaintiff, are predicated on the jury's being satisfied, by the evidence stated or any other evidence, that the commonwealth took possession of the lot, under the contract, and held it till the plaintiff entered upon it; and of this the jury must have been satisfied or they could not have found for the defendants. I feel justified, then, in taking it as proved, that the possession of the commonwealth, was of the lot itself, claiming it as public property. And this being so, I am very clear, that the plaintiff could not lawfully enter upon the commonwealth. Such an entry seems utterly incompatible with the idea of sovereignty which belongs to the state. The citizen who claims land of which the state is in possession adversely, must resort to his petition of right, and if he enter illegally, upon her, may properly be ousted, as Young was in this case. Thinking, then, that the record shews a case, in which

611 the plaintiff could in no event be entitled to recover, though I may not in all respects agree with the instructions given to the jury, I am for affirming the judgment.

GREEN, J. I think that both the instructions of the court excepted to by the plaintiff, were substantially right, but for a reason different from those assigned by the court below.

The case is shortly this: The commonwealth had been in possession of the lot in question ever since 1784, under a contract made with the proprietor thereof, by the county court of Henrico, acting professedly on behalf of the commonwealth, and which was executed by the payment of the money, the consideration of the contract, by the treasurer, upon the warrant of the auditor. The county court had no authority to make any contract with him in respect to the lot, nor had the auditor and treasurer any authority to pay the money for the commonwealth. And it does not appear, that the proprietor entered into any written contract in respect to the property, or made any conveyance. The legislature, however, ratified and adopted the contract, whatever it was, and the payment of the money, by the act of 1816, claiming it to be a purchase in fee simple, placing this lot, with all the other public property in Richmond, under the care and control of the executive, and directing the lot to be sold. Whether this contract was a sale and purchase of an easement or of the absolute property, was properly left to the jury, upon the evidence. But, whether it was of the one or the other character, the possession of the commonwealth under it, and the ratification of it, and the claim made to hold the lot absolutely by the act of 1816, did not vest any legal title whatever in the commonwealth: that remained in the proprietor. The plaintiff claiming under him, entered upon the property, and in a few days was expelled from it by the defendants acting under the orders of the executive. The commonwealth, however, acquired by this possession, and ratification of, and claim under, the contract, all the right which an individual could have acquired 612 *under similar circumstances; that is, an equitable right to the easement, or to the property itself, as the case might be. For, the ratification of a contract made by a stranger in the name of another, confers upon that other all the rights which he would have acquired, if he had been an original party to the contract. And if it be true, that the commonwealth can acquire no right or property but by virtue of some legislative act, that circumstance is found in the act of 1816.

The court below held, that under such circumstances, an individual purchaser, in possession under a contract of sale, having paid the purchase money, might defend his possession against the vendor, or enter upon him if he regained the possession; and that the commonwealth had the same rights. This was a mistake; such a possession, not being adverse, even if exceeding twenty years, could not be set up against the legal title in a court of law for any purpose. And even if such a possession of twenty years could operate between individuals, it could not as between the commonwealth and an individual; for she can neither disseise nor be disseised by any one.

There is, however, another principle of the common law, which barred the right of entry of the plaintiff, and justified his expulsion by the public officers entering under the orders of the executive charged by statute with the care and control of this property specifically. There would be an extreme inconvenience, if an individual were allowed, at his own pleasure, to enter upon the possession of the commonwealth, whenever it happened that property in her possession, was held under a defective title, and he was its legal owner, and to hold her out until the mischief could be remedied by an appropriate legislative act, giving compensation and condemning the property for public use, or till the question of right could be investigated and settled in a due course of law. If such a right was allowed, in respect to property in the possession of the commonwealth, though not in actual use, it must extend to those cases in which it is in her actual occupation, for purposes 613 indispensable, as the *capitol, barracks, armory, arsenals, and the like. I am confident no government in the world allows the existence of such a right in individuals. It certainly was not allowed by the common law: for, in England, if property is in possession of the king, in his political capacity, without title, the true owner cannot regain the possession by entry, but must resort to his petition. 9 Vin. Abr. Disseisin, D. pl. 19, p. 96. And the same remedy exists here, both as at common law and under our statutes. Upon this ground, I think the instructions were right, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

BROOKE, P. The commonwealth can acquire, or assert or defend, her rights to property, only through her agents. In this respect the commonwealth holds a position as to her property, and the manner of acquiring it and defending it, somewhat different from a natural person. In the acquirement of land, it is not necessary that the title should pass to her by deed, in the ordinary forms of law, as in the case of a natural person. It has been her practice, justified by the acts of the legislature, to acquire title to land, by the contracts of her agents designated by law for that purpose, and the payment of the purchase money, as in the case before us. That it has been her practice to acquire lands in the manner stated, is evidenced by the circumstance, that none of the acts of the legislature, authorizing the purchase of land for any public purpose, have provided any other mode by which title to the same was to be acquired; no regular conveyance of the title from the vendor ever being provided for, nor any organ of the government designated to receive it; and the payment of the purchase money having been, it seems, the only requisite to consummate the title of the commonwealth, under purchases made by her agents. That the commonwealth holds a position with regard to her title to property, differing from that of a natural person, results from the circumstance, that she can only act by her agents, and is otherwise intirely passive.
614 Thus, no time runs against *her rights. She cannot be a disseisor or a disseisee, though her agents may be both; and if they act with good faith and under her authority, she makes herself responsible for the consequences. In this view of the rights and condition of the commonwealth, the case before us will be examined.

And the first inquiry is, as to the right of the commonwealth to the lot, on which the trespass complained of is alleged to have been committed by the appellees. On the sound construction of the act of 1784, I think it must be admitted, that the county court of Henrico was not authorized to purchase for the commonwealth, the fee simple interest in the lot in question. But upon the facts of the case, I think it can yetless be doubted, that the court of Henrico did, in fact, purchase for the commonwealth, the fee simple title to the property; that its purchase was consummated by the payment of the purchase money to Lewis the vendor, by the authorized agents of government for that purpose; and that, though the county court of Henrico was not authorized by the act of 1784, to make the purchase, yet the purchase was, by those acts, ratified by the commonwealth, and gave her the absolute legal title to the property.

The next inquiry is, as to the character of the possession of the commonwealth, at the time the supposed trespass was committed by the defendants, and into the authority by which they entered upon the lot, and the justification of that entry. As to the character of the possession, the facts are, that in pursuance of the object of the act of 1784, a warehouse for the inspection of hemp, was erected on the premises; that there was a regular inspection of hemp established there, and conducted according to law, until about the year 1797, when the inspection was discontinued; that the warehouse was soon afterwards removed; and that, after that period, there was no actual occupancy of the lot by any one, until the plaintiff, more than thirty years after the title and possession of the commonwealth accrued, entered upon it, and enclosed it; a few days after which, the supposed trespass was committed by the entry of the defendants, and ouster of the plaintiff, under the authority of the execu-

from the bills of exceptions filed in the cause, and others that will be noticed, the correctness of the instructions given by the circuit court to the jury, is to be tested. In doing this, I premise, that if the circuit court stated the law upon the case in evidence, to the jury, more unfavorably to the defendants than to the plaintiff, it is not for the latter to object. And that, I think, was clearly the case. Upon a very argumentative statement of the evidence, on which the instruction was asked for by the counsel for the plaintiff, in the first bill of exceptions, the judge instructed the jury, that if they should be of opinion, from the terms of the bargain appearing from the evidence there stated, or any other evidence in the cause, that it was the intention of the proprietor to part with the possession of the lot itself (though he never conveyed the same to the commonwealth, or made any formal contract in writing to convey), and that the agent of the commonwealth, in conformity with that intention, did take possession of the lot itself; the commonwealth ought to be protected in that possession, to the same extent as an individual would be protected who should have purchased the lot, paid his money, and became possessed thereof. This part of the instruction, I think, was most favorable to the plaintiff: the court might have instructed the jury, on the facts stated, that no deed or formal conveyance from the proprietor to the commonwealth, was necessary; and that the commonwealth, upon the facts admitted as the ground on which the instruction was asked for, had an absolute legal title to the property, and full right to the possession of it, when its agents entered upon it, built the warehouse, and established the inspection of hemp, as an individual would have had under a conveyance from the proprietor, followed by similar acts, instead of leaving it to the jury, whether the proprietor intended to part with the possession, either from the terms of the bargain, or any other evidence. The error in this part of the instruction, then, was favorable to the plaintiff, and cannot be objected to by him. The remainder of the instruction I think was correct enough: it was, that the actual *possession by the commonwealth for a series of years will enable the commonwealth to maintain trespass, or to defend herself in an action of trespass, and further that the commonwealth being once in possession of the lot itself, must be presumed to continue in possession until actual ouster, notwithstanding the removal of the hemp warehouse, and the discontinuance of the inspection on the premises. However this might have been as to an individual (which it is not necessary here to decide), as no time runs against the commonwealth, this was, as before remarked, correct enough.

The only remaining question is, whether the instruction stated in the third bill of exceptions, which was asked by the defendants, given by the court, and excepted to by the plaintiff, was correct? That instruction, I think, though in some respects erroneous, was more favorable to the plaintiff than the defendants: it admits a mere right in the property intirely incompatible with the absolute title which was in the commonwealth; and, as no time runs against the commonwealth, and as her possession was adverse to the title of G. M. Lewis at the time when the deed from him, under which the plaintiff claims, was executed, that deed passed no title to the plaintiff, even if G. M. Lewis had title; but, in truth, he had no title; and he was sensible he had none, as appears by the deed itself. The title was vested in the commonwealth, in the manner before stated. As to the previous part of the instruction; it is certainly well settled law, that a party having title to the possession may enter upon it, and defend that entry in an action of trespass against him; and if so, where he uses no force, he may also justify his entry in an action of trespass, though he may have used force, for which he may be prosecuted criminally. As to the authority of the executive, under the act of 1816, placing the public property in Richmond under its care, and as to the authority of the defendants under the order of the executive; both were left to the jury, and must be presumed to have been proved by proper evidence, or the plaintiff would have excepted to it. The judgment is affirmed.

Privy Examinations.—Who May Take.—Aldermen of Richmond.—Under the statute of conveyances of 1785, ch. 62, the aldermen of the city of Richmond, not being justices of the peace of Henrico, had no authority to take privy examinations and acknowledgments of femes covert residing in Richmond to conveyances of land.

Statute.—Explanation by General Usage.—When the words of a statute are doubtful, general usage may serve to explain them: but the maxim communis error facit jus, has no application to the usages of particular corporate towns or other places.

Ann Currie, the wife of James Currie of the city of Richmond, being entitled in her own right and in fee to an undivided twelfth part of a parcel of land in Chesterfield, called The Black-heath coal pits, and of all the coal and coal pits thereto belonging, the said James Currie and Ann his wife, by deed, dated the 26th September 1796, conveyed the premises to David Ross in fee; and Ross, by deed executed the next day, conveyed the same to Currie, the husband. The deed executed by Currie and wife to Ross, was acknowledged by the wife, on privy examination, before James M'Clurg the recorder, and William Richardson an alderman, of the city of Richmond, where Currie and his wife resided at the time; but the magistrates were not justices of the peace of the county of Henrico. The deed with the privy examination and acknowledgment of the wife, was recorded. Mrs. Currie died a few days after the execution of it, without issue. Currie died in 1807.

The appellees, Page and others, the heirs at law of Mrs. Currie (who were under disabilities at the time of her death, and long after) exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, in March 1830, against the heirs of Currie and mortgagees claiming under them, and the tenants in common of the eleven undivided twelfth parts of The Black-heath coal pits; insisting, that the deed of Currie and wife, of the 26th September 1796, was null and void as to the feme covert, because her privy examination *thereto and acknowledgment thereof were not taken by justices of the peace of the county of Henrico, who were the only magistrates authorized by the law, as it then was, to take her privy examination and acknowledgment, but by aldermen of Richmond, who had no legal authority for the act; claiming Mrs. Currie's undivided twelfth part of the land in question, as her heirs at law; and praying that Mrs. Currie's deed might be declared null and void; that her undivided twelfth part might be severed, and assigned to the plaintiffs, her heirs; and an account of profits &c.

The defendants, in their answers, insisted, that the deed of September 1796 was duly executed by Mrs. Currie; for that, by the laws, as they stood at the time, and according to the just construction thereof ascertained by long and constant practice under them, the mayor, recorder and aldermen of Richmond, had authority to take the privy examinations and acknowledgments of femes covert residing in Richmond, to deeds of conveyance of lands by them.

The defendants exhibited certificates of the clerks of the general court, of the district court of Richmond, and of the hustings court of Richmond, shewing fourteen instances of privy examinations and acknowledgments of deeds of femes covert, taken by aldermen of Richmond, between the years 1785 and 1794, and the deeds, with the aldermen's certificates of such privy examination and acknowledgment, admitted to record without question.

The chancellor declared, that as M'Clurg and Richardson, who took the privy examination of Mrs. Currie to the deed in question, were not then justices of the peace of Henrico, but one the recorder and the other an alderman of Richmond where Mrs. Currie resided, and as they had no authority to take her privy examination and acknowledgment, that deed was as to her null and void; and he made a decree according to the prayer of the bill.

The defendants appealed to this court; where the cause was argued by S. Taylor and Forbes for the appellants, and 619 *by Johnson for the appellees. All the statutes in any way relating to the subject, were referred to and examined at the bar. The following brief account of them will suffice to shew the grounds of the controversy.

The statute of 1734, ch. 6, § 7, 4 Hen. stat. at large, p. 400, re-enacted by the statute of 1748, ch. 1, § 6, 5 Id. p. 410, provided, that a commission might be issued by the clerk of the general or of any county court, to two or more commissioners, being justices of the county where the feme should reside, to take and certify the privy examination and acknowledgment of femes covert, to deeds of conveyance of lands.

The act of May 1782, ch. 25, 11 Id. p. 45, entitled an act for incorporating the town of Richmond and for other purposes, provided for the election and appointment of the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and common council, of the city, and established the hustings court; and it was enacted by the 6th section, "that the mayor, recorder and aldermen, shall each be vested with the powers of justices of the peace within the said city, and shall have jurisdiction for the space of one mile on the north side of James river, without and around the said city, and every part thereof; for matters arising within the same, according to the laws of the commonwealth." The act of 1736, ch. 24, 4 Id. p. 441, 2, for confirming the charter of the borough of Norfolk, and enlarging the jurisdiction of the hustings court of the city of Williamsburg, contained similar provisions: it gave power to the mayor, recorder and aldermen (of Norfolk) to be justices of the peace within the said borough; and provided, "that the mayor, recorder and aldermen (of Williamsburg) shall have, use and exercise, all the powers, jurisdictions and authorities, out of court, which any justice or justices of the peace of a county now have or can, or may use and exercise."

The statute of 1785, ch. 62, 12 Id. p. 154, made a slight alteration in the general statute of 1734; requiring, that the commission to take the privy examination and 620 acknowledgment *of femes covert to deeds, should issue from the court where the deed ought to be recorded, and be executed by two justices of the peace of that county in which the feme dwelleth.

By an act, entitled an act concerning corporations, passed the 22d December 1796 (after the deed in question was executed, and the privy examination and acknowledgment of Mrs. Currie thereto was taken) it was enacted, "that the magistrates of any corporate town shall have the same power to examine privily, and take the acknowledgment of a feme covert to a conveyance, and to certify the same, as is by law given to justices of the peace of a county. 1 old Rev. Code, Pleasants's edi. of 1803, ch. 208, § 2, p. 366.

CARR, J. The cause depends wholly upon the question, Whether the magistrates who took the privy examination of Mrs. Currie, were authorized by law to do so? The question is one of positive law.

At the common law, a feme covert could make no deed. By statute she can make a valid deed, if it be executed under those forms and with those solemnities required by law; but if any of these be omitted or mistaken, the deed is void. With respect to our early legislation on this subject, it is briefly but accurately stated in a note of the learned editor of the Revised Code of 1819, vol. I, p. 366. "By the acts of 1674, 1705 and 1710, the privy examination and acknowledgment of femes covert to deeds, could only be taken of the femes personally, by the general or county court, where the deed was recorded. The act of 1734 provided, that a commission might be issued by the clerk of the general, or any county court, to two or more commissioners, being justices of the county where the feme shall reside, to take and certify her privy examination and acknowledgment; and the law was declared to be, that such privy examination and acknowledgment were not binding on the feme, unless recorded.

And the provisions of this act of 1734 621 were substantially re-enacted *by the act of 1748. The report of the committee of revisors of 1784, and after them, the assembly of 1785, made a slight alteration; requiring that the commission should issue from the court where the deed ought to be recorded, and be executed by two justices of the peace of that county in which the feme dwelleth." Thus stood the law, at the date of the deed in question; requiring that the feme should be examined in open court, or before two justices of the peace of that county in which she dwelleth. The commission for taking the privy examination, in the case before us, issued to and was executed by the recorder and an alderman of the city of Richmond, where the feme covert resided.

It was insisted, that this was not a good privy examination, because the recorder and alderman of Richmond could, by no intendment of law or reason, be regarded as two justices of the peace of Henrico, the county in which the feme dwelt. On the other hand, the examination was asserted to be good, 1. because the law incorporating the city of Richmond, enacts, that the mayor, recorder and aldermen, shall each be vested with the powers of justices of the peace within the city; 2. because, if this law did not clothe the magistrates of the corporation with the power of privy examination, such had been the general opinion and practice, and communis error facit jus.

As to the first, it is obvious to remark, that we should naturally expect to find the manner of taking privy examinations, and the persons empowered to take them, set out and regulated in the general law of conveyances, rather than in a local act establishing a corporation. In the general statute, the subject was directly before the legislature: its title was, an act to reduce into one, the several acts for regulating conveyances. Accordingly, we find many pages taken up in the most particular and minute details of all the forms and ceremonies, necessary to the perfection of deeds of every kind; and this, among others, who shall take the privy examination of femes covert, and how they shall be taken, is most particularly attended to, and settled (with some slight variation) in the same way in which it had stood *for fifty years. It is most evident, that the legislature supposed it had regulated the whole subject by this law. If, then, the law of the corporation and this general law bore even date, I should hardly look to the local act, to narrow or extend the range of the general law, on a subject not local but general. The laws, however, are not of the same date. The general law is the latest. But let us look to the particular words of the act of incorporation of 1782. [The judge read them.] It seems very clear to me, that in using the words of that act, the legislature never thought of deeds or privy examinations. This subject was not in the slightest degree connected with that they were upon. They were meting out the judicial powers necessary to the officers of the corporation. The words profess and clearly purport this. Their powers in court had been described; it was necessary to give them judicial powers out of court; and the act says, they shall each be vested with the powers of justice of the peace, within the city, and for a mile round it, for matters arising within that space. What matters? evidently matters touching the internal police, and affecting the peace, quiet and order of the city. Could the taking privy examinations of femes covert, enter into this class of matters, arising within their jurisdiction? But again; they were to take jurisdiction of these matters, according to the laws of the commonwealth: the established laws, then, were to be their guide. This is perfectly right and intelligible, if we understand the powers as relating to the peace, order and other judicial duties of justices of the peace out of court; but not at all so, if we make it relate to the privy examination of femes covert. It would certainly be contrary to the settled rules of construction to take the words, "shall be vested with the powers of justice of the peace," separate from the other words of the sentence, when those other words were so clearly meant to explain, limit and circumscribe their extent. But even if we should take them without their context, I think they may be plainly and fairly satisfied, without making them embrace the power of privy examination.

Justices of the peace are well known, both *to the common law, and to our statutes from the earliest date, as judicial officers of the counties, holding courts, and exercising, in their counties, certain judicial powers, as conservators of the peace, and in other respects. When, therefore, this law creating judicial officers of the corporation, vests them with the powers of justices, the words, I think, are fully satisfied by giving them those judicial powers which were exercised by justices, and should not be extended, to any ministerial powers which the legislature had, for convenience, thought proper to vest in justices of the peace. This is clear enough without the context; with it, it is certain. But even suppose this act of 1782, should be taken to empower magistrates of the corporation to take privy examinations; would not this be repealed by the statute of 1785, saying that the feme must be examined in open court, or before two justices of the peace of the county in which she dwelleth? If the maxim be true, that leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant, this last law must have repealed the former; or it must be contended, that they are not leges contrarias, but may well stand together; in other words, that an alderman of the city of Richmond is a justice of the peace of Henrico.

I do not think it worth while to notice, particularly, the different laws creating the different corporate towns in the state (six, I believe, in number). The powers which they vest in the corporate magistrates, are pretty much the same with those of Richmond; and if they were different, could not affect the question. The legislation on this whole subject of corporate powers, satisfies me, that it was never intended to give any of them, or their officers, the power of taking the privy examination of femes covert. Their courts, indeed, were not made courts of record, for deeds or wills, until long after the laws establishing them as corporations. But if any doubt as to the legislative meaning remained, it would seem to be removed by the statute of December 1796, concerning corporations; which enacts, that, from and after the passing thereof &c. the magistrates of any corporate town, shall have the same power to examine *privily, and take the acknowledgment of a feme covert to a conveyance, and to certify the same, as is by law given to justices of the peace of a county." I conclude, that the act incorporating Richmond did not give to M'Clurg and Richardson the power to take the privy examination of Mrs. Currie.

But 2dly, it was argued, that though the actual legislation may not have given this power to the corporate magistrates of Richmond, the general opinion and practice of the town has given it to them, and this makes the law. From this position I dissent intirely. We have six corporate towns (I believe) in the state; all of them, except Petersburg, older than Richmond. We have not an atom of proof that this taking of privy examinations, was the practice of any corporation but Richmond; and yet if it was the practice, the records would shew it at once. But if we had the amplest proof from the records of all these corporate towns, I should deny that it would change the acts of the legislature, plainly set down. I shall not go into the discussion of the phrase communis error facit jus, which we find loosely used in some of the old cases; for I hold, that the local construction of these corporations can in no sense be considered communis error. That means an universal opinion and usage. The case of The King v. Hogg, 1 T. R. 721, seems very apposite to this point. The question there was, whether under the statute 43 Eliz. ch. 2, a machine, which was in a house but not fixed to it, could be rated to the poor, so as to increase greatly the rate as against the occupier of the house and machine. The occupier thus rated appealed to the court of sessions, where the rate was confirmed, and they stated a case for the court of king's bench, of which it was a part, "that the usage of the town of Ribchester (where the house was) had been, not to rate personal property." In the argument of the case, the counsel in support of the order of session, quoted the case of The King v. Saltrem, where it was decided, that the usage of a particular parish, could not control the construction of an act of parliament; and The King v.

625 Harman, where Probyn, *J., said, "usages that can vary the construction of an act of parliament, must be universal, and not only the usage of a particular parish." On the other side, it was admitted, that the usage of a particular place could not control an act of parliament, but contended, that general usage might explain it. The court established the rate, in opposition to the usage without difficulty. Buller, J., said, "we are not to make, but to explain the law." Grose, J., said "it has been argued, that this rate can not be supported, because it has not been the usage of Ribchester, to rate personal property. But we are interpreting an universal law, which can not receive different constructions in different towns. It is the general law of the land, that this kind of property should be rated; and we cannot explain the law differently by the usages of this or that particular place. If there had been an agreement entered into by all the inhabitants of the town, not to rate any particular species of property, for their own accommodation, that might have been binding upon themselves, as an agreement; but if a case be stated for the opinion of this court upon the law on the subject, we cannot construe the act of parliament, according to their agreement. As to usage, I am clearly of opinion that it ought not to be attended to, in construing an act of parliament, which cannot admit of different interpretations. Where the words of the act are doubtful, usage may be called in to explain them." I see other cases referred to, as supporting this doctrine; but I have not looked to them; for the case does not seem to me to need them. The statute of 1785, the last on the subject of taking the privy examination of femes covert, existing at the time of the deed in question, provided, that it must be by two justices of the peace of the county in which the feme dwelleth. No usage can control this law, if such had been proved: no usage of the city can make an alderman of the corporation a justice of the peace for Henrico.

The other judges concurred. Decree affirmed.

April, 1831.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Cases Reviewed.—The principle of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, and Martin v. Lindsay's administrators, 1 Leigh, 499, again brought under review; and the court, four judges sitting, divided on the point.

Deed of Trust—Usury*—Injunction—Quære.—F. contracts usurious debt to G. and gives him a deed of trust of land to secure it; F. exhibits bill in chancery, against G. and the trustee, charging the usury, disclaiming any demand of discovery from the creditor, insisting that deed of trust is null and void, and praying that plaintiff's testimony may be perpetuated, and defendants enjoined from selling trust subject till the validity of the deed can be tried at law; G. denies the usury; but it is proved: Quære, whether, in such case, the court of chancery ought to enjoin the trustee from selling under the deed of trust, till the creditor claiming under it shall establish its legal validity in some proper forum where the debtor may have an opportunity to contest it?

Fitzhugh exhibited a bill against Gordon and Ford, in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, stating, that in May 1821 he executed a bond to Gordon, for 2400 dollars, payable in May 1823, and to secure the payment thereof, executed, at the same time, a deed of trust, conveying to Ford a tract of 401 acres of land in Fauquier, upon trust, in default of due payment of the debt, and upon Gordon's request, to sell the land and satisfy the debt out of the proceeds of sale: charging, that the debt, for which the bond and the deed of trust were given, was usurious, and that Fitzhugh was apprehensive, from Gordon's conduct (the circumstances of which he detailed) that it was his design to forbear proceeding to enforce payment of the debt, till the evidence of the true character of the transaction should be lost: disclaiming all benefit of a discovery from Gordon, and undertaking to prove the charge of usury by evidence now in his power, without resort to Gordon's answer, or to any discovery he should make: and praying, that Gordon, and Ford the trustee, and all others might be enjoined from proceeding on the deed of trust, until the question of usury should be tried at law; that the testimony of 627 Fitzhugh's witnesses might be perpetuated, *and general relief. Gordon's answer was somewhat argumentative, but, in substance and effect, it denied the imputed usury. As to Ford, the bill was taken pro confesso. Fitzhugh adduced his proofs of the usury. The chancellor dismissed the bill with costs. He did not declare the reasons of his decree: he probably thought, either that the evidence of the usury was not sufficient to prove the charge, or that the bill was prematurely filed. Fitzhugh appealed from the decree to this court.

The cause was argued here by Briggs and Johnson for the appellant, and Standard for the appellee, 1. upon the question of fact, whether there was usury or not? (as to which this court considered the proof

*Usurious Debt—Bill for Relief—Measure of Relief.—See on this subject foot-note to Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh 478; foot-note to Turpin v. Povall, 8 Leigh 93, and other note there cited; monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 686.

The principal case was cited on the subject in Turpin v. Povall, 8 Leigh 97, 101; Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 266, 267, 275, 276.

complete and satisfactory to establish the usury); and 2. supposing the usury proved, what ought to be the mode and measure of relief? This last question brought under review again, the principle of the cases of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, and Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs, 1 Leigh, 499.

CARR J. This case is, in principle, the same with Marks v. Morris. In Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs, I have given my views on this subject, at large, and it is by no means my intention now to repeat them. I was overruled there; and, though I adhere to that opinion, I have no idea of embarrassing this case, because there happen to be only four judges sitting, and two of them think Marks v. Morris wrong. I consider the question settled in favor of that case, and shall not attempt again to disturb it, while the court is constituted as it now is. I have said thus much, merely to prevent the conclusion, that my opinions on the subject have undergone any change.

GREEN, J. This court is unanimously of opinion, that the chancellor's decree is erroneous; but is equally divided as to the measure of relief which should be given to the appellant; whether according to

628 Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. *415, or to Marks v. Morris and Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs: for I agree intirely in the opinion given by judge Carr in the case last mentioned. This division leads us to the alternative of affirming the decree, or that some one of us shall yield an opinion upon the question of relief, and accede pro hac vice, to the principle of Marks v. Morris, which those who have heretofore approved of it, will not abandon. The decree involves a judicial decision, that the transaction in question in this cause, was not affected by usury, and that adjudication, if the decree be affirmed, would be a perpetual bar to any future relief to the appellant, at law or in equity, since it would estop him from alleging the fact of usury, and thus inflict an irreparable injury upon his rights by an erroneous decision upon a matter of fact. On the other hand, it can only be reversed by a judicial declaration, that the transaction was usurious; which would be conclusively binding upon the appellee, and estop him from denying the fact in any future contest touching it: thus assuming for a court of equity, a jurisdiction to do indirectly, what no one has ever claimed that it can do directly; to enforce or aid in enforcing a penalty, by sending, or rather leaving, the parties to proceed at law, with a judicial declaration, that there is usury in the transaction, which is conclusive. With this alternative presented, I think, the lesser injustice and injury will be done, by reversing the decree. To affirm it, would be to deprive the plaintiff in equity, who has completely proved the case stated in his bill, of all future relief, at law or in equity, to which he would be entitled, but for such a judgment: while to reverse it, and pronounce a judgment against the defendant, as in Marks v. Morris, will be only to deprive him of the opportunity of prosecuting his claim at law with little hope of success. For, he must have encountered the objection of usury there, whether he proceeded on the bond or the deed of trust. I, therefore, consent to reverse the decree, and enter such a one as that in Marks v. Morris.

629 *CABELL, J. This case comes within the principle decided in Marks v. Morris, and acted upon in Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs. It must receive the same direction.

BROOKE, P. As some pains were taken to state the grounds on which the case of Marks v. Morris was decided, in my opinion in Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs, I shall add very little to what was said in that opinion. If it is supposed, that the court meant to decide the question of usury conclusively, in those cases, there is a manifest mistake. On the contrary, the whole object, as to the relief asked for, was, to open the door of the court of law, which had been closed against the plaintiff by the deed of trust, and to leave the party to prove the usury in that forum, if he could, by such proof as would be proper in a court of law, after proceedings in equity, as in other cases; the evidence of the usury adduced in the court of equity, if the best the nature of the case admitted of, to be resorted to by either party in the court of law, as in like cases, but the decree permitting the plaintiff in equity, to defend himself at law, if sued there, to have no effect in the court of law. This obviously resulted from the disclaimer of the court to grant relief on the merits of the controversy. In doing this, the court acted on the parties only, and violated no principle of a court of equity, applicable to cases in which a judgment at law had been rendered. The relief granted in such cases is totally different from the relief prayed for and granted in the cases alluded to. The case before us must be admitted to come with the principle of the cases of Marks v. Morris, and Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs, since the facts in it sufficiently establish the usury in the deed of trust.

The decree is therefore reversed; and this court proceeding to render such decree as ought to have been rendered by the court of chancery, it is decreed and ordered, that the injunction be reinstated, until the appellee shall establish the validity of the bond or deed of trust, in a court 630 *of law, or other proper tribunal; and in that event, the injunction is to be dissolved, and deed of trust held, if necessary, as security for the amount due; or, otherwise, the injunction is to be perpetuated; and the cause is remanded &c.

Crawford and Others v. Jarrett's Adm'r.

(Absent CABELL and COALTER, J.)

Parol Evidence—Written Instrument.*—Parol evidence is not admissible to vary, contradict, add to, or explain, a written agreement; but, in cases of equivocal written agreements, the circumstances under which they were made, may be given in evidence to explain their meaning.

Parol Evidence—Written Instrument.—Parol evidence cannot be admitted (unless in case of fraud or mistake) to vary, contradict, add to, or explain, the terms of a written agreement, by proving that the agreement of the parties was different from what it appears by the writing to have been. The Executions—Contract of Indemnity—Signing by One Not Named in Instrument—Effect—Consideration.—A constable levies sundry executions sued out by A. on property of the debtors; the removal and sale of the property is forbidden by the landlords of the debtors, claiming that it was liable for the rents; and A. the creditor, and B. enter into a written agreement, to indemnify the constable "agreeably to law;" which agreement is signed by A. and B. and by C. also, though C.'s name is not in the body of the instrument; and this agreement is delivered to the officer, on the day and at the place of sale; A. B. and C. all acknowledging it as their act, and B. and C. declaring verbally, that they are A.'s sureties: Held, this is the joint assumpsit of A. B. and C. to indemnify the constable, for removing and selling the property under A.'s executions and paying the proceeds to him, and the sale of it by the constable is a consideration to support the assumpsit as to them all.

Same—Same—Action on—Effect of Judgment against Officer—Quære.—An officer is indemnified for selling property taken under execution, the sale whereof is forbidden by landlords of the debtor, claiming payment of rents in arrear; the officer sells; the landlords bring action against him and recover judgment for damages: Quære, under what circumstances, in an action brought by the officer upon the contract for the indemnity, it may be competent to the defendants to prove the real value of the property to be less than the damages assessed in the action against the officer, or what is the effect of the judgment against the officer, as against the persons bound to indemnify him?

Same—Removal of Goods without Paying Rent Due—Measure of Damages.—An officer takes under execution, and removes, goods of a lessee, without paying the rent in arrear due to the landlord: Held, in an action by the landlord against the officer for so doing, not the amount of the rent arrear, but the value of the goods, is the just measure of damages.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by Jarrett's administrator against Crawford, Gardner and Shrewsbury, in the circuit court of Greenbrier.

631 *The declaration contained three special and two general counts. 1. The first stated in substance, that Jarrett in his lifetime, being a constable of Kanawha, at Crawford's special instance and request, levied seven writs of fieri facias, sued out by Crawford upon judgments of a justice of the peace of Kanawha, on warrants against Wood and Brown, upon goods the property of those debtors, found on certain premises leased to them and others, by one Warth, and by Alderson and Slack; out of which premises there were rents reserved, and then in arrear and due, namely, 75 dollars and 120 bushels of salt to the lessor Warth, and 1068 dollars to the lessors Alderson and Slack; and, at the time Jarrett levied Crawford's executions on the goods of the lessees, those goods were taken and held in distress by the lessors, for rents in arrear to them, respectively; and they requested of Crawford and Jarrett, that the rents due them, respectively, should be paid; whereupon, and in consideration, that Jarrett would sell the goods taken by him under Crawford's executions, and satisfy the same out of the proceeds of sale, Crawford, Gardner and Shrewsbury (the defendants in this action) made and signed a written agreement with Jarrett, whereby—reciting, that Jarrett had levied Crawford's executions, on the following property of Wood and Brown, viz. seven chairs &c. [specifying some other trivial articles of furniture] the sale of which was forbidden by the lessor Warth, and two yoke of oxen and one cart, the sale of which was forbidden by the lessors Alderson and Slack, they Crawford, Gardner and Shrewsbury, agreed to indemnify Jarrett, the constable, agreeably to law; and thereupon, Jarrett sold the goods under Crawford's executions, and the instrument. Yet the said security was held bound upon proof that he executed the instrument with the intention of becoming a party thereto. In the case of a sealed instrument declared upon, proof of the execution thereof becomes necessary by the plea of non est factum at law (or the answer in chancery, if a case in equity), putting that fact in issue. The circumstance that the writing declared on in Crawford v. Jarrett, was not under seal, does not affect the principle involved in this question. The intention to become a party to, and be bound by the instrument, is the fact to be determined in either case."

rule of evidence, thus stated by JUDGE GREEN in the principal case, has met with approval in numerous subsequent cases. See Towner v. Lucas, 13 Gratt. 710; foot-note to Woodward v. Foster, 18 Gratt. 200 (collecting many cases in point); Colhoun v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 646; Southern Mut. Ins. Co. v. Trear, 29 Gratt. 258; Tait v. Central Lun. Asylum, 84 Va. 280, 4 S. E. Rep. 697; Bonsack Mach. Co. v. Woodrum, 88 Va. 516, 13 S. E. Rep. 994; Kline v. McLain, 33 W. Va. 36, 10 S. E. Rep. 13; Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 661, 20 S. E. Rep. 687; Howell v. Behler, 41 W. Va. 617, 24 S. E. Rep. 646. Yet, in cases of equivocal agreements in writing, the circumstances under which they were made, may be given in evidence, to explain their meaning. For this proposition, the principal case was cited with approval in Towner v. Lucas, 13 Gratt. 711; Woodward v. Foster, 18 Gratt. 208; foot-note to Talbot v. Richmond, etc., R. R. Co., 31 Gratt. 685; French v. Williams, 83 Va. 466, 4 S. E. Rep. 598; Richardson v. Planters' Bank, 94 Va. 130, 26 S. E. Rep. 418; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 488.

Bill of Exceptions—Reference to Another Bill.—The facts stated in one bill of exceptions cannot be noticed by an appellate court in considering another, unless the first bill is referred to in the second, and adopted as part of it. To this effect, the principal case is cited in Dishazer v. Maitland, 12 Leigh 529; Zumbro v. Stump, 38 W. Va. 386, 18 S. E. Rep. 447; Klinkler v. Wheeling, etc., Co., 43 W. Va. 221, 27 S. E. Rep. 288.

And in Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 21, it is said: "It has been repeatedly decided by the court of appeals of Virginia that facts stated in one bill of exceptions cannot be noticed by an appellate court in considering another, except the first bill of exception should be referred to in the second, etc., and except also when a bill of exceptions is taken after all the evidence has been submitted to the jury, and it purports to set out all the evidence, it seems that the evidence set out in this bill of exceptions may be looked to in considering the question raised in another bill of exceptions taken in the progress of the trial. Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106; Crawford, etc., v. Jarrett's Adm'r, 2 Leigh 639; (Perkins v. Hawkins) 9 Gratt. 649; 1 vol. of Robinson (old) Prac. 346, 347."

See further, on this subject, foot-note to Perkins v. Hawkins, 9 Gratt. 651; monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 26 Gratt. 587.

Contracts—Signing by One Not Named in Instrument—Effect.—In Beery v. Homan, 8 Gratt. 51, it is said: "The court is of opinion, that to constitute a valid bond of the party, the intention to bind himself must appear on the face of the instrument; that the signature and seal form a part thereof, and furnish prima facie evidence that the person so signing and sealing the bond intended to make himself a party thereto, and to be bound by the stipulations thereof; although the name of the party so signing, sealing and delivering the bond, may not be inserted in the penalty or recited in the condition. The case of Bell v. Allen's Adm'r, 3 Munf. 118, does not actually decide that the bond there offered in evidence, was not the bond of the security because his name did not appear in the body of the instrument, but it was rejected when offered in evidence, on the ground of an alleged variance between it, and the bond described in the declaration. If, however, it is to be inferred that the case was decided upon the ground that the bond was invalid as to the surety for the cause aforesaid, the authority of the case is impaired by the decisions of this court in the cases of Bartley v. Yates, 2 Hen. & Munf. 398; Beale v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 380; Raynolds v. Gore, 4 Leigh 376; and was in effect overruled in Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh 639. In that case the name of one of the sureties, Shrewsbury, did not appear in the body of the writing; and there was no blank left for the insertion of other names; which has sometimes been supposed to shew an intention not to exclude other parties who have signed paid him the proceeds, in satisfaction of his executions, which amounted to 145 dollars, besides interest and costs; and, afterwards, Warth brought two suits against Jarrett, in the circuit court of Kanawha, for his so taking and selling the said goods, and recovered judgments, in one suit for 81 dollars, and in the other for 64 dollars, damages, and the costs; and Alderson and

Slack brought a suit against Jarrett, 632 *in the same court, for his so taking and selling the said goods, and recovered judgment against him for 1163 dollars, damages, and the costs; which judgments against Jarrett remained in full force, nowise vacated, reversed or annulled (except that 581 dollars of Alderson and Slack's judgment had been released by them) as would more fully appear by the record of the said suits and judgments, reference thereto being had; yet the defendants Crawford, Gardner and Shrewsbury, or either of them, had not indemnified Jarrett agreeably to law, or in any way saved him harmless, in manner and form as by their said agreement provided, but on the contrary, Jarrett had been compelled to pay and satisfy the said judgments so recovered by Warth, and by Alderson and Slack, to those parties respectively. 2. The second count did not allege, that the goods of Wood and Brown, taken by Jarrett under Crawford's executions, were on leasehold premises, held by the debtors under Warth, or Alderson and Slack, or that the lessors had taken the goods in distress for rent, or that they claimed satisfaction of any rent in arrear and due to them, or that they had forbidden the sale; and it alleged, generally, that the defendants, Crawford, Gardner and Shrewsbury, in consideration that Jarrett would sell divers goods of Wood and Brown, which he had taken under Crawford's executions against them, and would pay the proceeds to him in satisfaction thereof, undertook and promised Jarrett, that they would indemnify and save him harmless for so selling the goods, without stating, that the undertaking and promise of the defendants was in writing. In other respects, this count was like the first. 3. The third count stated, that the defendants Crawford and Gardner, by an agreement in writing, bound themselves to indemnify Jarrett for selling the goods taken by him under Crawford's executions, and that Shrewsbury signed the same agreement, as surety with Gardner for Crawford, and thereby became a joint promiser with Crawford and Gardner, and then all three of them delivered the agreement to Jarrett, as their joint agree- 633 ment *to indemnify him for selling the goods. In all other respects, this count was like the first. The 4th and 5th counts were general counts in assumpsit, for money paid, laid out and expended, and for money had and received.

The defendants demurred generally to the three special counts in the declaration: the court held the counts good, and overruled the demurrer. And they pleaded in bar, 1. That the plaintiff's intestate, Jarrett, had impleaded the defendants in a former action for the same causes, and for non-performance of the same promises, in the declaration alleged, in which former action, there was a verdict and judgment for the defendants: the plaintiff replied, nul tiel record: the defendants shewed the record of a former action of Jarrett against them, and judgment for the defendants, but in that case, the actual agreement of the defendants for the indemnity of Jarrett, offered in evidence by him, was excluded on account of material variance from the agreement laid in the declaration, and so the jury found for the defendants: and, upon inspection of this record of the former action, the court held, that there was no such record as that alleged in this plea. 2. The defendants pleaded, that the plaintiff had never made any demand upon them to indemnify him; to which plea the plaintiff demurred generally; and the court held the plea naught, and sustained the demurrer. 3. The defendants pleaded the general issue, upon which the cause was tried.

At the trial, the defendants filed four bills of exceptions to opinions and instructions of the court given to the jury.

1. The plaintiff offered in evidence the agreement of the defendants to indemnify Jarrett, which was as follows: "Whereas E. Jarrett, constable of Kanawha county, hath, by virtue of seven executions in the name of B. A. Crawford against A. Wood and J. Brown, levied the same on the following property, seven chairs, &c. [specifying a few articles of furniture] the sale of which is forbidden by J. Warth, and the sale of the balance of the property, viz. two yoke of oxen and one cart, by S. 634 Slack; and the said *B. A. Crawford, plaintiff in the above named executions, and N. Gardner, his surety, bind themselves, &c. to indemnify the above named constable agreeably to law. Witness our hands &c." This instrument was signed by Crawford, Gardner and Shrewsbury (though the last was not named in the body of it), and the plaintiff offered parol proof of their signatures, and that it was delivered, signed as it is, to Jarrett, on the day of the sale, by Crawford, and that Gardner and Shrewsbury acknowledged it, and that they were sureties in the same. Upon which, the defendants objected to the admission of the paper as evidence, and of the parol proof of Gardner and Shrewsbury's acknowledgment that they were sureties, on the ground that the instrument did not shew a joint assumpsit of the defendants, such as was stated in the declaration; but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence. The defendants excepted.

2. The plaintiff offered in evidence the record of the action brought by Alderson and Slack against Jarrett mentioned in the declaration: that was an action under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 7, p. 448, by A. and S. as landlords, against Jarrett, for his taking, removing and selling, under Crawford's executions, the two yoke of oxen and cart of the plaintiffs' tenants Wood and Brown, and also for taking, removing and selling divers goods of other tenants of the plaintiffs, without paying the landlords the rent in arrear; the whole of the goods having been found on the demised premises, and so liable to the landlords for the rent in arrear, and having been actually taken by Jarrett himself under a distress warrant for the rent; and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs A. and S. for 1163 dollars, damages and costs, whereof they entered a release of 581 dollars. Whereupon, the defendant's counsel objected to the admission of this record in evidence, on the ground that it was variant and different from that described in the declaration; but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the record as 635 evidence of the damages, *which Jarrett had been compelled to pay, on account of his sale of the property under Crawford's executions, for the recovery whereof this suit was brought. The defendants excepted.

3. The plaintiff offered in evidence, three receipts of Reynolds, a deputy sheriff of Kanawha, for moneys paid by Jarrett in satisfaction of Alderson and Slack's execution on their judgment against him, and offered proof of the deputy sheriff's hand writing to the receipts; to which the defendants objected, because no reason was shewn for not bringing Reynolds himself as a witness; but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence of Reynolds's hand writing to the receipts. The defendants excepted.

4. The defendants offered evidence to prove the value of the property in the declaration mentioned, sold by Jarrett under Crawford's executions, and that the value thereof was trivial; but the court would not admit any evidence as to the value of the property; and instructed the jury, that if it should find, from the evidence, that the defendants were bound to indemnify Jarrett, then the amount of the judgments recovered against him for selling the property for Crawford, was the measure of his damages, and that the defendants could not, in this action, go into evidence to shew that the damages assessed and adjudged against Jarrett, were beyond the real value of the property, and exorbitant, that being a proper subject of inquiry in the suits against Jarrett, as well as any other damages which the plaintiffs in those suits had sustained by the sale of the property. The defendants excepted.

Verdict for the plaintiff for 821 dollars, and judgment accordingly: from which the defendants appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellants: Stanard, for the appellee. The reporter was not present at the argument, and no note of it was preserved.

636 *GREEN, J., without noticing the demurrer to the special counts of the declaration, or of the plea of a former action and judgment for the defendants and the judgment of the circuit court thereon, that there was no such record, said: This case comes up on several exceptions to opinions of the court given upon the trial; the first of which was to the allowing an instrument of writing to be given in evidence, with parol proof as to the time, manner and circumstances of its execution, as not proving a joint assumpsit by the appellants, such as is stated in the declaration. The matter of this exception suggests several questions, which were discussed at the bar: 1. Whether the signing of his name to the writing, without any other proof, made Shrewsbury a party thereto, and amounted to an assumpsit by him, jointly with Crawford and Gardner, to indemnify Jarrett, according to its terms? 2. If not, then whether parol proof, that he executed it with that intention avowed, was admissible? 3. If either of these questions are decided in the affirmative, then whether the paper upon its face states a consideration such as is alleged in the declaration? 4. If not, then whether such a consideration can be proved by parol evidence? 5. Whether the promises alleged, or any of them, are supported by the paper itself? for it is admitted, that if the promise was collateral, it cannot bind Gardner and Shrewsbury, unless it be found in the writing. And lastly, whether the promise be not original and equally binding on all for the same consideration? Of these questions, the first, third and fifth are the most important: if they are decided in the affirmative, the others will be thereby superseded.

As to those three points: It is true, that parol evidence cannot be admitted (unless in case of fraud or mistake) to vary, contradict, add to, or explain, the terms of a written agreement, by proving that the agreement of the parties was different from what it appears by the writing to have been. Yet, in case of equivocal agreements in writing, the circumstances under which they were made, may be given in 637 *evidence, to explain their meaning;

of which there are many examples in the books; as in ex parte Aduey, 2 Cowp. 460, and in the judgment of the chancellor reversing that of the master of the rolls in Bellamy v. Burrow, Ca. Temp. Talbot, 107. In this case, on the day and at the place of sale of the property taken under Crawford's executions, the instrument in question was prepared, reciting the levy of the executions, and that the sale of the property was forbidden by certain persons, and binding Crawford as principal, and Gardner as his surety, to indemnify the constable according to law, and was executed and delivered to the constable by those persons, and by Shrewsbury, who was not named in it, but who signed it, as a party. These circumstances, in connexion with the terms of the instrument, I think, prove without any other evidence to that effect, that Shrewsbury intended to bind himself, jointly with the others, for its performance, to the full extent to which they were bound; and that they were bound to indemnify the constable, not for what was past, (the seizure of the property under the executions, for that was not unlawful) but for selling and disposing of the property under the executions, and paying Crawford the proceeds of the sale to the amount of his executions; and this was the consideration of the agreement to indemnify him against such a disposition, as is alleged in the declaration.

The next exception is to the admission of the record of a judgment recovered by Alderson and Slack against Jarrett, as evidence, upon the allegation that there was a variance between it and the judgment described in the declaration. All the special counts in the declaration under which it was possible to offer in evidence, any judgment by those parties against Jarrett, describe it as one recovered upon the sole ground of the sale of the property of Wood and Brown, taken under Crawford's executions, without paying to them the arrears of rent due to them from the debtors in those executions; which arrears amounted to 1068 dollars. The record offered in 638 evidence, contained *a declaration of one count only, and claimed damages against Jarrett, not only for removing the property of Wood and Brown, taken under Crawford's executions without paying the arrears of rent, but for selling other property of other persons also tenants, which he as constable had taken by order of the plaintiffs as a distress for the satisfaction of the arrears of rent, and paying the proceeds of that also to Crawford, in satisfaction of his executions. The jury found a verdict, and the court gave judgment, upon that declaration for 1163 dollars and costs; and the damages must be taken to have been given upon both the complaints set forth in the declaration. Consequently, the judgment given in evidence, was not such as was alleged by the declaration in this case. It is possible, and indeed seems to be indicated by the fact of the amount of the verdict corresponding with the amount of the arrears of rent and interest thereon, that the court and jury proceeded upon the ground, that an officer taking goods, to however small a value, under execution, found upon demised premises upon which arrears of rent were due, and removing them without the payment of the arrears to the landlord, was responsible for the whole amount of the rent in arrear, though the value of the goods so taken and removed did not amount to a hundredth part of the amount of the rent. If so, the decision was palpably wrong. It is impossible to give such an effect to the statute, under which alone the landlord can assert a claim in such a case; and it is settled by authority, that the officer is only liable to the amount of the sales of the goods so removed and sold. Henchett v. Kimpson, 2 Wils. 140. We cannot presume, that any such error entered into those proceedings, unless it appeared explicitly on the record. The judgment offered ought not to have been allowed to be given in evidence; the consequence of which was to charge the appellants with damages to the amount of that recovery against Jarrett, in consequence of their engagement to indemnify him for the sale of four oxen and a cart.

639 *The next exception, in relation to the admission of the sheriff's receipts to Jarrett, is of no consequence; since the question presented could have no proper effect upon the result of the cause; the judgment against Jarrett, having the same effect, as proof that he was damnedified, whether he had paid it or not.

The last exception is to the refusal of the court, to admit the evidence offered by the defendants to prove the value of the property taken and sold under Crawford's executions. The bill of exceptions states no facts, upon which this question turned; and though we see them in the other exceptions, we cannot notice them in considering this, as has been repeatedly decided. If such evidence, under all circumstances that could exist would be proper evidence for the defendant, then the evidence was improperly excluded; but if it might be proper evidence under some and not under other circumstances, we cannot say that the rejection of it in this case, was wrong, upon any thing appearing in this bill of exceptions. Now, such evidence might be proper or improper, according to varying circumstances: if for instance, the plaintiff in this case, had produced a record, shewing that the recovery against him was solely on account of the estimated value of the property sold under Crawford's executions, and for the sale of which the defendants were bound to indemnify him, the real value could not have been given in evidence to contradict the verdict against Jarrett, however extravagant it might have been in the estimate of the value of the property; for that would be still the real amount of the damages, against which the defendants contracted to indemnify him. But, if the declaration had been so framed as to describe the record in the suit against Jarrett, and it had appeared that the aggregate damages given against him, was partly for removing the property taken under the executions and partly for the improper disposition of the other property distrained for the rent; then, evidence of the value of the property sold under the executions would not only have been proper on 640 the part *of the defendants, but indispensably necessary on the part of the plaintiff, in order to separate that portion of the damages given on account of the property sold under the executions, in respect to which the defendants were bound to indemnify him, from that portion given on account of the other property, as to which the defendant was under no such obligation. Or, if it had appeared, that the whole amount of the arrears of rent and interest on them, had been adopted by the court and jury, as the measure of the damages given against Jarrett, without regard to the value of either description of the property; then, a question would have arisen (as it would, if it appeared that no wrong had been done by Jarrett to the landlord, but by the taking of property under the executions) whether evidence of the value of the property so taken, would or would not be proper in that case? a question which the court declines to give any opinion upon now, because it is not presented by the exception. And, for the same reason, we decline to give any opinion upon other points that have been discussed; such as the effect of the judgment against Jarrett, as against the appellants.

CARR, J. This case has been so fully investigated by my brother Green, and I agree with him so exactly in the general current of his remarks, that I shall be very brief: indeed, I should say nothing, but to exclude a conclusion, as to a particular point, which might follow from my silence. I think the written promise of indemnity, with the parol evidence of the time and manner of its execution and delivery, was properly admitted under the declaration; and that Shrewsbury was bound by that written promise. With respect to the record of a recovery by Alderson and Slack against Jarrett, offered as evidence by the plaintiffs, and objected to, and that objection overruled; I am clearly of opinion, that the court erred in admitting that record, because it differed, in a very material point, from the record described in the declaration; and on this point I con-

641 cur *that the judgment must be reversed, and the case sent back with proper directions. As this record is excluded, I do not think it necessary to the decision of this case, that the court should pronounce upon the weight, effect and conclusiveness of it, in case it had been so described by the declaration as to have made it evidence. And this is the point on which I wish to declare (not that I differ with my brother Green, for my impression is that he is right, but) that I have not so examined the question, as to have made up an opinion on it: and as we are but a court of three, and are just at the busy close of a long session, I have thought it best to leave this point open for future discussion, so far as this case may have a bearing upon it. As to the other points upon the subsequent exceptions, I think with judge Green.

BROOKE, P., concurred with the other judges, in the judgment that was entered; which was to the following effect: That the circuit court erred in allowing the record mentioned in the second bill of exceptions, to go as evidence to the jury, there being a material variance between that and the record described in the first three counts of the declaration; and that the judgment is erroneous: therefore, it is considered that the same be reversed &c. and it is ordered, that the verdict be set aside, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, for a new trial to be had therein, in which the said record is not to be allowed to be given in evidence, if offered.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Decrees by Default—Reversal.—Decree in chancery, upon default of defendants, though they are not in contempt upon any proper process, reversed for this irregularity.

Administrators—Official Bonds—Form—Failure to Conform to Statute—Effect.—Bond with surety taken from an administrator with will annexed, with condition, not in form prescribed by law for official bond of administrator with will annexed, but in form prescribed for an administrator, and not exactly conforming even to that: HELD, this is not a good statutory bond, and no suit, either at law or in equity, can be maintained against the surety, for the benefit or at the relation of a legatee.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Quere.—Whether such a bond be good as a common law bond, for the indemnity of the justices to whom it was given?

Wills—Bequest to "Next of Kin" Subject to Appointment—Failure to Appoint—Effect.—Testator bequeaths his personal estate to his brother J. to be sold, form to law, and did not extend to the liability asserted."

And in Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 330, 331, 332, 333, it is said that the principal case did not decide that the bond under consideration was void and invalid for any purpose provided for in the condition; but that the decision and opinion of JUDGE GREEN was carefully restricted to the case of the legatee suing, and for whom no provision had been made.

In this case (Gibson v. Beckham), it was held that where a court or officer has authority or capacity to take a bond and makes a mistake by omitting some condition prescribed, or inserting a condition not authorized or illegal, unless the statute by express words, or necessary implication, makes it wholly void, a bond is not void; and it may be sued on, as far as the conditions are good, as a statutory bond.

The review and explanation of the principal case and Roberts v. Colvin, 3 Gratt. 358, made by JUDGE ALLEN, in Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 321, is approved in Reed v. Hedges, 16 W. Va. 206.

In Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54, after the death of an executor who had qualified as such, administration was committed to an administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. but the bond was in the form prescribed for administration d. b. n. Instead of administration d. b. n. c. t. a. The form of the bond adopted contained a condition for the benefit of creditors and creditors were suing; but the court held, on the authority of the principal case (pp. 75, 79), that the bond was void and the sureties not bound by it.

But see foot-note to Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54, where it is shown that in Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 331 et seq., the court disapproved the broad proposition laid down in Morrow v. Peyton, that a bond not conforming to the requisitions of the statute is void to all purposes, saying the decision was based on a hasty consideration and misconception of the decision of the principal case; and that if the court has not been misled by the mistake as to the effect of the decision of the principal case, they would not have decided that such a bond was void entirely and the sureties not bound by it.

See principal case also cited in State v. Purcell, 31 W. Va. 67, 5 S. E. Rep. 318; foot-note to Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Gratt. 54, which quotes at length from Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 321.

Wills—Bequest to "Next of Kin" Subject to Appointment—Failure to Appoint—Effect.—In Milhollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 568, it is said: "In the case of Frazier v. Frazier's Ex'rs, 2 Leigh 642, the syllabus says: 'the testator bequeathed his personal estate to his brother, J., to be sold, and the proceeds to be distributed by the brother among testator's next of kin, according to their deserts, as he should see at a future time, what may turn up; the brother dies without making an appointment. HELD, that the testator is to be regarded as intestate quoad this subject; and the same is distributable among the next of kin according to law.' The court however says nothing on the subject. The property was held to be distributable among the next of kin, I presume, not because the testator was to be regarded as dying intestate as to it, but because it was either a trust or a power in the nature of a trust, which being unexecuted, the property must go to the next of kin of the testator, as the legatees under the will."

In Fontaine v. Thompson, 80 Va. 229, 232, a testatrix devised her estate to a trustee to be distributed among her "next of kin who may be needy," in such proportions and at such times as in the opinion of the trustee (who was also made executor) might be best. The trustee did not qualify and died; and the administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. brought suit to construe the will. In delivering the opinion of the court, LACY, J., said: "There is certainly no reason why the devise should be held to be void on the ground of the uncertainty of the class which is to take. The distribution is to be

*Decree by Default.—See generally, monographic note on "Decrees" appended to Evans v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

Administrators—Official Bond—Failure to Conform to Statute—Effect.—In Roberts v. Colvin, 3 Gratt. 359, 363, it was held, on the authority of the principal case, that where an administration bond does not conform to the requisitions of the statute, and contains no provision for the benefit of creditors, no decree can be rendered in their favor against the sureties therein.

In Monteith v. Com., 15 Gratt. 187, it is said: "The cases of Frazier v. Frazier's Ex'ors, 2 Leigh 642, and Roberts v. Colvin, 3 Gratt. 358, merely decide that the parties could not be charged beyond the stipulations of their contract. The bonds did not con-and the proceeds to be distributed by the brother among testator's next of kin, according to their deserts, as he should see at a future time what may turn up; the brother dies without making any appointment: HELD, the testator is to be regarded as intestate quoad this subject, and the same is distributable among his next of kin according to law.

Lapsed Legacies Fall in Residuum—Rule Inapplicable to Residuary Legacies.—Case at Bar.—Testator bequeaths residuum of his estate to the four children of a deceased brother; two of the legatees die before testator, whereby the intended legacy of the moiety of the residuum to those two lapses: HELD, this moiety does not go to the two residuary legatees that survived testator, but as to it he was intestate, and it is distributable among his next of kin according to law.

Same—Same.—The rule, that all legacies which fail by lapse or otherwise, fall into the residuum and go to the residuary legatees, applies to specific or among her next of kin: that much is distinct and clear enough; the persons to be benefited are the most needy in that class (designated as her next of kin), according to the opinion of the trustee. If the persons to be selected out of this class cannot be determined for any cause, then the selected persons will not take, because they are unknown; but the class being clearly and distinctly designated, out of which the selection was to be made, there is no reason why the devise should be declared void as to the class, although it might be void as to the person to be selected out of the class, because of uncertainty. The courts have passed upon these words, 'the most needy,' or their equivalent, in cases which we have examined, and they do not seem to have taken the same view of the question in every case. In Frazier v. Frazier, 2 Leigh 642, this court held the words 'to be distributed by the brother among the next of kin, according to their deserts, as he should see at a future time what may turn up,' to pass no estate, and the testator to be regarded intestate as to this subject. This case was decided in 1881. In 1880, the supreme court of errors of Connecticut, in the case of Bull v. Bull, 8 Conn. 47, took what seems to be an opposite view, holding that 'it can be ascertained who are the most needy of the brothers and sisters and their children,' so stating a similar devise in that case as in this." Continuing, JUDGE LACY shows that the case of Hill v. Bowman, 7 Leigh 650, does not overrule the principal case, as contended by counsel, and says that, in the principal case, while the devise was for the benefit of the testator's next of kin, to be selected by a rule held to be too uncertain and void, the devise was in effect sustained as to the class ascertained and certain, to wit, the next of kin.

In discussing the effect of a power of appointment remaining unexecuted, Thrasher v. Ballard, 35 W. Va. 580, 14 S. E. Rep. 234, cites the principal case.

Will—Devise to Several Devisees—Death of One Devisee before Testator—Effect.—In Hoke v. Hoke, 12 W. Va. 467, it is said: "As we have seen where the devise of real estate is to a plurality of devisees or legatees jointly, and one of them dies before the testator, his share will not lapse, but ordinarily, the devise shall enure to the surviving devisees, except where the will otherwise directs, and except as hereinafter qualified. 2d Ed. of Minor's Institutes, vol. 2, p. 947. William Green's Exposition, Wythe's R. p. 361, and authorities cited in notes. 3d vol. of Lomax Digest, 2d Ed. page 186, note 2; 2d vol. Lomax on Executors, 2d Ed. page 106, note 3. In the case of Frazier, etc., v. Frazier's Ex'or, etc., 2 Leigh 642, it might be understood from the syllabus and statement of the case by the reporter, that the devise of James Frazier by his will to four of the children of his brother Samuel, who was dead, was a devise to them in joint tenancy, but it will be seen by reference to the opinion of the court delivered by JUDGE GREEN that the devise to said four children was a devise to them as tenants in common. It would seem that the manner this case is reported may have misled JUDGE TUCKER into the views expressed by him on the subject in the 1st vol. 2d book of his Commentaries, published in 1836, page 298, as he cites that case as supporting his views."

The general doctrine at common law is, that a devise lapses in all cases where the devisee dies before the testator, and if the devise be to several, as tenants in common, and one of them dies in the testator's lifetime, his share lapses. Furbree v. Furbree, 49 W. Va. 191, 38 S. E. Rep. 515, citing principal case.

pecuniary legacies, but not to the subject of the residuary legacy itself.

Chancery Practice—Evidence—Record in Another Chancery Suit.—In a suit in chancery, the defendants are in default; yet the record, or proceedings in another suit inter alios, is not competent evidence against them.

This was an appeal from a decree of the superior court of chancery of Staunton.

The proceedings in the court of chancery were very irregular. The subpoena was in the names of Hugh Paul and James Coursey executors of John W. Frazier deceased, plaintiffs, against James Frazier executor of James Frazier deceased, William Hillis father and next friend of Eliza Hillis, and George Coiner, defendants. This subpoena was returned "executed on Frazier's executor; Coiner, the other defendant, 643 not an inhabitant of the state." *The bill was exhibited by Paul and Coursey executors of John W. Frazier, and Eliza Hillis, an infant, by W. Hillis, her father and next friend, plaintiffs, against James Frazier administrator with the will annexed of James Frazier and executor of John Frazier, and G. Coiner. The defendants, not appearing to answer the bill, there was a decree nisi entered, in the names of the plaintiffs in the bill, against James Frazier executor of James Frazier and G. Coiner (though Coiner had not been served with the subpoena). This decree nisi was served on both the defendants; and they still failing to appear and answer, there was a decree against them by default; and this decree was entered not as between the parties named in the decree nisi, but as between the parties named in the bill. Thus, the parties named in the bill, and between whom the final decree was made, were different from the parties named in the process, that is, the subpoena and the decree nisi; the parties named in the decree nisi were different from those named in the subpoena; and the subpoena not having been served on the defendant Coiner, no such decree nisi could regularly have been entered against him.

The bill set forth, that John Frazier died in 1809, leaving a will, whereby he bequeathed one moiety of the personal estate to his brother James, and the other to the children of his deceased brother Samuel, namely, James, Samuel, Bella and John W. Frazier, and appointed his brother James his executor, who proved the will and took upon himself the executorship, but never made any distribution of the estate among the legatees. That James Frazier, the executor of John, died in 1814, leaving a will made in 1810, whereby he bequeathed the residuum of his estate to be sold, and the proceeds to be equally divided among the above named children of his deceased brother Samuel, viz. James, Samuel, Bella

Legatees—Suit to Settle Decedent's Estate—Parties.—Legatees or distributees may maintain a suit in equity to settle the decedent's estate, but they cannot have a decree for distribution among them without making the personal representative of the decedent a party. To this effect, the principal case is cited in Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 80, 95, and foot-note. Robertson v. Gillenwaters, 25 Va. 118, 7 S. E. Rep. 371, and foot-note to Moring v. Lucas, 4 Call 877.

and John W. Frazier; and administration of this testator's estate with his will annexed was granted to another James Frazier, a distant relative, who gave an administration bond, wherein George 644 Coiner *was his surety. That the legatees Samuel and Bella Frazier named in the will of the testator James, died before that testator, so that the legacies bequeathed by his will to them, lapsed, and the legatees, James and John W. Frazier, became entitled to the whole residuum of that testator's estate. That Bella Frazier died the wife of William Hillis, and leaving one child, the plaintiff Eliza Hillis, to whom her father had relinquished all claim he might have. That John W. Frazier was also dead, and the plaintiffs Paul and Coursey were his executors. That, in a suit, which had been brought by James Frazier, the son of Samuel the elder, against James Frazier the administrator with the will annexed of the testator James, it became necessary to ascertain the amount in his hands, as administrator of the testator James, and as executor of the first named testator John, in which character he had possessed himself of some of the assets of John's estate that had not come to the hands of his testator James in his lifetime; and it was ascertained by an account taken in that cause, that James Frazier (the administrator &c.) had in his hands in August 1815, the sum of 963 dollars of his testator James's estate, and in August 1816, the sum of 365 dollars of the first named testator John's estate. That the plaintiffs, executors of John W. Frazier, were entitled to a moiety of the 963 dollars of the testator James's estate; and that the 365 dollars of the testator John's estate, belonged to the plaintiffs executors of John W. Frazier, to his brother the legatee James Frazier, and to the plaintiff Eliza Hillis, in equal shares. The bill made James Frazier the administrator of the testator James, and as executor of the testator John, and George Coiner, the surety in his administration bond, parties defendants; and prayed a decree for the money, with interest, claimed by the bill as due to the plaintiffs respectively, and general relief.

There were exhibited with the bill, 1. the will of the first named testator; 2. the will of the testator, James Frazier; and 3. the account taken in the suit brought by James Frazier the younger, mentioned and referred to in the bill.

645 *1. The will of John Frazier, after devising his real estate, contained the following bequest: "In respect to my personal estate, I leave it to the management of my brother James: which property consist of cows, horses and hogs, and perhaps some household furniture, together with notes and bonds; and that he shall see all the debts of my estate punctually paid; and that he make public sale of said estate, and at a future day make a distribution among the legatees of my personal estate, according to their merit or deserts, as he may see at a future day what time may turn up; and he may call in his nephew Samuel Frazier as his assistant in this business." The phrase "among the legatees of my personal estate," referred to the testator's next of kin; for the will named no such legatees. James Frazier the brother, never executed the power of appointment.

2. In the will of the testator James Frazier, there was the following residuary clause: "all the residue of my estate, be it of what kind soever, I desire may be sold by my executor (after my wife's death) and the proceeds of such sale, after paying my just debts, legacies, and funeral charges &c. to be equal divided among all my brother Samuel Frazier's children, to wit, John W., James, Samuel, and Bella Frazier, which I give to them and their heirs forever."

3. The account taken in James Frazier's suit, shewed a balance in the hands of the defendant James Frazier, of his testator James's estate, of 963 dollars, bearing interest from August 1815, and a balance in the same defendant's hands, belonging to the first named testator John's estate, of 365 dollars, bearing interest from August 1816. But the defendant James Frazier was not executor of the testator John.

The bond given by the defendant Frazier, with Coiner as his surety, for the due administration of the estate of the testator James Frazier with his will annexed, was exhibited. It was dated the 27th June 1814. And the condition of it was, "That if the above bound James Frazier administrator with the will annexed of all the goods, 646 chattels and credits of James Frazier deceased, do make or cause to be made a true and perfect inventory of all and singular the goods, chattels and credits of the said deceased, which have or shall come to the hands, possession or knowledge of him the said James Frazier, or to the hands or possession of any other person or persons for him; and the same so made do exhibit, or cause to be exhibited, to the county court of Augusta, at such time as he shall be thereunto required by the said court; and the same goods, chattels and credits, and all other the goods, chattels and credits of the said deceased, at the time of his death, which at any time after shall come to the hands or possession of the said James Frazier, or into the hands or possession of any other person or persons for him, do well and truly administer according to law; and further, do make a just and true account of all his actings and doings therein, when thereto required by the said court; and all the rest and residue of the said goods, chattels and credits, which shall be found remaining upon the said administration account, the same being first examined and allowed by the justices of the court for the time being, shall deliver or pay unto such person or persons, respectively [as the said justices by their order or judgment shall direct, pursuant to the laws in that case made and provided]; and if it shall hereafter appear, that any last will and testament was made by the said deceased, and the executor or executors therein named do exhibit the same into the said court, making request to have it allowed and approved accordingly, if the same James Frazier, being thereunto required, do render and deliver up his letters of administration, approbation of such testament being had and made in the said court; then this obligation to be void and of no effect, or else to remain in full force and virtue.'''

647 *The chancellor's decree (taking the bill pro confesso on the default of the defendants) was, that the defendants Frazier and Coiner should pay to the plaintiffs executors of John W. Frazier, one half of the 963 dollars of the testator James's state, and one third of the 365 dollars of the first named testator John's estate, and to the plaintiff Eliza Hillis, one third of the same 365 dollars, with interest &c.

The defendants applied to this court, by petition, for an appeal from the decree, which was allowed them.

Johnson for the appellants: Stanard for the appellees.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The decree is liable to many well founded objections. It is a decree by default against parties who were not in contempt by any proper process. Neither the subpoena nor the decree nisi required the defendants to answer any such bill as was in fact exhibited; and the parties named in the decree nisi are different from those between whom the decree was made. There are variances at every step of the proceedings. No such decree nisi could regularly be entered against Coiner; though, upon the return that he was not an inhabitant of the state, a decree nisi with an order of publication, might have been entered, if the proceedings had been in other respects regular. If there were no other objections to the decree, the irregularities in the process would be sufficient to reverse it.

648 *The next objection is, that the bond, upon which the decree is founded against Coiner, as the surety of the other defendant, does not conform, in substance, to that prescribed by the statute, for the official bond of an administrator with the will annexed. It was intended to be in the form of that prescribed for an administrator, but it does not even conform to that. The form of the condition of the bond, is that given by the act of 1711, which was altered by the act of 1785, and retained as altered, in all the subsequent revisions. The stipulation to administer the goods &c. according to law, found in this bond, and which is found also in the forms prescribed by law, for the bonds of both executors and administrators with the will annexed, and other administrators, does not embrace the surplus assets payable to legatees or distributees, but only extends to receipts and disbursements made in the expenses of the administration and the payment of debts. If it went further, and embraced that surplus, there would have been no necessity or propriety in making any difference in the form of the stipulations of the bonds in respect to its disposition, and to provide (as the statute does, in the bond of an executor or administrator with the will annexed) that the balance upon the account of the administration, remaining unadministered, shall be paid and delivered in satisfaction of legacies given by the will, as far as the goods, chattels and credits will extend according to the value thereof, and as the law shall charge; and, in the case of an administration, "to such person or persons respectively as are entitled to the same by law." The bond in this case, though it may be good as a common law bond, for the indemnity of the justices to whom it was given, (as to which I give no opinion,) is not a statutory bond, upon which any suit at law or in equity can be maintained for the benefit, and at the relation, of a legatee. And, therefore, the bill ought to be dismissed as to the appellant Coiner.

The appellant Frazier is, however, responsible to the legatees for the surplus assets of James Frazier his testator 649 *in his hands, independently of the bond. But he was not responsible to the legatees of John Frazier, for the assets of his estate which came to his hands. As to them he was executor de son tort, and as such liable to John Frazier's creditors at law, but not to legatees in equity, without setting up an administrator de bonis non, and making him a party; for, otherwise, a recovery by them would not protect him from the demand of any subsequent administrator de bonis non, as he would be protected by the recovery of a creditor. Edlows v. Deane, Bunb. 36, cited in Wernick v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 75.

But even if he was responsible in respect to the assets in his hands of John Frazier, in this suit, the principle upon which that fund was distributed by the decree is erroneous. John Frazier died intestate in respect to that fund; and his surviving brother was entitled to a moiety of it, as a part of his general assets, and the four children of his deceased brother Samuel, to the other moiety; two of whom having since died, one of them intestate and unmarried, that moiety was equally distributable between his surviving brother, and the representatives of his deceased brother and sister, respectively.

The residuary assets of James Frazier (in which is included a moiety of the residue of John Frazier's assets) was also distributed by the decree, upon mistaken principles, which excluded the infant party from any participation in it. James Frazier bequeathed the residue of his estate to the four children of his brother Samuel (who was dead) as tenants in common. Two of them died in the lifetime of this testator; one of them leaving issue. The consequence was, that as to a moiety of that residue, the residuary legacy lapsed; as to it the testator was intestate; and it was distributable among his next of kin, his two surviving nephews, and the proper representative of his deceased niece, who was entitled to one-third of that moiety so lapsed. But the whole has been equally divided between the two surviving nephews, upon the ground, I suppose, of the 650 general rule, *that all legacies failing by lapse or otherwise, fall into the residuum, and pass to the residuary legatees; which is true, in respect to all specific or pecuniary legacies, but not as to the subject of the residuary legacy itself; for, if any part of that fails to take effect, by lapse or otherwise, it becomes so far an intestacy, and goes to the next of kin as undisposed of.

*This condition follows the form of the condition of an administrator's bond, which was prescribed by the act of 1711, ch. 2, § 12, 4 Hen. stat. at large, p. 19, but being applied, in this case, to the obligation of an administrator with the will annexed, for which the form was not intended, it is, of course, variant from the form given in that statute.

The form of the condition of the bond of an executor, and of an administrator with the will annexed, was also prescribed by the same statute: Id. ibid.

The form for the condition of an administrator's bond, was altered by the statute of 1785, ch. 61, § 29, which instead of the words in the form of the statute of 1711, requiring the administrator to deliver and pay the estate of the deceased, to such person or persons, respectively, "as the justices by their order shall direct, pursuant to the laws in that case made and provided," requires him to deliver and pay the same to such person or persons, respectively "as are entitled to the same by law." See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 86, p. 883.—Note in Original Edition.

There is yet another error in these proceedings: the admitting in evidence against the appellants, and taking as the foundation of the decree, the record of another cause, to which the plaintiffs in this suit were neither parties nor privies.

The decree must be reversed; the bill dismissed with costs as to Coiner, and the cause remanded with directions to send it to the rules, with leave to the plaintiffs to amend their bill, if they shall be advised to do so; and to be further proceeded in there.

Rootes v. Stone.

(Absent COALTER, J., and BROOKE, P.)

Attorney and Client—Negligence—Liability—Interest.*
—An attorney at law is employed to collect debts.

Fiduciaries—Loss of Debt through Negligence—Liability for Interest.—To the point that, independent of statute, in Virginia, executors and other fiduciaries are not held liable for interest upon debts lost by their negligence or other misconduct, the principal case was cited in Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. 382, 383. But, in this case (Chapman v. Shepherd) it was held that where executors fall by their negligence to collect a debt due to their testator by a bond under a penalty, the debtor being good for the money at the death of the testator and continuing good for it for fourteen years, when he failed, the executors are chargeable with the principal and interest thereon up to the time of the failure of the debtor but that they are not chargeable with interest after that time. JUDGE STAPLES, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, p. 385: "The rule of law which exempts a fiduciary from the payment of interest upon a debt lost through his default, is a hard one, and has been remedied by statute (for statute, see below.) Neither sound policy, nor any well-settled principle, requires that the court shall extend this exception to interest which was as easily collectable as the principal. It is supposed, however, that this is in conflict with Rootes v. Stone. A copy of the decree of this court in that case has been furnished by the counsel for the appellee. This decree charges the attorney with the debts lost by his negligence. But we have no means of ascertaining what these debts were. It may be that no interest had accrued upon them, or that by the form of the contract or the nature of the debt, the creditor was entitled to interest only from the date of the verdict of a jury. Upon these points the report of the case in 2 Leigh 650, furnishes no information. Indeed that report is too meagre and obscure to render the decision a conclusive authority upon this court, in determining the questions involved in the present case."

To the point that, where an attorney at law has lost debt by negligence he is liable for the principal of the debts, but not with interest thereon, the principal case was cited in Stearns v. Mason, 24 Gratt. 494.

But, by statute (Va. Code 1849, p. 548, ch. 132, § 6, Code 1867, § 3076), it is provided that if any fiduciary mentioned in the chapter, or any agent, or attorney at law, shall, by his negligence or improper conduct, lose any debt or other money, he shall be charged with the principal of what is so lost, and interest thereon, in like manner as if he had received such principal.

and some of them are lost to his client through his negligence: HELD, the attorney is chargeable for the principal of the debts so lost, but not with interest thereon.

On an appeal from a decree of the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, upon a bill exhibited by Stone against Rootes, shewing that Stone had placed a large number of bonds, notes, and other evidences of debts, in the hands of Rootes, for collection, as an attorney at law, and praying an account of Rootes's transactions in that agency; a question arose, whether Rootes ought to be charged with interest on the amount of some of the debts, which he might have collected with proper 651 diligence, but which were *wholly lost to his client through his negligence, and with which he was therefore held chargeable, or only with the principal of the debts so lost?

And, per curiam, he ought to be charged with the principal only.

November, 1830.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Indemnifying Bond—At Whose Relation Action Must Be Brought.—An indemnifying bond given to a sheriff, under statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 25, 26, can only be put in suit at the relation of the person having the legal title to the property taken in execution and sold by the sheriff, not at the relation of any person having an equitable right therein.

Hudson Kidd, by deed dated the 20th May 1820, and duly recorded the same day, conveyed sundry articles of personal property to Spottswood Garland, in trust, to secure a debt of 134 dollars due from Kidd to Whitehead & Co. An execution, sued out by James and William Garland against Kidd, was levied on the property mortgaged by the deed of trust, by Jacobs sheriff of Nelson; and James and William Garland with Spottswood Garland their surety, executed an indemnifying bond to Jacobs, to indemnify him for selling the property under the execution. Spottswood Garland the surety was (it seemed, though it was not expressly so stated in the record) the same person who was the trustee in Kidd's deed for the security of the debt to Whitehead & Co.

An action of debt (founded on the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 25, 26, p. 533, § 4,) was brought on this indemnifying bond, in the name of Jacobs the sheriff, at the relation and for the benefit of Whitehead & Co. against the *obligors 652 James, William and Spottswood Garland, in the circuit court of Nelson. The declaration was in the form approved by this court in the case of Carrington v. Anderson, 5 Munf. 32, with this peculiarity, that the declaration shewed, that the legal title of the property, which the bond was taken to indemnify the sheriff for selling, was not in Whitehead & Co. the relators, but in Spottswood Garland, under Kidd's deed of trust of May 1820. The defendants demurred generally to the declaration; and pleaded, that they had not broken the conditions of the bond, but had well and truly kept and performed the same; and an issue was made up on the plea. The court overruled the demurrer; and upon trial of the issue, the jury found for the plaintiff, and the court gave him judgment. The defendants appealed to this court.

Johnson for the appellants: Leigh for the appellee. The only question was that which arose on the demurrer to the declaration, Whether Whitehead & Co. not having the legal title of the property, but only an equitable interest therein, could prosecute a suit on the indemnifying bond, in the sheriff's name, at their relation and for their benefit?

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The objection taken by the appellant's counsel to the judgment, is perfectly well founded. The literal terms as well as the spirit of the statute, in force when the bond, upon which the action was brought, was executed, authorized no one to sue upon it but the person, who, if the statute had not been made, would have been capable of recovering in an action against the sheriff for the wrongful seizure and sale of the property taken in execution. To protect the sheriff against such action, by throwing the responsibility from him upon the plaintiff, was the sole purpose of the statute: and to extend it further, and to equitable rights or interests of any sort, which could not have been originally asserted in any action against the sheriff, would produce inextricable confusion, 653 *as was justly urged in the argument of the appellant's counsel. Besides, after the equitable claimant had recovered on the bond, the trustee upon the strength of his legal title, could recover the specific property from the purchaser under the sheriff's sale.

The judgment is to be reversed, the demurrer sustained, and judgment entered for the defendants.

Watts v. Cole and Wife and Others.

December, 1830.

Writ of Right—Infant Tenant—Objection in Appellate Court—Quære.—In a writ of right, the præcipe and count describe tenant as an infant: tenant appears, pleads, and defends himself by attorney, no guardian ad litem being assigned him; nor does it appear he came to full age pending the writ: verdict and judgment for demandants; tenant in person appeals to this court: Quære, whether he can object to the proceedings on account of his infancy here, or ought to have resorted to writ of error coram nobis?

Same—No Replication—Effect—Quære.—In a writ of right, there is a count and plea, in the statutory forms, but no replication: the assize is regularly charged to make recognition: verdict and judgment for demandants: Quære, whether the mise was joined by the count and plea, without a replication? and whether the irregularity was not cured by the verdict?

Same—Upon What Seizin Writ May Be Sustained?—Case at Bar.—S. W. tenant in tail, in 1752, covenants to stand seized to use of L. W. his then eldest son and his heirs, and his heirs, in fee simple; and then subjoins a covenant, that L. W. may immediately after his S. W.'s death enter upon and enjoy the land: L. W. died before S. W. who always continued in possession: Held, this conveyance worked no change in S. W.'s estate, but he continued seized of an estate tail as before it was made, and therefore, the limitation of the estate to L. W. after S. W.'s death, was void: neither did L. W. acquire any seizin in fact or in law, upon which a writ of right could be sustained.

This was a writ of right for 150 acres of land in the county of Elizabeth City, originally brought in the county court, in May 1817, by Cole and wife and others, heirs and devisees of Robert Bright, de- 654 mandants, against Watts, *infant son and devisee of Thomas Watts, tenant.

The præcipe, the count and the plea, were in the forms given by the statute for reforming the proceedings in writs of right, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 118, p. 463. But there was no replication to the plea; and though the præcipe and the count described the tenant as an infant, yet no guardian ad litem was assigned him, and he appeared and pleaded by attorney. The assize was charged to make recognition, in the statutory form; and it found a special verdict, upon which the county court gave judgment for the tenant. The demandants appealed to the circuit court. And there, at May term 1822, the following order was entered: "This day came the parties by their attorneys; and thereupon, the transcript of the record of the judgment aforesaid being seen and inspected, by consent of the parties it is considered by the court, that the judgment be reversed and annulled, and the special verdict in this cause set aside, and that a new trial be had of the issue joined, and that the cause be retained in this court for a trial to be had of the issue joined therein." Still, no guardian ad litem had been assigned for the infant tenant, nor was one afterwards assigned to him, nor was it suggested on the record that he attained to full age pending the suit.

Upon the trial in the circuit court, the assize found a special verdict, stating the following case:

That Thomas Watts, being seized in fee simple of the land in question, duly made and published his last will in April 1726, which was duly proved and recorded in 1727, and thereby devised the premises to his son Samuel Watts, in tail general, under which devise Samuel entered, and was seized in tail general accordingly.

may maintain a writ of right and says: "It remains but to observe that JUDGE GREEN, in Watts v. Cole and Wife, etc., has strongly expressed the contrary opinion; but as it was not a question in the cause, the case furnishes no authority. And yet he admits that a devise of a right of entry is good, and gives the right to sue in ejectment. Now a devise of a right of entry does not cast the freehold or possession on the devisee, as it does where the devisor is seized. The plaintiff in ejectment therefore must avail himself of the devisor's possession. And hence it seems to me, that if the devise of a right of entry gives the remedy by ejectment, the devise of the right of property carries along with it the power of maintaining a writ of right." To the point that in Virginia a devise of a right of entry may maintain ejectment, the principal case is also cited by TUCKER, P., in his opinion in Taylor v. Rightmire, 8 Leigh 478.

Seizin—Presumption by Court.—To the point that seizin cannot be presumed by the court, even if the jury have found facts from which they might have properly presumed it, the principal case is cited in Dawson v. Watkins, 2 Rob. 207.

Writ of Right—Who May Maintain.—In Taylor v. Rightmire, 8 Leigh 478. It was held that, in Virginia, a writ of right may be maintained by a devisee, upon the possession or seizin of his testator. In delivering his opinion, TUCKER, P., lays down the proposition that the devisee of a mere right of property

That Samuel Watts, being so seized in tail, by deed, dated the 16th September 1752, and acknowledged in court and recorded in April 1753, "conveyed the land to his [then eldest] son Littleton Watts, in fee simple;" which deed was found in hæc verba. This deed was in its form a feoffment, whereby Samuel Watts, in consideration of natural *love and affection for his son Littleton, and for his better advancement and preferment, gave, granted, enfeoffed and confirmed, the land to the son Littleton and his heirs: and there was a covenant subjoined to the conveying part of the deed, whereby the grantor "covenanted and agreed to and with Littleton, his heirs and assigns, that he and they should and might, immediately on the death of Samuel (the father and grantor) and thenceforth forever after, peaceably and quietly have, hold, occupy, possess and enjoy, the premises, free, clear and discharged, of and from all former and other gifts, grants, feoffments, jointures, dowers, and all other incumbrances whatsoever." No livery of seizin was found. Nor was it found, that Littleton, the son, was ever in possession.

That Littleton Watts, by deed of bargain and sale, dated the 2d December 1777, and duly recorded, "conveyed the same land in fee simple to Robert Bright;" which deed was also found in hæc verba. It was a deed of bargain and sale, the premises whereof, in consideration of £100. paid by Bright to Littleton Watts, conveyed the land (describing it as the same given him by his father's deed of September 1752) to Robert Bright and his heirs begotten by Mary Bright, the bargainor's sister; but the habendum was, "to have and to hold the same, immediately after the death of the said Littleton and Samuel his father, to the said Robert Bright and Mary his wife, until either of them should marry again, and then, to their heirs which should proceed from the said Robert and Mary;" and the said Littleton covenanted with the said Robert, "that he the said Robert and Mary his wife, immediately after the death of the said Littleton, and Samuel his father, might and should take full possession, have, hold, use, occupy, possess and enjoy, the premises, without let, suit, hindrance, disturbance or molestation of any person or persons whatsoever, until either of them should marry again, and then their heirs, which should proceed from the said Robert and Mary."

656 *That Samuel Watts, the grantor in the deed of September 1752, survived his son Littleton, the grantee therein, and died in 1797, having first duly made and published his last will, which was duly proved and recorded in 1798, whereby he devised the same premises, so before conveyed to his son Littleton in fee simple, to his [then eldest] son Thomas Watts in fee.

Under which devise, Thomas entered, and held possession until 1815, when he died, having first duly made his last will, which was duly proved and recorded, whereby he devised the premises to his son Thomas, the tenant in this action.

And it was found, that the demandants were the heirs at law and devisees of Robert Bright, to whom Littleton Watts conveyed the premises by the deed of December 1777; but it was not found, that they were also the heirs of Mary Bright therein mentioned, or which survived the other, Robert or his wife Mary.

The question referred by the verdict to the court, was, whether upon this state of facts, the law was for the demandants or for the tenant?

The circuit court held, that the law was for the demandants, and gave them judgment for the land; from which the tenant prayed an appeal to this court, and he himself executed the appeal bond.

The cause was argued here, by R. G. Scott for the appellant, and Johnson for the appellees.

I. Scott objected, that the proceedings were fatally irregular. 1. There was no replication to the plea, and so no mise joined; and though it may not be necessary, that the mise should be joined in the precise form given by the statute, yet it is necessary it should be in some way and in substance well joined. Taylor v. Houston, 2 Hen. & Munf. 161; Chichester v. Boggess, 5 Munf. 98; Green v. Bailey, Id. 246. 2. The tenant was described in the writ as an infant, and a guardian ad litem ought to have been *assigned him, before the count was filed (since matter might be pleaded for him that would abate the writ) or, at all events, before any rule was taken against him: he could only appear and plead by guardian, and not by attorney. If he attained to full age pending the suit, that should have been suggested on the record, and thenceforth he might have appeared and defended the action by attorney. 3 Bac. Abr. Infancy and Age, K. 2, p. 616, and seq.; Cole v. Pennell, 2 Rand. 174. But here, not only the infant tenant appeared and pleaded by attorney, but after trial and verdict, and judgment for him, in the county court, that judgment was reversed by the circuit court, upon consent of parties, the infant still appearing by attorney: but no one could give such consent for him. The writ of error coram nobis would have been his proper remedy, if the fact of infancy had not appeared on the record; but the tenant's infancy being affirmed by the demandants on the record, there was no question of fact to try. 9 Vin. Abr. Error, I. pl. 13, 18, I. 2, pl. 11, p. 488, 489, 491. It was error in law appearing on the record: therefore, the plaintiff's proper and only remedy was by appeal to this court. His appeal bond bound his surety, and even as to himself, it is not void, but only voidable; Walmsley v. Lindenberger, 2 Rand. 478.

Johnson answered, 1. that the want of a replication was wholly unimportant. The statute is not imperative, that the forms therein given shall be pursued; it provides, that the pleadings shall be in the forms given, or to the same effect. Snapp v. Spengler, ante, 1. The count and plea make a complete issue; an affirmation and negation of the right; and the plea prays, that recognition be made &c. so that the replication, which the statute gives the form of, is nothing but a similitur, the want of which is cured in this, as in all other cases, by the verdict. In Taylor v. Houston, the record stated, that the tenant put in the usual plea; but as there is no plea that can be called the usual plea, in such cases, and as the pleadings must be in writing, the court held, that for the want of a plea, there was no assize 658. joined. *In Chichester v. Boggess, the count was by two; the plea defended the right as to one only, and was held naught, because it was a departure. But in Turberville v. Long, 3 Hen. & Munf. 209, the record stated, that the demandant replied generally to the plea; and though there is no general replication in such cases, yet this was held good after verdict; which shews, that the want of a replication is immaterial. 2. As to the infancy of the tenant: it is true the præcipe and the count describe him as an infant; but he might have attained to full age before appearance and plea pleaded, and then it was right he should defend himself by attorney. And it is to be presumed the fact was so; for he appeared by attorney, and defended himself in the county court; he appeared by attorney in the circuit court, and consented to reverse the judgment of the county court; and he prayed this appeal in person, and executed the appeal bond. At all events, the writ of error coram nobis was his proper remedy; for the error complained of is, in its very nature, an error in fact; and if he had resorted to that remedy, and assigned his infancy as error, it might have been pleaded that he attained to full age pending the suit. But if the tenant must be taken to have been an infant in the court below, he is still an infant; he could not appeal; he could not give the appeal bond; he cannot appear here, as he does, by attorney; he must assign errors by guardian ad litem; he cannot assign error in law and error in fact at the same time. Frescobaldi v. Kinaston, 2 Stra. 783; Sheepshanks v. Lucas, 1 Burr. 410, 2 Bac. Abr. Error, K. 2, p. 487, 3 Id. Infancy and Age, I. 6, 607, K. 2, 616; Bingham on Infancy, 121, Coke's entries, 289.

II. Scott contended, that, upon the merits, the demandants shewed no right to the land. The deed made by Samuel Watts to his son Littleton in 1752, could not enure as a feoffment, for want of livery of seizin; it could only enure, possibly, as a covenant to stand seized to use; and then, it was a covenant by Samuel the father, tenant in tail to stand seized to the use of Littleton, his eldest son and *heir apparent in tail, after the covenantor's own death. This is the intent of the instrument clearly expressed; and why not also the effect of it? Taking it so, the estate tail continued in Samuel the father, unaffected by the conveyance: for, "where a tenant in tail limits an estate to commence after his own death, it is absolutely void, and he continues tenant in tail as before; because there, the issue in tail has a right paramount, per formam doni. Therefore, where tenant in tail covenanted, to stand seized to the use of himself for life, and after to the use of his eldest son and his heirs, it was resolved, that the son should not have the land by this covenant; for when the tenant in tail covenanted to stand seized to the use of himself for life, it was as much as he could lawfully do; the limitation over was void, and he was seized as before." 1 Cruise's Digest, Tit. II. Estate tail, ch. 2, § 13, 14, 15; 4 Id. Tit. XXXII, Deed, ch. 10, § 31. Then, Littleton Watts, never having had the seizin or possession of the land, his deed of bargain and sale to Bright and wife, passed nothing. Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call, 362; Tabb v. Baird, Id. 475; Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38. The deed to Bright and wife, was an attempt by Littleton Watts, to limit a future use to them upon his own future use, which had been limited by his father's deed to him, and which was yet unexecuted. However, this deed of Littleton Watts cannot be regarded as a conveyance to Bright alone, much less a conveyance to him in fee; it is a conveyance to Bright and his wife, until they or either of them shall marry, remainder to the heirs of their bodies begotten; that is their children, who could only take under this deed as purchasers under the bargainor; so that they cannot claim as heirs or devisees of Bright. And, whether they claim as heirs of Bright, or as purchasers under Littleton Watts, neither he nor Bright ever had seizin of the land, in any sense, upon which the demandants can maintain the writ of right. If the deed to Bright and wife could be regarded as conveying an estate of inheritance to them, it was a joint estate 660 tail special to them both; and *which ever survived took the whole; Thornton v. Thornton, 3 Rand. 179, and the statute of 1776, abolishing entails, gave the survivor a fee simple. Now, it is not found, that Bright survived his wife; and, therefore, the demandants, who are only found to be his heirs, have shewn no title.

Johnson. The effect of the deed of 1752, executed by Samuel Watts to his son Littleton, as well as the intent of it plainly expressed, was, to convey the land to Littleton, immediately, in fee simple, reserving to the father only the usufruct during his life. The deed may well operate as a feoffment; since, the jury find, that the estate was thereby conveyed to the son in fee, which finding includes the livery of seizin necessary to perfect the conveyance, and the court must intend that it was proved; and besides, the deed was duly recorded, which is tantamount to enrolling in England; and there, livery of seizin is not necessary, when the conveyance is by deed intended and enrolled; Shep. Touchs. 210. But, certainly, if the deed cannot enure as a feoffment, it may be, for that very reason, and (being to the grantor's son) is, good and effectual as a covenant to stand to use. Rowletts v. Daniel, 4 Munf. 473. Then, to say that this was a covenant by the father to stand seized to his own use for life, and after to the use of the son, instead of a direct immediate conveyance to the son, with a covenant that the father might enjoy the usufruct for life, would be to make the covenant subjoined to the conveyance the only operative part of it; to give an effect to that covenant, which would control all the conveying parts of the instrument, and defeat and render them wholly nugatory. Taking this as an immediate conveyance to the son in fee, reserving the usufruct to the father for life, in other words, giving the instrument the very effect its terms import; though, as the law was at the time, it would not have discontinued the estate tail, and prevented the heir in tail from entering as such after the tenant's death yet it conveyed all the grantor's estate out of him to the grantee, and gave him the legal seizin. Neither was the grantor's enjoyment of the usufruct, 661 *according to the covenant subjoined to the conveyance, at all incompatible with the title and seizin before conveyed to the grantee: the possession of the grantor was not adversary to the grantee. The deed was a conveyance by tenant in tail of the fee simple, at a time, indeed, when he had no right so to convey; but the statute of 1776, for abolishing entails, perfected the conveyance according to its intent; Orndoff v. Turman, ante, 200. There was nothing, then, to disable the grantee Littleton from making an effectual conveyance of the fee by deed of bargain and sale. Rowletts v. Daniel shews, that the possession by the covenantor to stand seized to use, he claiming only the usufruct for life, did not at all impede or impair the covenantee's power to convey the estate.

And he did convey it to Bright by his deed of December 1777; to Bright and the heirs of his body by Mary his then wife; an estate tail special, which the statute of 1776, converted into a fee simple in Bright. Bright was the purchaser; Bright paid the consideration of £100. and, accordingly, the premises of the deed import a conveyance to Bright and his heirs by Mary his wife. The habendum to Bright and his wife Mary till they marry, and then to the heirs of their bodies, can no more vary the effect of the premises, and convert the conveyance from one to Bright alone into a conveyance to Bright and his wife jointly, than it can change the conveyance of an estate of inheritance declared and effected by the premises, into an estate only till Bright or his wife should marry.

Littleton Watts had the seizin in law of the land in question; he conveyed the same seizin to Bright by his deed in 1777. And seizin in law is enough to maintain the writ of right.

Even supposing, that the deed of 1752, was only a deed of covenant by Samuel Watts, the tenant in tail to stand seized to the use of his son Littleton, after his own death; though such a conveyance exceeded the power of the tenant in tail, according to the law existing at its date, yet, 662 surely, *it no more exceeded his power, than an immediate alienation of the land in fee simple to a stranger, would have exceeded it. If the tenant in tail had aliened immediately in fee simple, the case of Orndoff v. Turman shews, that the statute for abolishing entails, would have perfected such a conveyance. Much more must the statute perfect a conveyance by a tenant in tail of the reversion in fee after his death. And it can hardly be doubted, that if one convey an estate to another in fee, reserving a life estate to himself, the grantee acquires a vested remainder expectant on the grantor's life, and has such a seizin thereof, that he may convey it by deed of bargain and sale. So that, in whatever light the deed of 1752, from Samuel Watts to his son Littleton, may be viewed, Littleton's conveyance to Bright is good and effectual; and the only question is as to the effect of that conveyance.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The deed from Samuel Watts to Littleton Watts cannot operate as a feoffment for the want of livery of seizin, which is not found by the jury, and could not be presumed by the court if the jury had found facts from which they might have properly presumed it. They have not however found any such fact; not even that the grantee entered and was seized according to the conveyance; nor could they have properly found any fact, from which they could have inferred the fact of livery of seizin; since, according to the terms of the deed, taking it all together, the grantee was not authorized to enter until after the death of the grantor. So that Littleton Watts never had any seizin, actual or legal. Nor could the deed operate as a deed of bargain and sale, for the want of a valuable consideration. But it might operate as a covenant to stand seized for the use of the grantee after the death of the grantor; the consideration expressed being perfectly appropriate to the support of such a conveyance; unless, indeed, the conveyance is liable to some other fatal objection, as I think it is.

663 *The laborious investigations imposed upon the court in Orndoff v. Turman, having taught me, that, at the time when this deed was made, our law in respect to estates tail and all their consequences, was the same as the english, except that an act of 1748 prohibited the docking of entails by fine or fines and recovery, as in England, and allowed them to be docked only by an act of assembly, or, in respect to estates of small value (of which this was probably one), by proceedings under a writ of ad quod damnum: that a conveyance in fee by tenant in tail, by covenant to stand seized to uses, with or without warranty, produced no discontinuance, but that it conveyed to the covenantee a base fee, which might be converted into a pure fee, by a fine and recovery in England, or writ of ad quod damnum or act of assembly here: and that if the tenant in tail, notwithstanding such a conveyance, continued seized, and, consequently, a good tenant to the præcipe (as he might be, if the covenant was, to stand seized to his own use for the life of another, and after the death of that other to the use of a third, in fee) and by any legal means docked the entails, with intent to vest the fee in himself or a stranger, the proceeding enured to the benefit of the first covenantee, and operated as a corroboration of the former conveyance, and made it indefeasible: and so, in respect to all charges and incumbrances imposed upon the estate by a tenant in tail. But if a tenant in tail covenant to stand seized to the use of himself for life, and afterwards of his heir apparent or a stranger in fee (which would be good in the case of a fee simple owner, Pybus v. Mitford, 2 Lev. 77,) it would operate no change in his estate, and he would be seized as of his former estate, and the remainder consequently utterly void: and if he afterwards docked the estate tail, by any lawful means effectual to bar his issue and those in remainder or reversion, and thereby settled the estate in fee in himself or a third person, that would be good, and would prevail against his first deed, which would not be set up and corroborated by docking the entail, as in the former case; 664 because in the first case the *deed is good and passes a base fee capable of being corroborated into a pure fee; and in the last, the deed is void, making no change in the estate, and incapable of being set up by the docking of the entail. This was the precise case, and so decided in Higham v. Bedingfield, Noy, 46, Cro. Eliz. 895, by the unanimous opinion of the court, and approved by Bacon in his law of uses, 111. See also Machell v. Clarke, 2 Ld. Raym. 779, 2 Salk. 619. The statute of 1776, converting this estate tail remaining in Samuel Watts to a fee simple, cannot have a greater effect, than docking such an estate in England, by fine and recovery, or here by a writ of ad quod damnum, would have had in favour of the covenantee Littleton Watts, and those claiming under him.

There is another fatal objection to the right of the demandants to recover in this case. If they claim as heirs, neither they nor their ancestor as whose heir they claim, have ever been seized in law or in fact of the premises in question; and without a seizin of the demandant or his ancestor in fact, by the actual possession and receipt of the esplees, by the common law, or a seizin in law, under our statutes, no writ of right can be maintained, even though some right may exist in the demandant. It is for this reason, that a writ of right cannot be maintained by a devisee, unless upon his own seizin; Co. Litt. 111, a. 240, b. 2 Scho. & Lef. 104, per Lord Redesdale in Saunders v. Ld. Annesley. If a right of entry is devisable under our statute of wills, as I think it is, though it is not in England (Goodright v. Forrester, 8 East, 552), the devisee can recover only in ejectment; and if the demandants claim as such, in a writ of right, they are not only incapable of maintaining the writ of right, but are barred of their ejectment by the statute of limitations.

The law being for the tenant on the special verdict, he may well waive the objection of infancy, and the failure to make up the issue: and the demandants have no interest in taking up the last of those objections, since they would gain 665 *nothing by it. We may, therefore, properly end this controversy, without noticing those objections, by entering a final judgment on the special verdict for the tenant.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

Gregory v. Baugh.

March, 1831.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Suit for Freedom—Proof of Pedigree—Hearsay Evidence.

Same—Onus Probandi When Plaintiff Proves Descent from American Indian.—Quære also, whether, if a person claiming freedom on the ground of indian descent in the maternal line, prove his descent from a native american indian female ancestor, the onus probandi lies on the defendant, to prove, that such female ancestor was brought into the country, at a time and under such circumstances that such indians might lawfully be enslaved, or on the plaintiff, to prove that such his ancestor was brought into the country, at a time and under such circumstances that she could not lawfully be enslaved? The court being divided on the point.

Same—Hearsay Evidence—Declarations Post Litem Motam—Case at Bar.—A woman named S. brought a suit for her freedom in 1772, and dying soon after, that proceeding was abated: some 25 or 30 years after, one W. an old person, informed her son, that S. was free, and her family, in consequence of their indian descent from the mother: in a suit brought by S.'s grandson to recover his freedom, W.'s son testifies to those declarations of his mother, as to the plaintiff's ancestor S. HELD, that this hearsay evidence in not objectionable on the ground, that the declarations of W. were made post litem motam: dissentiente BROOKE, P. Instructions—Erroneous Statement as to Matter in Depositions—Effect.—A circuit court, in a charge or instruction to a jury, states matter as being in a Boundaries—Evidence—Declarations of Deceased Person.—In Harriman v. Brown, 8 Leigh 712, JUDGE TUCKER said that he understood JUDGE BROOKE, in the principal case, to admit that, in our country, in cases of boundary, declarations of deceased persons must be admitted in evidence as to particular facts.

As to when the declarations of a deceased person is admissible in evidence to prove boundary, see foot-note to Harriman v. Brown, 8 Leigh 697.

Instructions—Weight of Evidence.—The Virginia authorities on the subject of instructing the jury upon the weight, effect and sufficiency of evidence evince a jealous care to watch over and protect the legitimate powers of the jury. They show, that the court must be very careful not to overstep the line, which separates law from fact. They establish the doctrine, that where parol evidence is submitted to a jury, any opinion as to its weight, effect or sufficiency, any assumption of a fact proved, or even an intimation, that written evidence states matters, which it does not state, will be an invasion of the province of the jury. Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 268, citing Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 88; Keel v. Herbert, 1 Wash. 203; Gregory v. Baugh, 2 Leigh 665; McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 405; State v. Hurst, 11 W. Va. 75; State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 740. To the same effect, the principal case was cited with approval in McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 403, 404; State v. Hurst, 11 W. Va. 75, 76.

And, in Whitelaw v. Whitelaw, 83 Va. 43, 1 S. E. Rep. 407, it is said: "However it may be elsewhere, in Virginia the courts have never indulged in the practice of making observations to the jury concerning the evidence. It is considered as encroaching too much upon the province of the jury. The jury, and not the court, are conclusively and uncontrollably the judges, whenever the question depends upon the weight of the testimony. The court responds to questions of law, the jury to questions of fact. The court instructs the jury upon questions of law, but the court cannot instruct the jury as to the weight of evidence, or the sufficiency of proof. The legitimate powers of the jury in this state have been maintained by many decided cases in this court, and the cases all seem to be the same way, and there has been but little difference of opinion among the judges. The cases show that the court must be very careful not to overstep the line which separates law from fact. These cases, from Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 90, down to Gregory v. Baugh, 2 Leigh 665, are cited by Mr. Conway Robinson in the first volume of his old Practice, p. 338, and the later cases by Mr. Barton in his Law Practice, p. 214. See, also, the late case of Cornett v. Rhudy, 80 Va. 710."

The principal case was also cited in Neill v. Rogers, etc., Co., 38 W. Va. 231, 18 S. E. Rep. 564, to the point that, if the question depends upon the weight of testimony, the jury, and not the court, are exclusively and uncontrollably the judges.

written deposition, and instructs the jury that that matter is legal evidence, but in point of fact no such matter is in the deposition: HELD, this was calculated to mislead the jury, and is error, for which the verdict should be set aside and the judgment upon it reversed.

This case, which was a suit in forma pauperis to recover freedom, brought in the circuit court of Chesterfield, by 666 *the appellee against the appellant, was before this court in 1827, when the court reversed a judgment and set aside a verdict rendered for the appellee, on the ground of misdirection of the circuit court to the jury at the trial, and remanded the cause for a new trial. See 4 Rand. 611. After several continuances in the circuit court, the new trial was had at June term 1829, upon which the jury again found for the appellee, that he was free, and the court gave him judgment accordingly. But the appellant filed three bills of exceptions to opinions of the court and instructions given to the jury at this trial, and appealed from the judgment to this court.

The bills of exceptions (disregarding some minor points that involved no principle) stated, in substance:

1. That the plaintiff offered in evidence the affidavit of William Clarke (which had been taken by consent, before the former trial, to be read in chief) who deposed, that the plaintiff was the son of Biddy, who was the daughter of Sybill, who lived with or belonged to Peter Ashbrooke, and who, it was understood, had brought a suit for her freedom; that he believed Sybill died while her suit was pending, without having recovered her freedom; that the affiant supposed he was between five and seven years old at the time of Sybill's death; and being interrogated, whether he had understood, that Biddy and her mother Sybill, were of indian descent, and what was the complexion and appearance of Biddy? he answered, that "he always understood they were descended from indians, and upon that ground, he understood, Sybill brought her suit; but whether it was from the mother's side or father's he was unable to say; and that Biddy had some appearance, in her looks and complexion, of an indian." The defendant objected to the reading of this affidavit. But the court overruled the objection, because the personal attendance of Clarke had been dispensed with by the consent of the parties to take his affidavit; and then instructed the jury, "that so much of the affidavit, as stated that the deponent had always understood

667 *that Sybill was an indian, might be received by them, as evidence tending to prove the general reputation of the neighbourhood, to have such weight as they might think it entitled to, but that the residue thereof was not legal evidence. To this opinion and instruction the defendant excepted.

2. The plaintiff offered in evidence the deposition of Littleberry West, taken in 1828, under a commission de bene esse, the witness being then above eighty three years old, infirm and incapable of attending at the trial. This deposition was taken in the form of question and answer, and was of the following tenor: "1. Question by plaintiff's agent: Did you ever know Sybill, or any of her family? if so, whom, and when and where? and what was her and their colour, appearance, condition, treatment? Ans. I know nothing about her or her family. 2. Were you connected with, or acquainted in, the family or families, in which Sybill, or any of her kindred lived? If so, how was Sybill, or her kin treated or regarded? as free or not? or entitled to freedom or not? and if entitled to freedom, why? because she was descended in the maternal line from indians, or from what other cause? Ans. I know nothing of the families. Was your father or mother, or any other of your ancestors, connected with the family or families in which Sybill or her kin lived? if so, how? if not, was your father or mother, or any other of your ancestors, well acquainted with the family or families in which Sybill or her kin lived, and residing in the same neighbourhood? if so, state what you have heard your father or mother or any of your ancestors say, concerning the general reputation in the family or families, or neighbourhood aforesaid, in relation to Sybill, or her kin, as free or not, or entitled to freedom or not? and if reputed to be entitled to her freedom, why? because she was descended from indians by the mother's side, or why else? Ans. My mother stated to me that Sybill was free, and her family, in consequence of their indian descent from the mother: my mother further stated,

668 *that they lived three years together, on a plantation belonging to one John Pride; it was also stated by the neighbours, that the said Sybill was free. 4. Have you ever heard, that Sybill or her kin were free, or reputed in the neighbourhood, where she or they lived, to be free? if so, when, from whom, and what? and why was she or her kin reputed to be entitled to freedom? Was it because she was an indian of the whole blood, or so reputed? or was it because her mother was an indian, or so reputed? Was Sybill reputed to have negro blood? if so, in what proportion? and how was she so reputed to have derived it, from the father or mother's side? Ans. I have heard my mother say, that Sybill's mother was an indian, and that Sybill herself was one, and was entitled to her freedom. 5. Have you ever heard of any male indians of Sybill's kin? if so, from whom, when, what? Ans. I have never heard that there was any male indian kin to Sybill. 6. Have you ever heard any thing of Sybill's mother? if so, from whom, when, what? Ans. Yes; she was an indian and free, as my mother stated to me. 7. Have you ever heard how and when Sybill came into the country? if so, from whom, when, what? Ans. I never did hear how Sybill came into the country. 8. State what your own age was, about the time you heard your mother make the above statements about Sybill? Ans. I must have been fifty or sixty years old." The plaintiff also offered in evidence, the transcript of an order made by the general court on the 13th October 1772, in these words: "On the motion of Sybill, who is detained in slavery by Joseph Ashbrooke of Chesterfield county, she is allowed to sue her master in forma pauperis, and Mr. Jefferson is assigned her counsel to prosecute the said suit: and it is ordered, that her master do not presume to misuse her on this account, and that he allow her to come &c. and attend &c." Whereupon, the defendant's counsel objected, that all the evidence contained in West's deposition was incompetent, because the statements made by Mrs. West, his mother, were made after the commencement of Sybill's suit in the 669 *general court; because her statement as to the mother of Sybill, appeared not to have been made from any knowledge she had of that person; and because the statement of the neighbourhood report of Sybill's right to freedom, was not legal evidence. But the court "instructed the jury, 1. that if it was proved, that Sybill was dead ten or fifteen years before the statements made by Mrs. West to the deponent her son, then her declaration, that she had lived on the same plantation with Sybill, that she was an indian woman, and had the appearance of an indian, was competent evidence, to have such weight as the jury might think it entitled to; but 2. that her declarations concerning Sybill's mother, and concerning the report of her right to freedom, were not competent evidence." To the first part of which instruction, the defendant excepted.

3. The plaintiff then adduced the testimony of several witnesses, tending to prove, that Sybill was the mother of Biddy, and Biddy the mother of the plaintiff, and that Sybill was a native american indian. Upon which the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if the plaintiff founded his right to freedom upon those facts, it was incumbent on him, in order to maintain the issue on his part, to prove that Sybill was brought into this country, at a time or under circumstances, which rendered it unlawful to enslave her. But the court refused to give that instruction; and instructed the jury, "that if they believed the evidence last mentioned, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the defendant should prove, that Sybill had been lawfully made a slave; which fact the jury might presume from the long time during which she and her posterity had been held in slavery, and other circumstances; but it was competent to the plaintiff to rebut that presumption, by proving the ignorance and helplessness of the plaintiff and his said ancestors, and other circumstances." To which opinion and instruction the defendant excepted.

Leigh, for the appellant. The circuit court told the jury, that so much of Clarke's affidavit as stated, "that he had 670 *always understood that Sybill was an indian," was to be regarded by them as evidence. But Clarke did not say that: he only deposed, "that he always understood, that Biddy and her mother Sybill were descended from indians, but whether from the mother's side or the father's he was unable to say." The difference is obvious. If what the judge attributed to the deponent, was his own inference from the evidence, the just effect or amount of it in his own opinion, he went beyond his province, and instructed the jury upon a mere question of fact. The circuit court told the jury too, that Mrs. West's declaration to her son, that Sybill was an indian, and had the appearance of an indian, was competent evidence; though the deponent West did not say, that his mother told him Sybill had the appearance of an indian. The difference is, that people are often called indians from the reputation of indian extraction, when from mixture with the european or (with us more commonly) the african race, all traces of the indian have disappeared; and so, hearsay evidence that a person was an indian, is not so strong as hearsay evidence that such a person had the appearance of an indian. The charge to the jury, in these particulars, was calculated to mislead them.

It is an established exception to the general rule which excludes hearsay evidence, general reputation, or tradition, that it is admissible to prove pedigree; but it is not admissible to prove the national character, the quality or the rights, of the ancestor from whom the pedigree is derived, or any other specific fact. Mima Queen v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch, 290; Davis v. Wood, 1 Wheat. 6. And the principle is supported by other american as well as by english authorities; 1 Stark. on Ev. (Boston ed. of 1828) part I., § 42, p. 63, note (d) and the cases there cited. There are cases, pauper cases, in this court, which seem otherwise; but it is doubtful, to say the least, whether, in those cases, the point was discussed, or carefully examined; and they were decided at a time when the judgments of the court seem to have been influenced by quite too strong a leaning in favorem 671 *libertatis (as the phrase was).

There is nothing peculiar in cases of this kind, to require a departure from the common law of evidence; nothing, surely, to justify the courts of justice in disregarding or altering them.

There is another fatal objection to the competency of the evidence of Clarke, as well as to that of the deponent West as to the declarations of his mother. It appears by computation, that those declarations of the mother were made to the son, sometime between 1795 and 1805, many years after the woman Sybill's death, indeed, but also after she had claimed her freedom, and proceedings had been instituted to recover it for her. And as to what Clarke says he understood concerning Sybill, he must have heard it after Sybill's claim to freedom had been asserted, and allowed to be prosecuted, since he was not more than seven years old when Sybill died. Therefore, both the hearsay account which Clarke retails, and Mrs. West's declarations to her son, were post litem motam; and for that reason, if for none other, they were not competent evidence even on the question of pedigree. The present case is very apt to illustrate the wisdom of this qualification of the exception which admits a hearsay evidence as to pedigree: we are informed by Clarke, that it was understood (that is, understood in Chesterfield) that Sybill claimed freedom on the ground, that she was descended from an indian mother; and the order of the general court allowing her to sue her master in forma pauperis, assigns Mr. Jefferson her counsel to prosecute the suit for her; and, we know, this order must have been founded on Mr. Jefferson's professional certificate, that he was of opinion she was justly entitled to her freedom, and stating the grounds of that opinion: this alone was enough to produce a general opinion in Chesterfield, that the woman was entitled to her freedom, as being an indian, or the descendant of a female indian, illegally enslaved. It was thus, or most probably thus, that Clarke's informants, and Mrs. West, received the impression, which he deposes to, and which she many years after communicated to her son.

672 *Neither of them were relations of or had any connexion with Ashbrooke, the owner of the woman Sybill, or with his family, so as that it was probable they got their information of them; neither of them had any interest, or any peculiar opportunity, to ascertain the truth: and this is another substantive objection to the competency of the evidence. 1 Stark. on Ev. part I. § 41, 43; 3 Id. part IV. p. 1101-5, and the cases there cited, particularly that of the Berkeley peerage.

The last instruction given by the court to the jury, was every way wrong, and in one part of it, indeed, incongruous and insensible. It is now well ascertained, that native american indians could not lawfully be made slaves in Virginia, after the year 1705, but that there was a long space of time preceding that date, when they might lawfully be enslaved; Robin v. Hardaway, Jefferson's reports, 109. There is no principle of justice, upon which the owner of a slave, who, and whom progenitors for generations, have been held in slavery, shall have the onus probandi cast upon him, to prove that the ancestor, who was first enslaved, was lawfully enslaved, or upon which a plaintiff claiming title to freedom should be exempted from the burden of proving his title, any more than a plaintiff claiming any other title. If it be said, that, owing to the great lapse of time, it would, generally, be impossible for the plaintiff to prove the unlawful enslaving of his ancestor; the same circumstance renders it equally impossible for the owner to prove that the ancestor was lawfully enslaved. The actual status of the party, and of his progenitors for generations, is obviously, the best evidence of his and their legal status. But the circuit court told the jury, that the actual state of slavery, in which the female ancestor of the plaintiff, in this case, and her posterity, had been held, was competent to raise a presumption, that she had originally been lawfully enslaved; and, on the contrary, that the ignorance and helplessness of the plaintiff and his said ancestors, (the ignorance and helplessness, namely, incident to a state 673 of slavery, for there *was none other) was competent to rebut the presumption of lawful slavery; in other words, that the actual state of slavery, is presumptive evidence of lawful slavery, and presumptive evidence of rightful freedom. In the case of a negro claiming freedom on the ground that he was imported into Virginia contrary to law, the fact of the master and importer having complied with the statutory provisions to legalize the importation, is presumed from twenty years possession without claim of freedom on the part of the slave, so as to throw the onus probandi on the slave; and though this presumption, like all other presumptions, may be rebutted by circumstantial as well as direct proof, and though the infancy of the plaintiff is a circumstance which may be relied on to rebut it, yet such infancy (combined with the ignorance and helplessness incident to slavery is not a circumstance which will defeat it. Garnett v. Sam, 5 Munf. 542; Abraham v. Matthews, 6 Id. 159; George v. Parker, 4 Rand. 659. We are in a court of justice, whose province it is to administer municipal law, not in a school of ethics or of politics. And in this country, where the status of slavery is allowed and established by law, and must continue to exist; a status, which no human wisdom or policy can devise the means of abolishing or materially altering, without incurring the danger, or rather the certainty, of evils equally destructive of the happiness of both races, the bond as well as the free; a status, which I firmly believe, was imposed by a dispensation of Providence, whose ways are inscrutable to men, and which Providence alone, in its own good time, can change or determine: in this country, I can discern no reason, why the status of slavery, the right of property in a man, may not as well be settled by prescription as any other right of property: and I can really imagine no reason, why the facts which infer the lawful slavery of a negro, may be presumed from his actual state of bondage for twenty years without claim of freedom, and even the natural incapacity of infancy, added to that of slavery, shall not suffice intirely to repel and defeat 674 that presumption; *and yet, as to one of indian extraction claiming freedom, no prescription shall avail to determine his legal status, and the presumption of lawful slavery, arising from the actual slavery of him and his progenitors, for a time whereof, literally, the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, shall have no influence on the question of his freedom or slavery, or (which is the same thing) shall be repelled and extinguished by an opposite presumption arising out of that very fact of actual slavery. Neither have I ever been able to understand the reason, or the feeling, that has led many wise and good men among us, at the same time that they tolerate, without any difficulty, the bondage of the african race, to revolt at that of any man of indian extraction, or who may possibly have sprung from a remote female indian ancestor, though the actual claimant, owing to the mixture of his progenitors with the negro race for generations, has lost all traces of the red man of the forest, intellectual, moral and physical. The rights of the white race, and the rights or the subjection of the black, the indian or the mixed races, all depend on the law, and must be ascertained and determined by the law.

Johnson, assigned counsel for the appellee. The remarks, which have been made upon the variances between the statement of the evidence of Clarke, and of the declarations of Mrs. West, as contained in the judge's charge to the jury, and the actual evidence contained in the depositions, are surely hypercritical. The judge in his charge, intended only to sum up the evidence concisely, referring the jury to the depositions themselves, for the full and exact import of the evidence they contained; and he did no more. It is impossible he could have intended to deceive or mislead the jury. [Leigh, I did not say, nor do I suspect, that he did.] It is equally impossible, that the charge could have deceived or misled the jury: the depositions were before the jury; the cause turned chiefly on them; they were, doubtless, the subject of minute examination and 675 discussion *at the bar; and, it is to be presumed, they were carried by the jury from the bar to the jury room, read there, and considered. Neither does it appear, that the judge's charge was complained of, as to this particular, in the court below: the objection seems to have occurred to the appellant's counsel here, for the first time. Besides, as the court excluded all of Clarke's affidavit, except so much as stated that he understood Sybill was an indian, and there was no such evidence in the affidavit, the whole was, in effect, excluded.

It has been settled, by repeated adjudications of this court, that hearsay, general reputation or tradition, is not only competent evidence to prove pedigree, but also to prove that the ancestor from whom the pedigree is derived, was an american indian. Jenkins v. Tom, 1 Wash. 123; Shelton v. Barbour, 2 Id. 64; Pegram v. Isabell, 1 Hen. & Munf. 388; 2 Id. 193. Nay, the principle seems to have been distinctly admitted in this very case of Gregory v. Baugh, when it was before this court in 1827. And it is right it should be so; for, in fact, the proof of pedigree from a particular person, involve of necessity, to every practical purpose, the proof of the identity of the ancestor, and consequently, a description of his person, and an account of his quality, as an essential part of the proof of pedigree. Hearsay is admitted on a principle of necessity, as being the best evidence the nature of the case admits of; and the rule ought to be extended to every case within the reason of it. And in most cases like the present, it must be impossible, in the nature of things, to adduce any other proof. No written documents can exist to prove the facts. The decisions of the supreme court of the U. States cannot prevail here, against the authority of the solemn adjudications of this court. But in Davis v. Wood, the court, in a suit for freedom, rejected hearsay, and general reputation, as evidence that the plaintiff's ancestor was a white woman (not absolutely, but except so far as it was applicable to the fact of the plaintiff's pedigree. And this exception is enough to justify the admission of the evidence in the case before the court, and all like cases.

676 *So too, it has been solemnly adjudged by this court, that when a party claiming freedom by reason of his descent from a female american indian ancestor, proves his descent from such an ancestor, he shews a prima facie title to freedom, and the onus probandi of the ancestor having been brought into the country, at a time and under such circumstances that she might lawfully be made a slave, rests on the party claiming to hold her posterity in slavery. Coleman v. Dick, 2 Wash. 234; Hudgins v. Wright, 1 Hen. & Munf. 134; Hook v. Nanny Pagee, 2 Munf. 379. It is too late now, even to question a principle, so long, so repeatedly, so solemnly settled, as the law of the land, and by which so many cases have been tried and adjudged. But it was rightly so settled; as whoever will examine the history of the subject, given by the judges in their discussion of this cause when it was here in 1827, cannot fail to acknowledge,.

The last instruction given by the circuit court to the jury, was, in effect, that though the actual state of slavery, in which a female american indian and her posterity for generations have been held, may afford a presumption that the indian ancestor was originally lawfully enslaved, yet that presumption is met and rebutted by an equipollent presumption in favour of the right to freedom, arising from the ignorance and helplessness incident to a state of slavery; and that it is open to either party to adduce other circumstantial or presumptive evidence. And experience, reason, and justice, equally approve the opinion.

CARR, J. The questions decided by the court in this case, when it was here before, were, in their general complexion, pretty much the same with those now presented to us; both sets of questions depending on the law of evidence, principally, and growing out of the testimony offered by the plaintiff, in tracing his pedigree and fixing the character of his female ancestor. I may refer, therefore, to the view then taken by me of the general rule excluding 677 hearsay evidence, *and the exceptions to that rule, particularly, that which embraces questions of pedigree. Looking to Clarke's affidavit, the circuit court seems to have understood his evidence to mean what his own words do not import: for it told the jury, that so much of it as stated that the witness had always understood that Sybill was an indian, might be received, and weighed by them. But Clarke said he had understood, that Sybill was descended from indians, but whether on the father's or mother's side, he was unable to say. The difference is most essential. As the judge interpreted the evidence to the jury, the reputation was, that Sybill was herself an indian; thereby reaching, at once, the point which the plaintiff had in view, descent from an indian woman: but, as the affidavit really was, it only proved, that the witness had understood that Sybill was, (not an indian, but) descended from indians, and whether on the father's or mother's side he was unable to say; and this, so far from proving descent from an indian woman, left that point wholly unsupported by the reputation to which the witness testified. This misapprehension of the judge was doubtless produced. by the hurry and confusion of a jury trial. It was contended at the bar, that as the court excluded all the affidavit but that part which stated the hearsay, that Sybill was an indian, and there was no such statement in it, the whole was in effect excluded. But this was not the meaning of the court, nor the practical construction given to its opinion. The affidavit went to the jury; and, it was said, the jury would read it for themselves, and not take the court's version of it. This they might do, as in any other case where the court undertook to instruct them on the weight or effect of evidence: they might disregard such an instruction; yet it would be error in the court to give it. On this ground, without touching any other, I think this instruction wrong.

We come next to the exception taken to reading West's deposition. It was moved to exclude it, because it detailed the statements made to West by his mother, 678 and these were *made after Sybill had brought suit for her freedom. The court instructed the jury, that if it was proved that Sybill was dead ten or fifteen years before that statement was made, then the declaration of Mrs. West, that she had lived on the same plantation with Sybill, that she was an indian woman, and had the appearance of an indian, was competent evidence to have such weight as the jury should think it entitled to, and that her declaration about Sybill's mother, and about the report of her right to freedom, were inadmissible evidence. As to the first objection, that the statement of Mrs. West was post litem motam; I was a good deal inclined to think that this was an objection of weight; for on examination, I found that the courts, conscious of the intrinsic weakness of hearsay evidence, and anxious to confine it to the exceptions long since established, had, with strictness and even jealousy, excluded it, wherever the statements had been made post litem motam; and the lis mota, is not confined to the institution of the suit, but to the origin of the controversy, nor is it necessary to prove (in order to the exclusion of the evidence) that the person making the declaration, knew of the lis mota. From these considerations, I was at first inclined to give this objection much weight: for the lis now prosecuted by the plaintiff, is the same which Sybill moved in the general court in 1772. But we are told she died about that time. The suit now before us, was not brought till near half a century afterwards; and it seems from the deposition of West, that his mother made the declarations to him when he was from fifty to sixty years old; some twenty or thirty years after the death of Sybill. I rather think, that, after such a lapse of time, the doctrine of lis mota cannot exclude these declarations.

Next, was the court right in admitting the hearsay evidence given by West, namely, the statements of his mother that Sybill was an indian? This question was much discussed at the bar. On the one side it was insisted, that we ought to hold strictly to the rule excluding hearsay, and 679 *not enlarge the exceptions already established; that the question of what country, nation or tribe a person was, is not a question of pedigree, and therefore cannot be proved by hearsay: and the cases in the supreme court of the U. States, of Mima Queen v. Hepburn, and Davis v. Wood, were cited in support of this position. On the other side, it was insisted, that the reason on which hearsay was admitted in any case, was, that it was the best evidence the nature of the case would admit; and that the rule ought to extend to every case within its reason: that in cases like the present, if you exclude hearsay and reputation, you shut the door completely against every claim to freedom, which depends on tracing back the line of pedigree to an indian woman, as there can be no living witness to speak from his own knowledge of transactions so remote, and no written documents exist to fix the fact. It was insisted too, that this court has by many decisions, settled the rule, that in suits for freedom, hearsay evidence may be received to establish a descent from an indian woman. My own opinion on this subject, was pretty plainly intimated, when this case was formerly before us. The precise point then raised, was, whether the "current report and belief in the neighbourhood, in 1770, that Sybill was entitled to her freedom," should be given in evidence to the jury. But in discussing that question, I relied on principles and authorities, which seem to me equally to reject hearsay evidence to prove the country, nation or tribe, of the claimant's ancestor. Such facts do not belong to pedigree. To take them in, you must add another exception to the rule that hearsay evidence is inadmissible. This, I am not disposed to do. I consider hearsay evidence so weak intrinsically, so incompetent to satisfy the mind of the existence of facts, so liable to become a cover for fraud and fabricated evidence, that I cannot agree to enlarge its sphere, even though the refusal should seem to operate harshly on the class of cases now under consideration. Such was the decision of the federal court, in Mima Queen v. Hepburn and Davis v. Wood; 680 and I think it the sound and safe course. It is true, as asserted at the bar, that the decisions of this court, in several cases, have gone to let in hearsay to prove descent from an indian woman; and this is the consideration which I have found it most difficult to get over; for I am exceedingly reluctant to unsettle what is at rest. But all who have examined the earlier cases in our books, must admit, that our judges (from the purest motives, I am sure) did, in favorem libertatis, sometimes relax, rather too much, the rules of law, and particularly the law of evidence. Of this, the court in later times, has been so sensible, that it has felt the propriety of gradually returning to the legal standard, and of treating these precisely like any other questions of property. Those decisions admitting hearsay, I have considered as instances of this departure from strict rules, which I should be well pleased to see corrected, if my brethren should think with me: but if they shall think me wrong, and those decisions right, I shall rest perfectly contented with their opinion.

The next exception states, that the plaintiff then introduced the testimony of several witnesses tending to prove, that Sybill was the mother of Biddy, who was the mother of the plaintiff, and that Sybill was a native american indian. Whereupon the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if the plaintiff founded his right to freedom on these facts, it was incumbent on him to prove, that Sybill was brought into this country, at a time or under circumstances which rendered it unlawful to enslave her; but the court refused; and instructed the jury, that if they believed the facts last mentioned, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the defendant should prove, that Sybill had been lawfully made a slave; which fact the jury might presume from the long time during which she, and her posterity, had been held in slavery, and other circumstances; but it was competent for the plaintiff to rebut this presumption by proving the ignorance and helplessness of the plaintiff and his ancestors, and other circumstances.

681 I *cannot approve of this instruction. We know, that by our laws of a former day, indians might be held in slavery. This court in Hudgins v. Wright, and some other cases, carried back the repeal of these laws to 1691. This was upon the idea, that a law of that date, granting free trade with the indians, had been decided by the old general court, to have repealed all laws tolerating indian slavery: but by the publication of Jefferson's reports (Robin v. Hardaway, p. 109), we see, that in 1772, this point was most ably discussed before the general court; and they decided that the act of 1691 did not repeal the indian slave laws, but that they were repealed by that part of the act of 1705, enacting who should thenceforward be slaves. And there can be no doubt, I think, that this is the correct exposition of the laws. Prior to 1705, then, our laws justified indian slavery. When a plaintiff, therefore, traces back his descent to an indian woman, unless he proves also that she was brought into the country since 1705, he has not made out a case for freedom. The indian woman may have been lawfully held in slavery: and whether she was or not, is a matter depending on facts, as to which I do not think the court should give the jury any instruction, or decide on whom the onus lies. Observe the effect of the instructions in the present case. The jury are told, that if they believe Sybill was a native american indian, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the defendant should prove that she was lawfully made a slave. How could he prove it? There are no written documents of such facts: you do not suffer him to resort to reputation and hearsay: and no living witness can speak to facts happening a hundred years back. During this hundred years, the defendant and those under whom he claims, have held the plaintiff and his progenitors in slavery: and this holding, the court tells the jury, is a fact from which they may presume slavery; but this presumption, they are instantly told, may be rebutted by the ignorance and helplessness of the plaintiff and his ancestors; an ignorance and helplessness, not particular and herent in their condition, always existing as to those held in slavery. Of what avail, then, is this presumption, derived from a slavery of a hundred years, when it is, and must always be rebutted, in other words destroyed, by the very slavery which gives it birth? It is a mere delusion of words; and the instruction amounts simply to this, that whatever slave, by rumour, reputation, hearsay (the loosest and weakest of all possible evidence), can carry back his descent to an indian woman, shall be free; for it is vain to add, unless the defendant can prove the indian woman was lawfully enslaved, when you take from him the only possible means after the lapse of a hundred years, of proving it. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the case sent back for a new trial &c.

GREEN, J. The first question, I shall advert to, is that presented by the last exception taken at the trial: Whether, evidence being given by the plaintiff, tending to prove, that he was descended in the female line from a native american indian woman, and nothing more being proved on either side, the prima facie presumption was that she was free, or on the contrary a slave? This question as to the onus probandi, in such cases has been several times considered and decided in this court, particularly in Hudgins v. Wright and Hook v. Nanny Pagee. In the first of them, the circumstance that the granddaughter was white, had no influence further than to repel the idea, that any female negro had been amongst her female ancestors: the plaintiffs proved that they were descended from an old indian, the time of whose introduction was not ascertained, and besides, neither her mother nor grandmother were white, there being gradual shades of difference in the colour of the three: and the judges, Fleming, Carrington, Lyons and Tucker held, unanimously, either that all indians introduced into our community, at any time, were prima facie to be presumed to be free, or that, if the date of their introduction did not appear, that the prima facie presumption was, that they were 683 american *indians, and brought in after the act of 1705, and therefore free; at the same time agreeing, that such presumptions might be rebutted by proper proofs. All the judges did not give their opinions seriatim, but the facts of the case were such, as that it must necessarily have been decided upon one or the other of those alternatives. In Hook v. Nanny Pagee, the doctrine asserted in the foregoing case, was fully recognized by the whole court, Brooke, Cabell and Coalter; and they went a step farther; for, upon a verdict that the jury had, upon their own inspection, ascertained that the plaintiffs were white, they held that they were free, although a white person may be a slave, according to our laws, if all his female ancestors were slaves; as would be the case, if any one of his remote female ancestors was an indian or negro slave, though he would be a white person, unless one of his great grandfathers or great grandmothers was a negro, all his other ancestors being white. This prima facie presumption could only be justified by the historical fact, that a greater number of indians had been incorporated into our community, as servants than as slaves, and that the descendants of the females of those introduced as servants, born during their service, continued in servitude to an advanced age in successive generations; facts, probably, well known to the elder judges who decided the case of Hudgins v. Wright, as well from their acquaintance with the history of the condition of the indians found amongst us, and the descendants of the females of them, derived from our legislation in respect to them, as from the proceedings and evidence in the multitude of cases upon that subject, decided in the general court in June 1772, in which parol evidence was given reaching back to the close of the century before the last, part of which now exist in the form of depositions filed in those cases. These were the depositions of persons at that time very old. I have examined them. When this case was formerly under consideration here, I endeavoured to shew from the authentic sources of our legislation, that, in fact, the class of indian 684 *servants, and the descendants of the females of them bound to service until an advanced age in all successive generations, always greatly exceeded that of indian slaves, and the descendants of the females of them: further sources of information have fortified that conclusion, and enabled me to correct some errors in the views which I then took of that subject: these I shall now refer to as succinctly as possible.

In 1671, sir William Berkeley, in answer to the inquiries of the lords commissioners, informed them, that there were then in Virginia no slaves but negroes. And there was no statute afterwards, authorising native american indians to be enslaved, until that of 1682, (which related only to those of remote tribes, and not those in our neighbourhood, who were our confederates and tributaries) with the following exceptions: that the acts of 1676 and 1677 allowed prisoners taken in the then war to be held as slaves (that war ended in 1677, and was not afterwards renewed); and that those taken by the small garrisons stationed at the head of tide water in our four great rivers, were allowed to be enslaved by an act of 1679. From the character of the service, as ascertained by our legislation, there could have been few or no indians enslaved under the acts of 1676, 1677 and 1679; and whatever were enslaved under the act of 1679 were emancipated by a subsequent act of 1684, repealing and declaring it null and void to all intents and purposes, as if it had never been made. (As to the effect of such a repeal, see 19 Vin. Abr. Statutes, E. 9, pl. 3, p. 532.) So that no native american indians were held in slavery after the act of 1684, repealing that of 1679, except those taken in the war of 1676 (which continued only one year after the act authorizing captives to be enslaved) and those enslaved under the act of 1682, before the passing of the act of 1705, by which the act of 1682 was repealed, as well as those of 1676 and 1677, in respect to all native american indians. That this was the effect of the repealing clause of the act of 1705, concerning servants and slaves, was decided by the general court, in the 685 case of Robin v. Hardaway, *in June 1772, and in Hannah v. Davis, in April 1787, and by this court, in Coleman v. Dick and Shelton v. Barbour. The court, in Robin v. Hardaway, as reported by Mr. Jefferson, decided, that the act of 1691 allowing a free trade with all indians, did not repeal the act of 1682. And in the case of Henry & al. v. Atty & al. the same court in June 1772, decided upon a special verdict, that the act of 1682 continued in force until 1705, and gave judgment against many descendants of indians introduced and held as slaves between 1682 and 1705.

The sources for the supply of indian slaves, natives of the continent of America, between 1682 and 1705, must have been very scanty, adverting to the state of things with respect to our neighbouring indians during that period; and there was never any source of a supply from abroad, except such as might be kidnapped in the West Indies, for there slaves were more valuable than here.

In respect to the sources for the supply of indian servants, in addition to what I said on that subject on the former occasion, I find, that all such female servants who had bastard children of any sort, were bound to add to their previous term of service (which was generally thirty-one years) one year on account of each child: and considering their condition, and their habitual and early connexions with negroes, they could hardly, in any case, be entitled to be discharged from service until they were past child bearing. Their children, in turn, were bound to serve until thirty-one, and as long after, as the addition of a year for each child they had during their time of service would amount to. I find further, that the act of 1765, carefully discriminated between the children of mulatto servants (the bastard children of white women by negroes, and their descendants) and those of such indian servants; discharging the former thereafter born from any obligation to service, and requiring them to be bound out as apprentices; while the former acts requiring a service to the age of thirty-one, from the children of indian women servants, in all genera-686 tions, with the addition *of one year's service for every child born during their service, were left in full force as to them, and so continued until the general repealing clause of the act of 1819. So that as our laws were framed, the females of this class of servants were almost always bound to service until they were past the prime of their lives.

No possible contrivance, short of reducing the whole race to absolute slavery, could be better calculated to obscure and confound their right to freedom, and to destroy the evidence of it.

Considering these facts, in respect to the condition of indians introduced from time to time into Virginia, as slaves or servants, respectively, and of their descendants; facts derived from infallible sources of information; I cannot for a moment doubt the propriety of the former decisions of this court, and of the instruction under consideration, that proof that a party is descended in the female line from an indian woman, and, especially, a native american, without any thing more, is prima facie proof of his right to freedom; liable to be repelled by proof, that his race has been immemorially held in slavery; which may be in turn rebutted by the consideration of the ignorance and the helpless condition of persons in that situation, aided by other circumstances, such as that many such were bound by law to a service, equivalent in all respects to a state of temporary slavery, until they attained the age of thirty-one years, and in many cases (according to circumstances existing in almost every case) for an uncertain term beyond that age. These circumstances, whether sufficient or not to repel the presumption founded upon a long continued state of slavery or service, are proper to be submitted to the consideration of the jury for their determination as to their weight and effect. And they may be properly strengthened by other circumstances (if proved by competent testimony) submitted to the jury for their consideration, and to have such effect as to them may seem proper; as, that one or more of such ancestors had openly asserted her or their right to freedom, 687 *or had instituted proceedings in a court of justice to assert such right, at a time when the evidence supporting the claim, or condemning it decisively, must have existed, but was prevented from prosecuting those proceedings with effect, by death or some other uncontrollable or reasonable cause; or, that deceased persons, who were in a situation to know the facts upon which the right depended, with no motive to misrepresent them, had declared the existence of those facts (I say, those facts) which would give the freedom claimed, such as that she was the child of an indian servant woman by a negro or mulatto, or that she was a native american indian introduced here since 1705.

This introduces the consideration of another point, strongly insisted on by the appellant's counsel, that hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove any specific fact, such as the race or nation to which the ancestor to whom the party traces his pedigree belonged; and this upon the authority of two cases in the supreme court of the U. States, in which the court laid down that principle in those very terms, and applied it, in one case, to hearsay evidence that the ancestor was a south american indian, and, in the other, an english woman, the one born in South America, the other in England. This was in direct opposition to the uniform course of decision, in such cases, in the courts of Maryland, where the cases arose, as was affirmed by the counsel, and by judge Duvall, who dissented, and who was peculiarly experienced in the administration of the laws of that state; and is in the very teeth of the whole course of decision in the supreme courts of this state. Thus, in Jenkins v. Tom, a witness having testified, that another who was dead, told him, that when he was about twelve years old, the women in question were brought to Virginia, in a ship, and were called indians, and had the appearance of indians; and this evidence was sanctioned by the unanimous opinion of the court. The decision was afterwards approved in Shelton v. Barbour. And in Pegram v. Isabel, a witness testified, that an old man whose name he did not recollect, had given evidence *in a former suit between a female ancestor of the plaintiff, and another under whom the defendant did not claim, that she was descended, according to general reputation, in the maternal line from an indian ancestor, who was imported into this state since the year 1705. This evidence, the hearsay in respect to general reputation testified by an old man, in a cause between other parties, to neither of which was the defendant a privy, and that extrajudicially (for it was given upon a writ of inquiry), was unanimously sanctioned by the court, as proper to go to the jury. In these cases, the court admitted hearsay evidence of general reputation as well as particular declarations in respect to the specific facts of the race and nation of the ancestor, her appearance and complexion and the manner and the time of the importation, which were very material. I confess, I do not comprehend the rule laid down in the cases in the supreme court of the U. States, which have been cited, that hearsay evidence and general reputation are inadmissible to prove specific or particular facts. All evidence, both direct or by hearsay and reputation, consists in the proof of specific and particular facts: I can conceive no other object of any proof, which can be offered as evidence in a court of justice. The general rule is, indeed, such as is there laid down; but there are admitted exceptions to it, depending upon no arbitrary decisions of the courts of justice, but upon sound principles of necessity and reason, according to the nature of the facts, and the circumstances of each particular case, and, particularly, upon the fundamental maxim of evidence, which requires only the best evidence which the nature of the case admits, in the ordinary course of human affairs and transactions. If the fact be of such a nature, as that in the ordinary course of things, if it really existed, it might reasonably be expected that direct evidence of it would also exist, hearsay or reputation is inadmissible. Such was the case in which this rule was first distinctly applied, in terms, to the exclusion of hearsay evidence by lord Kenyon, with the concurrence of another

689 *judge, where the question was, whether a particular spot called the Cow-cloze was a part of a particular estate. Outram v. Morewood, 3 T. R. 123, 14 East, 131, in notis. But it is universally admitted, that pedigree is an exception to this general rule, and may, according to the circumstances of the case, be proved by hearsay and reputation. Now, proof of pedigree consists exclusively of specific facts, and many of them, such as marriage, birth, death, consanguinity, and in England seniority, and in many cases, nationality, and finally and above all, identity; without which all the rest would be unavailing. If any one of these facts were indispensable to make out a title in any particular case, the exclusion of hearsay evidence as to that fact, might frustrate the direct evidence proving all the other points necessary to the title, for the want of direct evidence of that also. I have met with no case in the english books, in which hearsay evidence has ever been rejected in respect to any one of those facts: but there are cases, in which such evidence has been admitted to establish each of those facts, and especially, seniority and identity. Thus, in Doe v. Pembroke, 11 East, 504, the question was, which of two brothers was the elder; and an old unexecuted paper, purporting to be the will of the grandfather of the person last seized of the estate in question, who was dead, and the paper found in a drawer in his house, was received as evidence of the fact of seniority, and had the effect of proving it. And in Zouch v. Waters, 12 Vin. Abr. Evidence, T. b, 87, pl. 5, p. 244, the question was, who was the heir of William Zouch: the plaintiff proved that he was descended from William Zouch; but it was shewn on the other side, that the property in question belonged to William Zouch of Pilton (and it would have been the same question, if it had belonged to William Zouch, the scotchman, or the irishman, or the indian) and an old book from lord Oxford's library, containing the pedigree of William Zouch of Pilton, and signed by him, was admitted to prove that the plaintiff was not a descendant of

William Zouch of Pilton, though he 690 *was of some other of the name of William Zouch. These papers were received as evidence of the declarations of their authors, and therefore hearsay evidence, to all intents and purposes as it would have been if those declarations had been proved by parol. And reputation, though somewhat differing in its character from hearsay, is admissible in all cases where hearsay is. 3 Stark. on Ev. part IV. 1178, 10 East, 120. I cannot think that an estate in England could be lost by the rejection of hearsay evidence in respect to the country or county or other place of the nativity of an ancestor, or of the colour of his hair, or any other quality which served as a circumstance to identify him; and if not, is there any difference in the cases, or any reason in law and justice, that the descendant of an indian here, shall not recover his freedom upon the precise evidence, which would enable a peer of England to recover his estate there?

In respect to the descendants of a female indian servant, in the female line, it might happen, that, in a succession of generations, none of them would live until their term of service expired; for not only such who were the children of a negro or mulatto man, but all their descendants born during their service, were bound to serve till their ages of thirty-one, and an additional year for every bastard child (as all their children were) born during their obligation to service; and they were moreover liable to an additional service of six months from a very early period of our legislation, for every instance of fornication. In such a case, if in every generation, witnesses had gone to court and testified to their knowledge of their state of service, and the testimony had been committed to record, even that precaution would have been unavailing, if, when the first of the race entitled to be exempt from service, sued for freedom, all who knew the remote ancestor and her condition were dead, and hearsay were inadmissible to prove that she was a free indian servant.

I have perhaps spent too much time upon this point; but it is important to the descendants of all female indian servants, 691 ants, *many of whom are still legally bound to a temporary service, and to a large stock of emancipated slaves, who are bound to service in all generations to the age of thirty years, under Pleasants's will. Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call, 319. All of the former class now, and all of the latter in a few years, must be reduced to unconditional slavery, if it shall become the settled law, that the identity and condition of their remote ancestors cannot be proved by hearsay evidence or traditionary reputation.

I proceed to the next general question presented in this case. An objection was taken here, which was not insisted on in the court below, to the character of all the evidence adduced to prove the pedigree of the plaintiff: that it does not conform to the rule, that hearsay evidence and reputation of pedigree, to be admissible, should proceed from the family of the party or those intimately connected with it, and so having the best opportunity of knowing, and having at the time no inducement to misrepresent, the facts. This objection is, I think, sufficiently answered by referring to all the cases without exception, in which hearsay has been admitted, in such cases, by this court; and there have been many. Such a rule is utterly inapplicable to any case like this; and if necessity affords any exception, in any case, to a general rule of evidence, those cases form an exception to that rule, which is founded in good sense, and dictated by the circumstances prevailing in England. The family, relations and intimates of the parties, in such causes as this, are disqualified as witnesses by their class and condition, and the master and his family by their interest. The respectable neighbours of the parties who have the best opportunity of knowing, and no motive to misrepresent the truth, are alone competent to speak with effect upon the subject. Such was Mrs. West in this case; and her declaration comes fully up to the spirit of the rule alluded to, which has its source in the all pervading principle that lays at the foundation of all the laws of evidence, that the best competent evidence the nature of the case admits of, is required.

692 *But the evidence of her declarations are objected to, because they were made after an order in the general court authorizing Sybill to sue for her freedom. This order was made in October 1772, probably suggested by the decisions of the court at the preceding term, but was never prosecuted even by taking out a writ; for what reason, does not appear. The declarations of Mrs. West were made twenty or thirty years after the death of

Sybill; and the objection is that they were made post litem motam, and therefore were wholly inadmissible. The reason of the rule on this point, is, that in such a state of things, the declaration may be made with a view to influence the event of the contest, or upon the suggestion of a party, or if evidence of reputation be offered, it might have arisen out of that very contest. None of these reasons apply here. No contest was then depending or in contemplation; and it is impossible to imagine a motive for misrepresentation on the part of Mrs. West. She spoke of her personal knowledge of Sybill, and probably of her mother; for her son who testifies, was born about 1744, and she, consequently, as early as 1728; and I see no reason for excluding that part of her declaration which relates to Sybill's mother. In the case of the Berkeley Peerage, the father had made an entry on the leaf of a bible, stating the time of the birth of his eldest son by his wife A. and declared at the time, that he made it for the purpose of proving the age and legitimacy of his eldest son, in case the same should be questioned in any case or cause whatever, by any person, after his death. He died, and the very controversy he anticipated and provided against, ensued. This declaration was admitted by all the judges to be competent evidence, although the circumstances in which it was made went greatly to its discredit. Is there any thing in this case, so strongly calculated to discredit the declarations of Mrs. West, as there was in that, to discredit the declaration of the father? or any thing to discredit her's in any degree? It would, indeed, be a singular result, if the proof that Sybill, had been allowed by the court to institute *a suit for her freedom as an indian, (a circumstance well calculated to repel the presumption of legal slavery from her long continuance in servitude) should have the effect of excluding the proof of the fact, that she was in truth an indian, and that her mother was one also, by the declaration of one now dead, who was personally acquainted with her, having resided on the same plantation with her, and who might have known her mother personally.

The remaining ground of exception to the instruction given to the jury, in respect to part of the depositions, of Clarke and West, is, that in truth, there were no such declarations in them, as were stated by the court to be admissible; Clarke not stating, that he had always understood that Sybill was an indian, nor West, that his mother had said, that she had the appearance of an indian. This exception is, I think, well founded. The instructions were calculated to mislead the jury, more or less, by inducing them to believe, that the court was of opinion, that such was the effect of the depositions. And for this cause the judgment should be reversed.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion just given by my brother Green, in all points.

BROOKE, P. The points which have been argued, and on which the merits of this case depend, arise out of the exceptions taken at the trial. As to the first, I think the instruction of the court would have been wrong, even if he had correctly stated the import of Clarke's evidence to the jury: but the judge's statement of the evidence of that witness, was materially different from the evidence itself, unless, indeed, there be no difference (as the judge is presumed to have supposed) between the fact that Sybill was an indian, and the fact that she was descended from indians (as the witness stated) whether from the mother's or father's side he was unable to say. Nor is that objection to the instruction obviated (as was argued by counsel) by the 694 circumstance *that the evidence was in writing, and would be seen by the jury, who might correct the mistake of the judge. The jury, most probably, would take it for granted the judge was right, and that there was no difference between the evidence as stated by him, and the real evidence of the witness.

The next objection taken by the counsel for the defendant, was to the reading of the deposition of West, detailing the information he had heard from his mother. This was hearsay evidence; and his answer to the 4th interrogatory, particularly, ought to have been struck out, before the deposition was allowed to go to the jury. He said, he had heard his mother say, that Sybill's mother was an indian, and that Sybill herself was one, and was entitled to her freedom. When this cause was formerly before this court, it was decided, that hearsay evidence that Sybill was entitled to her freedom, was inadmissible; and if hearsay evidence that she was an indian is to have the same effect, as seems to be considered, it appears to me, that that was equally inadmissible. But it was inadmissible evidence, according to the settled rules of evidence. I concur, intirely, with the president of this court, in his remark in Shelton v. Barbour, which was repeated by judge Roane in Pegram v. Isabel, that though liberty is to be favored, the court cannot on that or any other favored subject, infringe the settled rules of law; and with lord Kenyon, in Rex v. Eriswell, 3 T. R. 721, that rules of evidence are not technical refinements, but founded on good sense, and the preservation of them is the first duty of judges. To admit hearsay evidence that Sybill was an indian, or that her mother was an indian, would, I think, violate the rule which excludes hearsay evidence, except in cases of pedigree, prescription, custom and (in this country) boundary. The rule admits it in those cases, not on the ground that it is the best evidence the nature of the case admits of, because that would let in hearsay evidence, in a great many cases in which it is always excluded; but on the ground, that those cases, in which hearsay evidence is admitted, 695 are *not, in all respects, susceptible of direct and positive evidence of any degree. Nor do I think that there is any thing conclusively settled on this point, in the decisions of this court. I know, hearsay evidence has been silently permitted to go to juries, to prove the condition of a person, from whom pedigree has been deduced; but there is no adjudication of this court, that the settled rules of evidence are not applicable to cases in which freedom is controverted. On the contrary, the departure from these rules of evidence in such cases, was strongly reprobated by Pendleton and Roane; by the remarks of the one, repeated by the other, before alluded to: nor have I been able to find, that the point now in question, was ever made and controverted. If it had been, I think it would have been decided here, as it was decided in the supreme court of the U. States, in the cases of Mima Queen v. Hepburn and Davis v. Wood: cases, which, though not authority here, are entitled to great respect. In the latter case, hearsay evidence was offered to prove, that Mary Davis, long dead, and from whom the plaintiffs had deduced their descent, was a white woman, born in England, and that such was the general reputation in the neighbourhood where she resided: the court rejected this evidence, except so far as it was applicable to the pedigree of the plaintiffs; not because (as seems to be supposed) the court thought there were no specific facts in the chain of pedigree, but because the fact that Mary Davis was a white woman, born in England, was not part of the pedigree of the plaintiffs, but a specific fact susceptible of other proof than hearsay evidence.

But the instruction of the judge on this point, in the case before us, was wrong in another respect. It was calculated to leave the impression on the mind of the jury, that proof of the fact that Sybill was an indian, was equivalent to proof that she was free, without evidence that she had been illegally held in slavery; thereby putting it on the defendant to prove that she was legally held in slavery. Until the act of 1705, it is now well ascertained, 696 that indians might be held *in slavery, as well as africans; and it is settled law, that a person of african race, held in slavery, and suing for freedom, must take upon himself the burden of proving his right to freedom; and e converso, in the case of a person of a white race, suing for freedom, the burden of proving him a slave, rests on the defendant; as, in the case of Hook v. Nanny Pagee, where the jury having found, on inspection, that the plaintiff was a white woman, it was thought sufficient, to establish her right to freedom, the defendant having offered no evidence of her descent from a slave race in the maternal line. But hearsay evidence, that any ancestor of her's was an indian woman, if contested, would have been rejected. When the law permitted indians to be made slaves (as Sybill's mother and herself were held in slavery) that doctrine was as applicable to those of that race held in slavery, as to those of african race. The circumstance that some indians were only held to service until thirty-one, does not relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proving his female ancestor to have been illegally held in slavery, or that she was one of those who were held to service until thirty-one only. That she might have been so held to service, is a circumstance that weakens the presumption that she was legally held in slavery, applicable to those of african race; but it does not extinguish

it. In making title to freedom, the claimant is exposed to the same burden that is imposed on those making title to property. In the latter case, a right to property is not conclusively made out by proof of descent from a particular ancestor, without full proof also, that the title was in that ancestor. Thus, in the case before us, if hearsay evidence was admissible to prove that Sybill was an indian held in slavery, the title of the plaintiff to freedom was not established, until he also proved, that she was illegally held in slavery, or was one of those indians held to a limited service only.

But there is another objection to this hearsay evidence. It seems to me well settled, that declarations made by a person, 697 after a controversy begun, when the mind of the person *making the declarations, is not in that even position, that qualifies him (though not under the influence of the sanction of an oath) to speak impartially, though such declarations are testified to by a competent witness, are intirely inadmissible. That this controversy existed at the time the declarations of Mrs. West to her son were made, I think is very clear. We know, that it was begun by the plaintiff's mother in 1772: and though much time had elapsed before the declarations were made, there is no cause to believe, that, though the suit of the plaintiff's mother went off the docket (how, we know not) the controversy was at an end. It is settled law, that proof that the controversy was known to the person making the declarations at the time, is not necessary to disqualify the persons to make them: and, I think, it is as well settled, that the continuance or the existence of the lis mota, at the time the declarations were made, is also unnecessary, if it appear that the controversy existed. The declarations of Mrs. West bear internal evidence, that the controversy existed, and was known to her, when she made the declarations. The witness in answer to the third interrogatory, said, his mother stated to him, that Sybill was free, and her family, in consequence of their indian descent from their mother. She would have hardly said she was free, and assigned the reason why, unless she had been apprised of some controversy on that point. In answer to the fourth interrogatory, the witness said, his mother told him that Sybill's mother was an indian, and that Sybill was one herself, and was entitled to her freedom. These declarations are of the same import, and strongly imply a controversy at the time. But it is not to be inferred, from the circumstance that the suit of Sybill for freedom, in the general court, went off, that there was an end of this controversy. That, at the time the declarations of the mother were made to the witness there was no lis mota actually pending, was not material to exclude evidence of her declarations. In the case of the Berkeley peerage, it was held by a majority of the judges, that it was the existence of the con- 698 troversy *at the time, and not the lis mota, that disqualified a person to make declarations that could be testified to, even as hearsay evidence as to pedigree. In that case, Mansfield, C. J., denied the rule to be, that the lis mota is necessary to exclude the evidence: the time of the declaration, in that case, he said, was the origin of the controversy, and not the lis mota; in which lord Eldon concurred. Wood, J., said, after a dispute has arisen, the presumptions in favour of declarations fail: to admit them would lead to the most dangerous consequences. The dispute, in the case before us, certainly had arisen, and existed, at the time Mrs. West made the declarations, to which her son testified: her mind was not in that even position, which would qualify her to make impartial declarations as if upon oath. The whole of her declarations ought therefore to have been expunged from the deposition of the witness.

But the court agree, on another point, that the judgment is to be reversed.

The judgment entered by this court, was to the following effect: The court is of opinion, that the circuit court erred, in intimating to the jury, that Clarke had stated in his evidence, "that he had always understood that Sybill was an indian," and that West had stated in his evidence, that his mother had said, "that Sybill had the appearance of an indian;" those witnesses having used no such expressions: and that the judgment is erroneous: therefore, it is considered, that the same be reversed &c. and it is ordered, that the verdict of the jury be set aside, and the cause be remanded to the circuit court, for a new trial to be had therein, on which no instruction giving any such intimation, is to be given.

Moore v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1830.

Criminal Law — Confessions — When Admissible Evidence.*—Case at Bar.—If a threat be made, or promise held out, to a person in custody on a charge of felony, to induce him to make confession, and he denies his guilt at the time, but afterwards makes a confession, which appears, from the time and circumstances, not to have been induced by such previous threat or promise, this confession, so afterwards made, is a voluntary one, and proper evidence against him on his trial.

Same—Larceny of Bank Notes—Production of Notes.†—In an indictment for larceny of bank notes, it is not indispensably necessary to produce the stolen notes upon the trial.

Moore was indicted and tried, in the circuit court of Shenandoah, for stealing bank notes of the farmers' bank of Virginia, of the value of thirty dollars, the property of William Lauck. Verdict, guilty: sentence, imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term ascertained by the jury.

702 "Upon the trial, the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions, stating, in substance, That William Lauck a witness for the commonwealth, testified, that having locked up in his store house, four farmers' bank notes amounting to thirty dollars, he missed the notes on his return to the store the next morning; and, believing they had been stolen during the night, he directed Peter Lauck, a boy who assisted in the store, to make a search for them; but the witness left home before they were found: that he returned in the evening of the same day, and was informed, that Peter Lauck had found some bank notes and silver, in a pair of pantaloons of the prisoner, hid in the hay in a stable, and that the prisoner had been arrested: that the prisoner was carried before a magistrate, after dark, the same evening; the witness was present; and the prisoner confessed before the magistrate, that he had taken the money from the witness's store house; and at the time this confession was made, no threats were made against the prisoner, and no promises to induce him to make the confession: that the prisoner, at the time of the theft, was in the service of the witness: that when the witness was before the magistrate, he was called upon to describe the bank notes; whereupon he said, he remembered there were two ten dollar notes, and two five dollar notes of the farmers' bank, but he could not describe them more particularly; notes were then produced, answering that description, and delivered to the witness by the justice; upon which the witness testified, that he could not swear to the identity of the notes, but he believed them to be his, and he also believed them to be genuine notes of the farmers' bank. The notes were not produced at the trial, and there was no proof that they had been lost or destroyed: the witness said, he had passed them off, and did not know where they were. Peter Lauck testified, that in the course of the morning after receiving the directions from William Lauck stated in his testimony, he found a pair of pantaloons hid in the hay in W. Lauck's stable, where the prisoner attended; the pantaloons belonged to the prisoner;

703 and in the pocket, *he found the four bank notes, which were exhibited before the justice, and then delivered to W. Lauck, and also some silver coin. The prisoner then introduced a witness, J. Aleshire, who testified, that after Peter Lauck found the pantaloons and money, the witness apprehended the prisoner, and charged him with having stolen the money; the prisoner denied it; Aleshire said to him, "you had as well confess it, for it will be worse for you if you do not," or words to that effect; but the prisoner still denied that he had stolen the money: that Aleshire then confined him in a room, and went to him, about two hours afterwards, shewed him the money and notes which had been found, and asked him, "how much silver did you get?" The prisoner answered, "it was all together." Aleshire asked, "how did you get into the store?" The prisoner answered, "the door was not locked; I went in and got the money," or words to that effect; which was all that passed between this witness and the prisoner at that interview. Upon this state of the testimony, the prisoner moved the court, 1. to exclude the evidence of the confession of the prisoner before the magistrate, stated in the testimony of the witness William Lauck; but the court overruled the motion, and admitted the evidence of confession: 2. to instruct the jury, that as the bank notes mentioned in the indictment, were not produced at the trial, nor shewn to have been lost or destroyed, and as it was not shewn, that the prisoner had, by any act of his, prevented the production of them, the jury could not, under such circumstances, convict the prisoner; but the court refused to give the instruction. To which opinions the prisoner's counsel excepted.

And now, he presented a petition to this court, for a writ of error to the judgment.

Philip Williams argued, for the petitioner, 1. That the confession made by him to the witness Aleshire, was induced by a previous threat and promise made by Aleshire, and could not be admitted as evidence; 704 and if that confession *was inadmissible, on that ground, all subsequent confessions should be excluded; since the motive that led to the first confession, might have continued to operate afterwards; and it ought to be supposed, that it did so operate, unless some caution or warning had been given the prisoner, in the interview between the first and second confession. See Stark. on Ev. (Boston edi. of 1828), part IV. vol. 2, p. 49, and seq. and the cases there cited; East's C. L. 658; Thompson's case, 1 Leach, 293.

2. That the bank notes ought to have been produced at the trial, to ascertain, 1. their identity, and 2. whether they were genuine. If they were not genuine, they were of no value, and no offence had been committed: the notes ought to have been produced to prove the value, and then it would have appeared whether they were genuine or counterfeit: and no evidence of the value, but the notes themselves, ought to have been received, unless the production of them had been rendered impossible by the act of the prisoner himself, or by accident, or unless they had been passed away by him as genuine. Cummings's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 128; Pomeroy's case, Id. 342.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The first question is, Whether, under the circumstances of the case, the circuit court erred, in refusing to exclude the prisoner's confession made before the justice of the peace, stated in the testimony of W. Lauck? When the confession was made before the magistrate, there were no threats or promises made. This confession, therefore, was at the time, perfectly voluntary. But it is contended by the prisoner's counsel, that as he proved that a previous threat had been made by Aleshire, the confession made before the magistrate must be understood to have been induced by that threat. It is unnecessary to discuss the question, whether, when a confession has once been induced by the improper influence of a threat, or promise, all subsequent confessions of the same facts ought to be 705 excluded, because this case *does not come within such a rule. When

Aleshire made the threat (admitting what he said was a threat) the prisoner did not confess, but persisted in denying his guilt, as he had done when first arrested. It was not until the expiration of two hours, nor until the money and notes were shewn to him, that he made any confession. Thus, the first confession does not appear to have been extorted from him by the threat, but rather to have been produced by the sight of the notes and money in the hands of a third person. It was, probably, the result of his own reflection on the facts, that the notes had been found in the pocket of his pantaloons, which had also been found concealed in a place to which he himself had constant access. He most probably thought it useless any longer to deny the fact, as the circumstances were now so strong against him. The court was justified in believing, that the first confession was voluntary, and a fortiori the second, which was not made till the lapse of some further time. We are of opinion, that the evidence was properly admitted.

The second question is, in effect, whether, in every prosecution for the larceny of bank notes, it is necessary for the conviction of the prisoner, that the notes should be produced on the trial? Conceding, for the sake of argument, that, in prosecutions of this kind, the jury cannot convict, unless they are satisfied that the stolen notes are genuine, we yet deny, that the production of them is indispensable to prove that fact. Indeed, it seemed to be admitted by the prisoner's counsel, that if they are lost or destroyed, or if the prisoner prevents the production of them, they need not be produced. If the production of them be indispensable, it is not easy to perceive, how the loss or destruction of them obviates the necessity. It is the province of the jury to judge of their genuineness, by the evidence. If they are not produced, that circumstance weakens the proof, and may put at hazard the conviction of the accused: but though it may diminish the weight of the evidence, the non-production of the notes does not destroy the compe-

706 tency of the *other evidence adduced to prove them to be of value. If they are produced, it has never been held necessary to prove by the officers of the bank, that they are genuine. If such was the law, it would be impossible to carry on prosecutions for larceny of bank notes in the various counties of the commonwealth. Resort must be had to the evidence of persons, accustomed, in the way of trade, to receive and pay them away, and the non-production of them does not prevent such evidence from being given. In this case, the witness, William Lauck, had seen and owned them: he not only believed them to be genuine, but the act of receiving and paying them away, as things of value, proved that his belief was real. The other two witnesses had seen them; and the magistrate, who re-delivered them to their owner as things of value, had also an opportunity of ascertaining whether or not they were genuine. It was competent for the commonwealth to introduce such evidence, which though not so full, yet was of the same kind as that which might have been given, if the notes had been before them.

It is a case of frequent occurrence, in prosecutions for larceny at common law, that the jury are required to decide on the value of the article stolen: on that value depends the question, whether the offence be grand or petit larceny, and consequently the degree and kind of punishment to be inflicted; and the jury are to ascertain that value. Suppose the article stolen to be flour in barrels: must the flour be brought into court, in order that the jury may judge of its value? It has never been deemed necessary. The evidence must prove, that the person charged, feloniously took and carried away the article stolen; and as to the value, witnesses must be called to prove it; which may be done, though it has been restored to the owner, and he has parted with the possession of it.

We are of opinion, that the non-production of the notes, furnished no reason why the court should have given the instruction that was asked for.

Writ of error denied.

707 *Hay's Adm'rx v. Pistor.

June, 1830.

Circuit Court—Appellate Jurisdiction—Jurisdictional Amount.—Judgment of a justice of the peace, affirmed by the county court, for debt, principal, interest, damages and costs, not amounting to $3 dollars 33 cents: HELD, circuit court has no appellate jurisdiction to review such judgment.

This was a case adjourned to this court from the circuit court of Mason. Pistor recovered judgment, upon a warrant, before a justice of the peace of Mason, against Hay's administratrix, for a small debt. Hay's administratrix appealed to the county court, where the judgment was affirmed, with damages and costs. And then, she moved the circuit court for a writ of certiorari, to remove into that court the record of the judgment of the county court, though the judgment (debt, interest, damages and costs) did not amount to thirty-three dollars thirty-three cents. Upon this application, the circuit court adjourned the following questions to this court: 1. Whether a judgment of a county court, affirming or reversing the judgment of a single justice of the peace, can in any case, be reviewed in a circuit court? And, 2. What judgment ought to be given upon this application?

MAY, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The principles upon which this writ is demanded, would require the circuit courts to award one to a judgment of a magistrate for one cent; and would constitute them appellate tribunals, to revise all judgments of the county courts and justices of the peace, however small the amount in controversy. Such a course would be in opposition to the plain meaning of all our statutes in relation to small debts, to the construction of them which has universally prevailed, and to the uniform practice of the country, under every modification of them. The court would be reluctant to sustain a proceeding, which might lead to such consequences; and especially one, which, for the purpose now sought to be effected, may be regarded as almost obsolete in this commonwealth. We know substitute for the writ of error or super-sedeas.

But the circuit court law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 69, § 9, p. 230, which limits the jurisdiction of these courts to "causes, matters and things, which shall amount to one hundred dollars, whether brought before them, by original process, habeas corpus, appeal, writ of error, super-sedeas, mandamus, certiorari to remove proceedings for any purpose, or by any other legal ways and means whatever," furnishes a conclusive answer to all the arguments which have been urged in support of this application. There are some exceptions to the limit here prescribed (as, for example, writs of super-sedeas to judgments of the county courts for thirty-three dollars thirty-three cents) but there is no one of them, which can by implication even, comprehend this novel, extensive and mischievous jurisdiction.

Without deciding any other question, therefore, this court unanimously certifies to the said circuit court, that it hath no power to award the writ of certiorari as prayed for in this case.

The Commonwealth v. Cousins.

June, 1830.

Larceny—Jurisdiction.—If goods be stolen in one county, and carried into another, the thief may be indicted in either, the offence being complete in both.

This was a case adjourned to this court from the circuit court of Petersburg.

Cousins, indicted for horse stealing in that court, and found guilty by the jury, moved the court to set aside the verdict, and order a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict ought not to have been found upon the facts in evidence at the trial; which were, that the prisoner had stolen the horse in the county of Pittsylvania, and afterwards brought the horse, so stolen, to Petersburg, where he was arrested with the horse in his possession. Upon this state of facts, the following questions were adjourned to this court: 1. Whether the circuit court of Petersburg had jurisdiction to try the prisoner? 2. Ought a new trial to be granted?

MAY, J., delivered the resolution of the court. All the writers on common law, lay

*Larceny—Jurisdiction—Goods Stolen in One County and Carried to Another.—In Strouther's Case, 92 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 852, it is said: "It has been a settled principle of the common law, from an early day, in England, that where property is stolen in one county, and the thief has been found, with the stolen property in his possession, in another county, he may be tried in either. This practice prevailed notwithstanding the general rule that every prosecution for a criminal cause must be in the county where the crime was committed. The exception to the general rule grew out of a fiction of the law, that where property has been feloniously taken, every act of removal or change of possession by the thief constituted a new taking and asportation; and as the right of possession, as well as the right of property, continues in the owner, every such act is a new violation of the owner's right of property and possession. There is no principle, in respect to larceny, better settled than this, and it has received repeated sanction in this state. Cousins' Case, 2 Leigh 709. This rule of the common law, however, was never extended farther than to counties." In this case (Strouther v. Com.) it was held that, where a person steals property beyond the jurisdiction of Virginia and brings the same into Virginia, he cannot be lawfully convicted of the larceny in Virginia. See generally, monographic note on "Larceny" appended to Johnson v. Com., 24 Gratt. 555.

*Appellate Jurisdiction—Jurisdictional Amount.—On this subject, see monographic note on "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263.

The principal case was cited in Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 254, to the point that a judgment of the county or circuit court cannot be reviewed by a writ of certiorari.

it down, that, if goods be stolen in one county, and carried into another, the offender may be indicted in either, because the offence is complete in both. If the original taking, be felonious by the common law, the felon can acquire no colour of right thereby, and every act of possession constitutes a felony. No principle in respect to larceny seems to be more clearly settled than this; and it has been repeatedly sanctioned in this state.

It is, therefore, to be certified to the circuit court, that it hath jurisdiction of the offence aforesaid; that the motion for a new trial ought to be overruled; and that judgment be pronounced according to the verdict.

Jacobs and Others v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1880.

Justice of Peace—Misbehavior in Office—Indictment—Allegations.—"In an indictment against justices of the county court, for misbehaviour in office, it is necessary that the act imputed as misbehaviour, be distinctly and substantially charged to have been done with corrupt, partial, malicious or improper motives, and above all with knowledge that it was wrong, though there are no technical words indispensably required, in which the charge of corruption, partiality &c. shall be made.

Error to a judgment of the circuit court of Augusta, upon an indictment against John Jacobs, L. W. Harris and 710 *John Digges, justices of the peace for the county of Nelson, for misbehaviour in office.

The prosecution was commenced in the circuit court of Nelson, from which the venue was changed to the circuit court of Augusta, where the case was tried; the jury found the defendants guilty and assessed fines against them; and the court rendered judgment for the fines, and judgment also of a motion from office. Many objections were taken to the judgment and proceedings, in the argument here; but the main point, that on which alone the court decided the case, was, whether the acts imputed to the defendants, as laid in the indictment, amounted to any crime or misdemeanour or misbehaviour in office?

There were three counts in the indictment; but they were not materially different from each other, and in regard to the points of objection to the indictment, they were all alike. The indictment charged,

Indictments—Defects—Effect of Statute of Jeofails.—See, citing the principal case on this subject. Old v. Com., 18 Gratt. 980; State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 730.

In substance, That William B. Jacobs, having been appointed and commissioned sheriff of Nelson, qualified as such in the county court, on the first day of November term 1820; and he being about to nominate his deputies to the court for its approbation, public proclamation thereof was made, and sixteen justices assembled on the bench; and then the sheriff nominated one Burks to be one of his deputies; but upon a statement made to the court, that Burks had been guilty of highly improper and corrupt conduct, while acting as a deputy sheriff of Amherst, which statement was corroborated by the admission of Burks's counsel, that the fact charged had been proved in a trial at law, the court, after full deliberation, by a majority of twelve justices to four, rejected Burks as a deputy, and refused to enter of record, that he was a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour, the only justices 711 who voted for admitting Burks as deputy, being William Digges and the defendants John Jacobs, L. W. Harris and John Digges, of whom John Jacobs was the brother of the high sheriff, and the others were relations of Burks: nevertheless the defendants, well knowing the premises, but seeking and contriving, under the colour of their offices, to carry into effect their own private feelings and personal views, without any regard to the interests and welfare of the people of the county, or the administration of justice therein, and in despite of the fair, open and deliberate expression of sentiment, which had already been pronounced, in a full and numerous court, as aforesaid, did combine and associate to form another court for the purpose of admitting Burks to the office of deputy sheriff; and, on the following day, after he had been rejected as aforesaid, being the second day of the term, and without giving any notice to the justices who had been assembled on the preceding day, that a reconsideration of their decision was contemplated, and without receiving any new or farther evidence tending to exculpate Burks, formed a court at an early hour of the day, consisting of themselves the said defendants, and two other justices, John Mosby and R. J. Kincaid, and by the said court it was ordered to be entered of record (the defendants only voting in the affirmative) that Burks was a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour, and thereupon Burks was permitted to qualify as deputy sheriff, although the said justice Kincaid earnestly opposed the making of the said order, and two other justices who were present when the proposition was made, refused to countenance the proceeding even by their presence, and immediately withdrew. And so the indictment concluded, the defendants were guilty of misbehaviour in their office of justices of the peace.

The cause was argued here, by Leigh for the plaintiffs in error, and the attorney general for the commonwealth.

*See the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 15, which provides, that no person appointed to the office of deputy sheriff, shall execute any of the duties of that office, unless the court of the county shall be of opinion, and enter of record, at the time of his appointment, that he is a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour &c.—Note in Original Edition.

712 *Leigh said, the indictment consisted of a detail of circumstances, which might afford an argument or inference of improper conduct, but it contained no direct charge of official misbehaviour: the indictment in truth, charged no offence whatever. The mere fact of these justices on one day, giving a decision different from that pronounced by a larger number of justices on a preceding day, was not of itself criminal in the least degree. It was a legal and valid act, and if honestly done and intended, not an improper one. And the indictment did not charge any dishonest or corrupt motive; for, certainly, the imputation to these justices, of seeking and contriving to carry into effect their own private feelings and personal views &c. did not amount to a charge of corruption; since a justice of the peace might, in appointing or admitting to office, gratify his private feelings and personal views, and, especially, a desire to promote the welfare of the person appointed or admitted to the office (which seems to be the very guilt imputed to these justices), without any corruption. It is no where stated in the indictment, that the justices knew that Burks was not a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour. The words "well knowing the premises," refer to what had transpired the preceding day; and they might have known all that, and yet have entertained the opinion that Burks was an honest man; nay, the indictment states, that they gave the same opinion the first day, which they gave on the next, and they might just as well have been prosecuted for their opinion given on the first day, as for that given on the second day. It ought to have been charged directly and positively, that they knew Burks was not an honest man. The omission to charge the scienter is a fatal defect.

The attorney general contended, that the indictment was substantially good and sufficient; but whether it would have been so or no, upon a demurrer taken to it, he insisted, that all defects in it were cured by the verdict of conviction; and he referred to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169,

§ 44, p. 611, which provides, that
713 "after verdict of twelve men, *no judgment on any indictment or information for felony or any other offence whatever, shall be stayed or reversed for any supposed defect or imperfection in any such indictment or information, so as the felony or offence therein charged to have been committed, be plainly and in substance set forth with convenient certainty, so as to enable the court to give judgment thereupon according to the very right of the cause; any former law, custom or usage, to the contrary notwithstanding."

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The first and most important objection to the proceedings and judgment in this case, is, that the indictment is incurably defective; that it does not set forth any offence at all; and that the judgment ought to have been arrested.

It is a general rule, in indictments, that the special matter of the whole fact ought to be set forth with such certainty, that it may judicially appear to the court, that the indictors have proceeded upon sufficient premises. 1 Chitty's C. L. 227; Hawk. P. C. B. 2, ch. 25, § 57. But an indictment clogged with so much unnecessary matter, as to perplex and confuse the case, and to render it difficult to perceive the real charge intended to be exhibited, is highly objectionable. This indictment is obnoxious to the objections which the counsel for the plaintiffs in error has made to it. It consists of a long detail of circumstances from which the impropriety of conduct of the defendants may be inferred, rather than a direct charge of official misconduct. "The want of a direct allegation (says Hawkins, Ibid. § 60,) of any thing material in the description of the substance, nature or manner of the crime, cannot be supplied by any intendment or implication whatsoever."

What is the criminal fact with which it is intended to charge these justices? It is that, they formed a court (with the aid of two others alleged to be innocent) on the second day of the November term &c. at which they ordered it to be entered of record,

714 that Burks, who was nominated to *them by the high sheriff as his deputy, was a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour; and permitted him to qualify as deputy. This, of itself, so far from being a crime, was, as the law stood at that day, a legal and valid act; for the statute authorized the court of the county, whether consisting of four only, or of sixteen or any other number, to enter of record their opinion (if it be their opinion), that the person appointed a deputy sheriff is a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour; and then to permit him to qualify. But if they do not entertain that opinion; or if they know that he is not a man of honesty &c. and certify that he is; in that falsehood, in that corrupt conduct, consists their offence, their official misbehaviour. The scienter is a material part of the substance of this crime, of which there is no direct allegation in this indictment; and it cannot be supplied by any implication or intendment whatever. There is one part of the count, in which a scienter is laid; but the scienter of what? "The defendants well knowing the premises" &c. Let us ascertain what were those premises. They were, that on the preceding day, the high sheriff nominated Burks as one of his deputies; that a court of sixteen justices assembled; that a statement was made that Burks had been guilty of highly improper and corrupt conduct, while acting on a former occasion as deputy sheriff, which statement was corroborated by the admission of the said Burks's counsel, that the fact charged against him (without stating what that fact was) was proved in a trial at law; that twelve of that court refused to enter of record an opinion of his honesty &c. but that four voted in favor of Burks, three of whom were the defendants; and that they and the fourth were the relations of the high sheriff and deputy. These are the premises, which the defendants are charged with well knowing. They are not sufficient to ground a reasonable inference, that they knew that Burks was dishonest: they might not have believed the statement; they might not have thought, that the corroborating admission was of any consequence; they might have *had a better knowledge of Burks's character, than the other twelve. But even if the inference was irresistible, that they did know his dishonesty, it would not be sufficient; it would not supply the want of a direct allegation to that effect.

It is a well established principle, that a judicial officer cannot be prosecuted criminally, for any judgment rendered by him, however illegal, unless rendered from some motive of malice, partiality or corruption. Much less can such a prosecution be carried on, where the act done is within the pale of his lawful authority, without such corrupt motive. In indictments of this character, it is usual to charge the judgment or thing done, to be done corruptly, wickedly or maliciously. We do not say, however, that the word corruptly is a term of art, or technical term, like the words feloniously, burglariously &c. which must necessarily be used. The motive which is here alleged, namely, to carry into effect their own private feelings, and personal views without any regard to the interest, and welfare of the people, or the administration of justice, may probably be considered as a sufficient assignment of a corrupt motive. And if the indictment had alleged, that, with that motive, the defendants had made the entry on the record, well knowing that the said Richard H. Burks was not a man of honesty, probity and good demeanour, it would have probably been sufficient without alleging, in terms, that it was done corruptly. But the omission of the scienter is just as fatal as the omission of the word murdravit would be in an indictment for murder.

If this substantial allegation had been made, then the circumstances so laboriously set out in the indictment, would have been evidence proper to be laid before the jury, to enable them to ascertain, whether the defendants sinned knowingly or not. But, however formidable the array of circumstances, it is not equivalent to a direct allegation.

The court is of opinion, that the indictment would have been bad on demurrer: and the majority of the court is of opinion, that the defect in the indictment is not cured by the statute of jeofails in criminal cases; the offence not being in substance set forth with convenient certainty.

716 *It is unnecessary to give an opinion on the other numerous objections made by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, to the proceedings set forth in the record.

MAY, J. The record, in this case, is so replete with error, that it matters little on what point the judgment be reversed: but I cannot concur in the opinion that it ought to have been arrested, on account of the insufficiency of the indictment. It would clearly have been bad on general demurrer; and to me it seems, that the authorities cited against it prove nothing more. Every act necessary to be charged upon the defendants, as constituting official misbehaviour, is charged, clearly and distinctly. The defect is, that it is not alleged, that the defendants well knowing that Burks was not a man of probity &c. did nevertheless certify that he was; and in violation of law, admitted him to qualify as deputy sheriff. But it is alleged, that he was charged with corruption in office; that this charge, and his conduct and character, were investigated before a court of sixteen magistrates including the three defendants; and that, by a vote of twelve justices to four, that court refused to make the certificate, and to allow him to qualify. The indictment then charges, that these defendants (two of them being relations of Burks, and the other a brother of the high sheriff) well knowing the premises, but seeking and contriving, under mere colour and pretence of their office &c. to carry into effect their own private feelings and personal views, without any regard to the interest and welfare of the people of the county, or the administration of justice therein, and in despite of the fair, open and deliberate expression of sentiment, which had been pronounced in a full court &c. did combine and associate together, to form another court, for the purpose of admitting Burks to qualify as deputy sheriff; and, the next day, without giving any notice of their intention, and without any new evidence, the defendants with two other justices, formed a court, at an early hour, in the morning, and caused it to be entered of record, that Burks was a person of probity 717 *&c. and admitted him to qualify as deputy sheriff." I do not agree with the attorney general, that this is to be regarded as an indictment for a conspiracy; but I am of opinion, that (in the words of the statute) it does "plainly and in substance, set forth, with convenient certainty," though not with technical precision, a charge, that these defendants, with full knowledge of the unfitness and unworthiness of Burks, and of a decision to that effect by a large majority of a full court, did illegally and improperly certify, that he was a man of probity &c. and permit him to qualify as deputy sheriff, in a manner highly unbecoming their office and without regard to their duty and the public welfare; and that this charge is so stated "as to enable the court to give judgment thereupon, according to the very right of the case." This, after verdict, would be sufficient.

In the opinion of MAY, J., on this point, SAUNDERS and DANIEL, J., concurred. Judgment reversed.

The Commonwealth v. Edmund Perryman and Kiturah Perryman.

June, 1830.

Statute Prohibiting Certain Marriages—Construction.—It is provided by statute, that "If the brother hath married or shall marry his brother's wife," the marriage shall be dissolved, the parties fined &c. HELD, the marrying a brother's widow, is an offence within the statute.

This was a case adjourned to this court from the circuit court of King & Queen.

It was an information against the defendants, founded on the 17th section of the marriage act, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 106, p. 399, charging, that Edmund Perryman, unlawfully, willfully and incestuously, intermarried with and took to wife Kiturah Perryman, the wife and widow of 718 Joseph Perryman *deceased, who was the brother of Edmund. The defendants pleaded not guilty. Upon the trial, the jury found specially, that the defendant Edmund did intermarry with the other defendant Kiturah; that the said Kiturah had been the wife, and was at the time of the marriage the widow of Joseph Perryman, then deceased; and that Joseph was the brother of Edmund: and the jury referred the question to the court, whether, upon this state of facts, the defendants were guilty of a violation of the marriage act? Which question the circuit court, at the instance of the defendants, adjourned to this court, together with the usual question, what judgment ought to be given in the case?

The marriage act (above referred to) provides, inter alia, that, "if the brother hath married or shall marry his brother's wife" — "every person or persons, so unlawfully married, shall be separated by the definitive sentence or judgment of any superior court of law" &c. The defendants contended, that, as Joseph Perryman, the brother, was dead, and the woman who had been his wife, was now no longer his wife, but his widow, and as this was a penal law, which ought to be strictly construed, therefore, the case was not within the statute.

PER CURIAM. The circuit court ought to give judgment upon the verdict rendered against the defendants, declare the nullity of the marriage, and cause them to give bond with surety, that they will not cohabit hereafter.

719 *Ex Parte Barker.

Grant of Administration—Want of Jurisdiction—Effect.—Letters of administration granted by a court having no jurisdiction to grant them, are merely void; and the court having competent jurisdiction to grant the administration, may proceed to grant it, though the letters of administration before improperly granted, have not been revoked.

Barker, a citizen of Kentucky, applied for letters of administration of the estate of James Markham deceased. The county court of Henrico had heretofore granted administration of the decedent's estate to William Duval, taking jurisdiction to do so, upon the ground, that the decedent died out of the state of Virginia, and had estate in Henrico, namely, the claim on the treasury, which was the subject of the case of The Commonwealth v. Markham's adm'r, 1 Leigh, 516. But Barker now exhibited proof, that he was a grandson of Markham, and that he lived and died in the county of Cabell in Virginia, and Duval, being present in court, admitted notice of this application of Barker for the administration.

The case was argued by John Scott in support of Barker's application, and by the attorney general, who opposed the grant of administration to him.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The court has reviewed its decision upon the same point, at November term 1828, in the case of the administration of Robert Robinson's estate. In that case, the hustings court of Richmond had granted administration to Scott, of the estate of Robinson, who lived and died in Canada: it was proved, that a debtor of Robinson lived in Middlesex, but that there was no estate in the city of Richmond, nor any debt due him there: and this court decided, that the grant of administration by the hustings court of Richmond was void, and proceeded to commit administration to the sheriff of Middlesex. In the case now before us, it was contended,

1. that the non-residence of Barker, 720 the applicant, was an *objection to the grant of administration to him; and 2. that the grant to Duval was not void, but voidable only, and that till it was revoked, administration could not be granted to another. As to the first, the court is of opinion, that the applicant being a citizen and resident of another state, furnishes no legal objection. It is a matter of sound discretion. If there were creditors of the deceased in this state, and if the distributees lived in this state, it might be indiscreet and improper to give administration to a non-resident; but where the facts are otherwise, as in this case, the objection does not lie. As to the second point, the jurisdiction to grant administrations, is conferred by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 12, 32, p. 377, 382. The circuit and county courts have jurisdiction to grant administrations within certain limits. If they transcend those limits, they have no jurisdiction. The place of residence of the intestate, gives jurisdiction to the local courts: if he had no known place of residence, then the place of his death gives jurisdiction, or the place where his estate lies. In this case, the intestate resided in Cabell county, and died there: the circuit or county court of Cabell had jurisdiction, but not the courts of Henrico, although he had estate there. It would have been different if the intestate had resided and died out of the state. The court of Henrico not having jurisdiction, the grant was a mere nullity. The statute gives this court jurisdiction to grant administration in any case. Administration of the decedent's estate is granted to Barker.

SEMPLE and MAY, J., dissented.

Grant of Administration—Wrong Exercise of Jurisdiction—Effect.—The doctrine of the principal case—that a grant of administration by the court of a county or corporation not authorized by the facts of the case to make such grant (as where the decedent had neither a residence nor any estate, real or personal, in the county or corporation in which the administration was granted) is the act of a court without jurisdiction and is void—has been entirely repudiated by subsequent decisions in Virginia (see Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 378; Hutcherson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 90); and it seems well settled that where a court has general jurisdiction to grant letters of administration, an order granting administration, in a case in which the state of facts is not such as to give the court jurisdiction in that particular case, is not a void, but only a voidable, act. 721 *Webb v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1830.

Mills—Rebuilding—Construction of Statute.—A mill which had been built, and had gone down, prior to the statute of 1819, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 235, § 10, and which was rebuilt after the passing of that statute, is not a mill thereafter built within the meaning of the statute.

Criminal Law—Presentment—Information.†—Upon a presentment in a circuit court, for an offence for which the penalty prescribed by law, exceeds not 20 dollars, the court cannot proceed by way of information, but only in a summary way, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 65.

Error to a judgment of the circuit court of Nottoway, against Webb, for a fine of five dollars, and the costs of prosecution. Webb, was presented, in the circuit court, at April term 1827, for grinding grain, and taking toll, at his mill in that county, the mill not being established by order of court, pursuant to provisions of law.‡ A rule was made upon Webb, to shew cause why an information should not be filed upon the presentment; and the rule having been duly served upon him, it was made absolute. An information was accordingly filed, which contained two counts. 1. The first charged, that Webb, being the owner and occupier of a grist mill in Nottoway, which was built without any lawful authority, and never established by order of court, pursuant to law, [without stating when the mill was built] did, within twelve months next preceding the April term 1827 of the circuit court, grind grain brought to the said mill, and did take toll for so grinding. 2. The second count charged, That Webb being the owner of a grist mill in Nottoway, which was built by him in the 722 year 1821, *without any lawful authority &c. did within the twelve months aforesaid, grind grain for L. W. and T. W. C. brought by them to the said mill, and did take toll for so grinding the same, against the statute &c. Webb pleaded not guilty. The jury found him guilty. He moved the court to set aside the verdict, and order a new trial. The court overruled the motion, and gave judgment against him for a fine of five dollars, and the costs. He filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the circuit court overruling his motion for a new trial; and applied to this court for writ of error to the judgment, which was allowed.

The bill of exceptions sets forth the facts proved at the trial: It was proved, that the defendant did grind grain at his mill for toll, as stated in the information. It was also proved, that those under whom the defendant claims, erected a mill and dam at the same place, more than thirty years before the presentment was made, and used the same as a water grist mill, grinding for toll, until the defendant became owner thereof, and that the defendant used it in like manner. But it was farther proved, that the said old mill from decay of the timbers about the pier-head, and giving way of the dam at its foundation near to the pier-head, as early as the year 1810, became wholly unfit for public use; that by means of puncheons driven down, and clay thrown against them, the dam would hold water for short periods after heavy rains, during which times the defendant had his own grain ground, and at such times would and did grind some grain for a few of his near neighbours, who, from observation of the weather, or information received, could hit the right time; and for such grinding he took toll. These times of grinding were more frequent and lasted longer in the winter, but at no season could it grind with any regularity, and for several years the miller was not kept at the mill, but engaged about the plantation, though generally within hearing of a horn. The 4th July 1818, the dam was broke and the old mill house swept off by a fresh. In the fall of the same year, the defendant commenced getting timber for 723 *the mill house. In 1819, these timbers were framed. In the spring and summer of 1820, the foundation of the house was dug out; the mill race cut; and by christmas the whole work was nearly completed. In 1821 the mill, much improved, commenced grinding regularly for toll.

The case was argued at this term by Johnson for the plaintiff in error; and the attorney general for the commonwealth. Johnson shewed, that neither the presentment, nor the first count, charged any violation of law, or offence of any kind. And then, the question was, whether the facts proved at the trial, made good the charge contained in the second count? Whether this was a mill built since the 1st January 1820, within the meaning of the statute?

SEMPLE, J., delivered the opinion of the court. There is no offence, either at common law or under any statute, laid in the first count of the information. And the second count is not sustained by the facts proved at the trial; for they do not prove, that Webb built his mill since the 1st January 1820, but that he rebuilt an old previously existing mill. The judgment might have been reversed, and a new trial ordered, if the circuit court had been authorized by law to proceed by way of information. But the circuit court had no authority to proceed by way of information. The statute for regulating criminal proceedings, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 65, p. 614, provides, that if on a presentment to a circuit court, the penalty exceed not twenty dollars, no information thereupon shall be filed; but a summons shall be issued against the defendant to answer the presentment; and the court shall, in a summary way, without a jury, hear and determine the matter of the presentment, in the form in which it shall have been made, and give judgment thereupon, according to law and the very †Presentment—Information.—See generally, monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674.

‡See 2 Rev. Code, ch. 235, § 10, p. 228, a provision introduced at the revival of 1819, which took effect the 1st January 1820.—That "no person shall take any toll or other compensation for grinding any grain, at any mill hereafter built, unless such mill be established by order of court, pursuant to the provisions of law; and if any person shall offend herein, he shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, the sum of five dollars to the commonwealth" &c. This statute (§ 1, 2, 3, 4, 5,) provides for obtaining leave of court to build mills; and § 6 authorizes the rebuilding of mills destroyed, or rendered unfit for public use &c.

right of the case &c. Now, the penalty for the offence charged in this case is only five dollars. If the presentment itself charged the plaintiff in error with any offence, 724 so that the circuit *court could proceed to judgment upon it according to law and the very right of the case, without regarding form or want of form, the proceedings might be reversed to the presentment, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in. But the presentment charges no offence against Webb, and is so defective that no judgment can be pronounced upon it. The judgment, therefore, by the unanimous opinion of the court, is to be wholly reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff in error.

The Commonwealth v. Fugate.

June, 1830.

Justice of Peace*—Conviction of Felony—Forfeiture of Office—Effect of Pardon.—A justice of the peace is convicted of the felony of malicious stabbing, sentenced to the penitentiary, confined there, and then pardoned: HOLD, the conviction and judgment for this felony, was a forfeiture of his office of justice, and incapacitated him from afterwards acting under his commission; and the pardon neither avoided the forfeiture, nor restored his capacity.

This was a case adjourned from the circuit court of Scott.

A rule was made by the circuit court upon Fugate, to shew cause why an information in the nature of a Quo warranto, should not be filed against him, for exercising the office of the justice of peace of Scott county, without any lawful authority. Fugate appeared to shew cause at April term 1830, when the following state of facts was agreed:

Fugate was duly commissioned a justice of the peace for the county of Scott, in April 1815, and qualified as such in June following; and thenceforth exercised the powers and duties of the office till September 1825; when he was convicted in the circuit court of Scott, of malicious stabbing, and was sentenced to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for two years according to the verdict of the jury. He was sent to the penitentiary accordingly; but before the 725 expiration of the term of his imprisonment, he was pardoned by *the executive. No proceeding of any kind was had between the time of his conviction and sentence, and the time of the pardon, for the purpose of ascertaining, whether he had forfeited his office of justice of the peace, or of removing him from the office. After his pardon and discharge from the penitentiary, he returned to Scott and resumed the exercise of the office of justice of the peace of the county, and continued in the exercise thereof till this rule was made.

The circuit court, with Fugate's assent, adjourned the following questions to this court: 1. Did he, by the conviction and judgment of the felony aforesaid, forfeit his office of justice of the peace of the county of Scott, or become thereby legally incapacitated from ever after acting therein under his said commission?

*Justice of Peace.—See generally, monographic note on "Justices of the Peace" appended to Wallace v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 180.

2. If the conviction and judgment produced such forfeiture or incapacity, did the pardon avoid the forfeiture or restore his capacity? 3. Ought the court, on the state of the facts, to discharge the rule, or make it absolute?

BROCKENBROUGH, J. In considering the first question, the court has not thought it necessary to make a minute investigation of english authorities. In 1 Plowden's Com. 381, a case is stated, in which it was decided, that where a grant had been made to two persons for the term of their lives, and for the life of the survivor of them, of the sheriffwick of Cheshire, and one of them was attainted of treason, the whole office was forfeited, because the office was intire, and could not be severed. This decision is founded on the postulate, that an attainer of treason produces a forfeiture of a freehold office which concerns the administration of justice. In another case it was decided, that a cestui que trust of a grant for years of the license of wines, who had committed felony, had forfeited the said office. 13 Vin. Abr. Forfeiture, H. pl. 2, p. 445. But, in England, this question can seldom arise. Felonies are there, for the most part, punishable capitally; and if the holders of an office becomes convict of felony, he can no longer hold it, if 726 the sentence *is carried into effect.

As we have substituted penitentiary confinement and discipline for capital punishments, it would seem, that a similar incapacity for holding office should follow the conviction for felony. The court does not, however, mean to rely mainly on any english authorities or adjudged cases, in deciding the question now before it. When the people of Virginia established their constitution, they never intended that the bench of justice should be contaminated by the presence of a convicted and attainted felon. Neither did the legislature nor the executive ever intend, that a judicial officer appointed under their authority, should continue to hold the office, after he should be sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for a felonious offence. The court is decidedly of opinion, that such judicial officer forfeits his office by conviction and attainer of a felony; that no pardon can restore him to his former office. The following is to be entered as the judgment of the court:

This court is unanimously of opinion and doth decide, 1. That the said William Fugate, by the conviction and judgment of the felony of which he was indicted, did forfeit his office of justice of the peace for the county of Scott, and became thereby legally incapacitated from ever after acting therein under his said commission. 2. That the pardon of the executive did not restore his capacity to act under his former commission, nor avoid the forfeiture. And 3. That the circuit court of Scott ought to make the rule absolute against him.

727 *Allen v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1830.

Statute Defining Larceny—Effect on Former Statute—Case at Bar.—By statute of 1819, grand larceny is defined stealing goods to value of $4. and upwards, and punished by imprisonment &c. not less than one nor more than three years: by statute of 1824, larceny committed after 1st May, 1824, to value of $10, and upwards, is defined grand larceny, and punished as grand larceny therefore was; and larceny of goods of less value than $10, is defined petit larceny, and punished as petit larceny therefore was; and the latter statute neither makes provision as to larcenies committed before 1st May 1824, nor contains any express repeal of the former statute. HELD, the latter statute does not repeal the former, as to larcenies committed before 1st May 1824.

Criminal Law—Erroneous Charge to Jury as to Minimum Punishment—Effect.—At the trial of an indictment for a crime, the punishment whereof, prescribed by law, is imprisonment &c. not less than one nor more than three years, the clerk charges the jury, that the term of imprisonment is to be not less than two nor more than three years: verdict finds prisoner guilty, and ascertains his imprisonment to be two years; the attorney for commonwealth remits one year of the term: whereupon, the court sentences prisoner to one year's imprisonment: HELD, 1. the attorney had no power to make such remission, which was therefore merely void; 2. the judgment was erroneous, not being according to verdict; 3. the verdict ought to be set aside, on account of the erroneous charge as to the minimum term of imprisonment.

Allen was indicted of the larceny of a steer of the value of ten dollars: one count of the indictment charged, that the theft was committed on the 10th September 1823; another, that it was committed on the 1st January 1830. The prisoner pleaded not guilty. The jury being sworn, and the indictment read to them, the clerk charged them (inter alia) "That if they found the prisoner guilty, they were then to inquire of the value of the chattel stolen; if they found it to be of the value of ten dollars and upwards, they were then to ascertain the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary, so as such term should be not less than two nor more than three years; if they found it to be of less value than ten dollars, they were then to ascertain the time it was stolen, and the value thereof." The court corrected this charge by directing the jury, that if they found the defendant guilty of the larceny, they were to find, specifically, the time when the crime was committed, and the value of the steer stolen, and to ascertain the imprisonment: but the court did not apprise or charge the jury, that if they found the prisoner guilty of grand larceny committed in 1823, the term of imprisonment might be less than two years, the minimum stated in the charge given by the clerk. The jury found this verdict: "We of the jury find, that the prisoner John Allen did steal &c. the steer in the indictment mentioned on the 15th August 1823 in manner and form as therein charged; and that the said steer was of the value of nine dollars and seventy five cents: we further find, that the said steer is not forthcoming to be restored to the owner. If the facts found amount in law to grand larceny, we ascertain the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be two years." Upon this verdict being returned, the prisoner moved the court to discharge him, upon the ground that, the statute prescribing the punishment for the offence, which was in force at the time it was committed, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 6, p. 617, had been repealed by the statute of the 9th March 1824, Sess. Acts of 1823-4, ch. 10, § 11, p. 17,† and there was now

Criminal Law—Erroneous Charge to Jury as to Minimum Punishment—Effect.—In Mitchell v. Com., 75 Va. 856, the offense for which the prisoner was indicted was punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years though the clerk charged the jury that the minimum term of imprisonment was three years, and the maximum five years. The jury found a verdict of guilty and fixed the term of imprisonment in the penitentiary at five years. It was insisted that this charge by the clerk must be treated as an erroneous instruction of a court, and therefore the verdict must be set aside and a new trial awarded the prisoner; and the principal case was cited to sustain the contention. But it was held by the court of appeals, approving the principal case, but distinguishing it from the case at bar (p. 863, 864, 865), that, since the jury had fixed the maximum period of imprisonment, they could not have been misled by the erroneous charge of the clerk; that the prisoner was not in any way prejudiced by the mistake, nor could he have been benefited if the minimum period had been correctly stated in the charge; and therefore the error was not sufficient to set aside, or arrest the judgment.

See also, monographic note on "Instructions" (V. e.) appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

Same—Charge by the Clerk—Effect.—The acts of the clerk done in the presence of the court and under its supervision, must be taken to be done by directions of court; and are the acts of the court. Mesmer v. Com., 26 Gratt. 982, citing the principal case. So where a charge is given to the jury by the clerk in the presence and hearing of the court without any correction by the court, it is regarded as receiving the sanction of the court and thus becomes the act of the court; and if there is any error in it to the prejudice of the prisoner, it is an error for which the judgment ought to be reversed. To this effect, the principal case was cited with approval in Thornton v. Com., 24 Gratt. 682; Dull v. Com., 25 Gratt. 961; State v. Cobbs, 40 W. Va. 718, 22 S. E. Rep. 310; Mitchell v. Com., 75 Va. 864.

The principal case is distinguished in Mitchell v. Com., 80 Va. 830, 17 S. E. Rep. 480.

Same—Waiver of Second Jeopardy.—To the point by that certain acts, such as consenting to the discharge of the jury, or moving in arrest of judgment, the prisoner will be presumed to waive any objection to being put a second time in jeopardy, the principal case is cited in Briggs v. Com., 82 Va. 563.

†The statute of 1796 and the revised statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 6, 7, enacted, that every person convicted of simple larceny to the value of four dollars and upwards—should undergo confinement in the penitentiary for a period not less than one nor more than three years; and that "if any person shall feloniously steal &c. any goods or chattels under the value of four dollars, he, she, or they, being thereof legally convicted, shall be deemed guilty of petit larceny, and shall be sentenced to be punished by stripes on his or her bare back, not less than ten nor more than forty for any one offence, or by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than six nor more than eighteen months, at the discretion of the jury by which such person shall be tried."

The statute of March 1824, Sess. Acts of 1823-4, enacted, that "if any free white person, after the 1st day of May next, shall be guilty of simple larceny of goods and chattels to the value of ten dollars or upwards, and shall be thereof duly convicted, he shall, in all respects, be subject to the same sentence and punishment as is now prescribed by law, for white persons guilty of larceny of goods of the value of four dollars and upwards; and if after the said 1st day of May, any person shall feloniously steal &c. any goods and chattels under the value of ten dollars, he or she shall be deemed guilty of petit larceny, and shall be, in all respects, subject to the same proceeding, trial, conviction, sentence and punishment, as are now prescribed by law for free white persons guilty of petit larceny." This statute contained no proviso as to the prosecution and punishment of larcenies committed before the 1st May 1824, and no general repealing clause.

A statute passed March 9, 1826, Sess. Acts of 1825-6, ch. 11, p. 10, enacted, "that if any person shall hereafter commit any offence, for which he or she may now be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for any term less than two years, every such person shall for every such offence, being thereof convicted, be confined in the penitentiary for a term not less than two years, and not more than the number of years now prescribed by law as the longest period for the commission of such offence: provided, that every person who shall have committed any such offence, heretofore, shall be tried and punished in the same manner as if this act had never passed."—Note in Original Edition.

729 no law in force prescribing a "punishment for the offence. The court overruled the motion. He then moved the court, to set aside the verdict, and order a new trial, on the ground, that the jury had been erroneously charged with the prisoner's case, as to the minimum of the term of imprisonment, not having been informed, that the term might be less than two years, and of the probable effect, injurious to the prisoner, which this erroneous charge might have produced upon the jury in ascertaining the term of imprisonment. Upon which the attorney for the commonwealth offered to wave and remit one year's imprisonment, and to take judgment for the residue of the term, namely, one year. The prisoner objected to any such waver and remission, and insisted that he ought to have a new trial. But the court, being of opinion, that as the evidence was full and satisfactory, and well warranted the finding of the jury, the only effect of the omission to charge them, that if they found him guilty of a larceny of goods over the value of four dollars committed in 1823, the term of imprisonment, according to the law then in force, was limited to a term of not less than one nor more than three years; was, to mislead the jury as to the minimum of the time; and that the commonwealth, by waving and remitting all of the term of imprisonment fixed by the jury, above the shortest time which could have been legally fixed by the jury consistently with the prisoner's guilt, gave him all the advantage that could

730 have resulted to him from the most specific and correct charge on this head; therefore, overruled the motion for a new trial. To these opinions of the court, the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions; from which the above state of the case has been collected.

The court then proceeded to give judgment upon the verdict. That the statute of March 1824, respecting the crime of grand larceny, did not affect offences committed before the passing thereof, or render punishable larcenies committed during the operation of the former law on the subject; and that the law upon the verdict, was for the commonwealth: and the attorney prosecuting for the commonwealth, with leave of the court, waving and remitting one year of the term of imprisonment in the penitentiary, ascertained by the jury, and praying judgment that the prisoner should be so there imprisoned for one year only; thereupon, the court passed sentence upon the prisoner that he should be imprisoned in the penitentiary for the term of one year.

The prisoner prayed a writ of error to the judgment; which was allowed.

C. R. Baldwin and Johnson, for the plaintiff in error; the attorney general, for the commonwealth.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the court. This court concurs in opinion with the circuit court, that, as to the offence committed by the prisoner, the revised statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 6, defining grand larceny, and prescribing the punishment of the offence, was not repealed by the statute of March 1824, Sess. Acts of 1823-4, ch. 10, § 11. The latter statute enacts, that "if any free white person, after the 1st May 1824, shall be guilty of simple larceny of goods &c. to the value of ten dollars and upwards, and shall be thereof duly convicted, he shall, in all respects, be subject to the same sentence and punishment, as is now prescribed by law for white persons guilty of larceny of goods of four dollars and upwards." There is no repealing clause in this statute: so that, if it has the effect of repealing the former law, it is by implication. As to offences committed after the new statute went into operation, the old law was undoubtedly repealed: every affirmative statute is a repeal, by implication, of a precedent affirmative statute, so far as it is contrary thereto: leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. But subsequent statutes, which add accumulative penalties, and institute new methods of proceeding, do not repeal former penalties and methods of proceeding, ordained by preceding statutes, without negative words: neither hath a latter statute ever been construed to repeal a prior statute, unless there be a contrariety or repugnance in them, or at least some notice taken in the latter statute of the preceding one, so as to indicate an intention in the law makers to repeal it. 6 Bac. Abr. Statute D. p. 372, 3. The act of March 1824 applies exclusively to offences committed after the 1st day of May following: as to offences committed prior to that time, it leaves the revised statute of 1819 in full force. Allowing the two statutes to have this effect, is there any contrariety or repugnance between them? This court thinks not. The question is not new here. A similar one arose in Wyatt's case, 6 Rand. 694, and in Pegram's case, 1 Leigh, 569, which were prosecutions under the statutes to prevent unlawful gaming. In both cases, the court held, that the former laws had not been repealed by the latter, as to offences committed prior to the time when the latter went into operation. The question now before us does not differ materially from that decided in those cases. It is true, we are directed to construe the statutes against unlawful gaming remedially: but, if the question to be decided be not one of construction, but whether the law be in force or repealed, the rule is alike in all cases, whatever may be the degree or nature of the crime or offence punishable by such law, if in force.

But, we think, the circuit court ought to have set aside the verdict against the prisoner, and ordered a new trial. The charge given by the clerk to the jury was erroneous, and was well calculated to mislead them, as to the legal term of imprisonment. It was equivalent to an instruction from the court: it was given by an officer of the court, in the usual course of his duty, in the presence and hearing of the court; and, not having been corrected by the court, must be regarded as having been sanctioned by it. What effect it had, does not appear from any thing in the record. But it may have induced the jury to agree upon the term of two years for the prisoner's confinement in the penitentiary, believing that to be the minimum, when, if they had been correctly informed of the law, they might have ascertained his imprisonment to be one year only. This error was not corrected by what was done by the attorney for the commonwealth. The power of pardon was not in his hands. His waving and remitting one year of the term, was a void act, and ineffectual to any purpose. It left the verdict intire; and being intire, the judgment rendered by the court was not according to the verdict.

The judgment is, for this reason, reversed; and the cause remanded to the circuit court for a new trial to be had of the case.

June, 1830.

Writ of Right—Affidavit of Demandant's Death before Suit Instituted—Effect.—A writ of right having been brought in name of H. against R. and P. and the mise regularly joined on the mere right, and the tenants shewing by affidavits that H. was dead before the writ purchased, and that they had come to knowledge of the fact after the mise was joined: HELD,

2. Same—Same—Same—Proceedings Stayed.—The court ought to stay proceedings, till W. the person prosecuting the suit, shall shew by proof, that demandant was living at commencement thereof.
3. Same—Same—Same—Right of Person Benefitted to Prosecute Suit.—That W. who instituted suit for his own benefit, ought not to be allowed to prosecute it to judgment without shewing demandant was living at commencement thereof, though W. may shew evidence of title to land demanded, and deduce title from H. the demandant:
4. Same—Same—Same—Contempt.—That court ought to make a rule upon W. and his attorneys, and inquire into their conduct herein, as a contempt, and abuse of the process of the court: and
5. Same—Same—Same—Liability for Costs.—That unless W. within reasonable time after rule given for the purpose, produce proof, that demandant was living at commencement of suit, it ought to be dismissed, and payment of tenants' costs enforced, by attachment, against W. or his attorney.

This was a case adjourned to this court from the circuit court of Wood.

A writ of right was sued out in the name of Howard against Rawson and Pugh, in September 1826, and the mise was regularly joined upon the mere right, in September 1827. The cause was continued from term to term, till April term 1830, when the tenants filed affidavits to shew, that Howard, the demandant, died many years before the institution of the suit; that the tenants were ignorant of this fact, till after the mise had been joined; and that the suit was, in truth, prosecuted by one Willard, who was aware of Howard's death. And thereupon, the tenants moved for a rule upon the counsel, attorneys and agents, engaged in the prosecution of the suit, to shew cause, 1. Why the tenants should not be permitted to withdraw their plea, and to plead, in abatement, the death of Howard before the writ purchased: 2. Why the stayed, and the counsel, attorneys, agents, and all others concerned in the prosecution thereof, directed not to proceed further therein, until they should produce satisfactory proof to the court, that Howard was in life at the institution of the suit: and 3. Why the counsel, attorneys, agents, and others engaged or concerned in the institution and prosecution of the suit, should not be respectively attached as for a contempt of the court and for an abuse of the process thereof, in the institution and prosecution of the suit in the name and in the pretended right of Howard, as the demandant, well knowing that he was dead long before the præcipe was sued out. The motion for the rule was resisted by one Willard, who claimed title to the land in controversy under Howard, and who being present in court when the motion was made, filed an affidavit, in which he stated, that, before the mise was joined in this case, the death of the demandant Howard, had been put in issue in another cause tried in the circuit court, when it was a subject of general inquiry and conversation; and the counsel of the tenants in the present case, were counsel engaged in that other case in which Howard's death was so put in issue: and that he, Willard, believed he has a sufficient legal title to enable him to recover. But there was no suggestion in any part of Willard's affidavit, that he believed, that Howard was living at the time this suit was commenced.

The circuit court adjourned the case to this court, for its opinion on the several points presented by the motion of the tenants, for the rule. These points are stated in the following opinion of the court, delivered by.

SUMMERS, J. The first question is, Whether the pleadings in this cause ought to be set aside, and the defendants permitted to plead in abatement, under the circumstances disclosed?

Pleas in abatement are regarded with great strictness; and no example is found of the reception of such plea after a plea in bar (except for matter arising puis 735 darrein continuance) *although it must frequently happen, that matter in abatement arising before suit brought, is discovered after issue joined. In Garrard v. Henry, 6 Rand. 112, 113, it is said by judge Carr, that the death of the demandant pending the action, abates the writ, and the court will ex officio abate the suit, at whatever stage the fact may come to its knowledge; but that the death of a party before the commencement of the suit, is a fact which does not itself abate the writ, but only falsifies and renders it abateable by plea; and that, if the tenant passes by the fact of such death, and joins the mise on the mere right, he thereby acknowledges the demandant is in life, and forever precludes himself from taking advantage of his death, in any manner or form. This is conclusive upon the first point.

2. The second question adjourned, is, Whether, if the pleadings are not now to be set aside, the court ought to stay proceedings until the persons prosecuting this suit, shall shew, by proof, that Howard was in life at the commencement thereof?

The institution of suits in feigned names, fictitious suits, and the suing in the names of others, without their privity and consent, have ever been held to be perversions of the process of the courts; and to guard against such abuses, as well as to punish them, the courts have been constrained to exert their superintending and protecting powers, by putting the attorneys, and those who have prompted such suit, under rules to disclose the person of the plaintiff on the record, his place of residence, and whatever may be necessary to guard against frauds of this kind, whenever the proper occasions have arisen. In Gynn v. Kirby, 1 Stra. 402, the attorney was summoned before justice Fortescue to produce his client, and an order made, that unless he produced him within a month, the defendant should be at liberty to sign a non pros.: he failed to produce him: a non pros. was signed; and on affidavit, that no such man as the plaintiff could be found, a rule was made upon the attorney to pay the costs; and on demand and non-payment, an attachment

736 ment *was awarded. The generality of the expression used by the judges in Garrard v. Henry, is not regarded as applying to this form of relief, since the questions here considered, did not arise in that case, and were evidently not within the scope of the examination there made. In Short v. King, 1 Stra. 681, a motion was made to stay proceedings in an ejectment, until payment of the costs of a former suit, and for notice where the lessors of the plaintiff were to be found; and the court denied the first, and granted the latter part of the rule. The power to interpose in this form, is abundantly sustained by authority; Shindler v. Roberts, Barnes, 126; Hooper v. Harcourt, 1 H. Black. 534; Butterworth v. Stagg, 2 Johns. Ca. 291; The People v. Bradt, 6 Johns. Rep. 318; Coxe v. Phillips, Ca. Temp. Hardw. 237, 4 Black. Comm. 285, authorities, which remove all doubt of the propriety of exercising the power in the case before us.

3. The third question is, Whether Willard, who instituted the suit and for whose benefit a recovery is sought therein, ought to be permitted to prosecute the same to final judgment, without first shewing, that the demandant was living at the commencement thereof, though he may shew evidence of title to the land in controversy, and deduce his right from the demandant?

The discussion of this point is rendered unnecessary by the decision of the second. It will suffice to say, that a claimant cannot be permitted to assert his rights in the name of a party no longer in life, except in a few statutory cases.

4. The fourth question is, Ought the circuit court further to inquire into the alleged contempt and abuse of its process, on the evidence now before it? and if so, does the institution and prosecution of this suit in the name of a dead man, amount to a contempt and abuse of the process of the court, in Willard, and the attorneys engaged by him in the institution and prosecution thereof, provided it shall appear, that they had knowledge of the death of Howard, before the commencement thereof?

737 *It has been already stated, that suing in feigned names, or in the names of others without their privity and consent, is an abuse of the process of the court: and the cases before referred to, shew, that the attorney, or the party at whose request the suit is brought, may be attached for the costs; and that where fraudulent purposes are manifest, the parties will deserve more serious animadversion. Upon the facts, as they now appear in the record, it is not apparent, whether the parties acted under a misconception of the law, or in conscious violation of it. Therefore, the court is of opinion, that the rule ought to be awarded, and an inquiry had as to this feature of the case.

5. The fifth question adjourned, is, What proceedings ought to be had, and what judgment given upon the whole matter?

Much of the ground covered by this inquiry, has been already disposed of. The answer given to the second question, and the reasoning upon which that answer is founded, shew the course which the circuit court ought, in the first instance, to adopt, on that branch of the motion; and as this proceeding has for its object, the protection of the rights of the tenants, every reasonable facility and indulgence should be extended to the opposite party, for procuring and exhibiting the proof necessary to discharge the rule, and which ought not to become absolute (from analogy to our statute providing for the revival of causes) until the second term, unless by consent of the party interested as plaintiff. Should the party who instituted and is now prosecuting this suit, ultimately fail to produce evidence of the demandant's being in life at the commencement thereof, the circuit court ought to dismiss the cause, and enforce the payment of the tenants' costs by the attorney, or the person who has employed him, according to the circumstances of the case.

So, this court certified its opinion to the circuit court: 1. That the pleadings in the cause ought not to be set aside, and the tenants permitted to plead in abatement.

2. That the court ought to stay proceedings in the cause, till the persons 738 *prosecuting it, shall shew, by proof, that Howard was in life at the commencement thereof. 3. That Willard, who instituted the suit, and for whose benefit a recovery was sought therein, ought not to be permitted to prosecute the same to final judgment, without first shewing that Howard was living at the commencement thereof, although Willard may shew evidence of title to the land in controversy, and deduce his right from Howard. 4. That the circuit court ought to award the rule applied for by the tenants, and make further inquiry as to the alleged contempt, and abuse of the process of the court. And 5. that, unless the party, at whose instance the suit was commenced, shall, within a reasonable time after a rule given for that purpose, produce proof that Howard was living at the commencement of the suit, it ought to be dismissed, and the payment of the tenants' costs enforced, by attachment, against Willard, or the attorney.

The Commonwealth v. Willson.

(Absent STUART, J.)

Grand Jury—Qualification—Keeper of Ordinary—Who is Not.—A. obtains a license to keep an ordinary; A. opens a tavern under this license, and B. is his partner in the business; but A. alone resides at the tavern, and acts as keeper thereof: Held. B. is not the keeper of an ordinary, disqualified to serve on grand juries, within the meaning of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 72, § 2.

This was a case adjourned from the circuit court of Fairfax.

Willson was presented in that court at May term 1830, for retailing spirituous liquors without license. A rule was made upon him, returnable to September term 1830, to shew cause why an information should not be filed against him upon the presentment; and upon the return of the rule he alleged for cause, that W. B. Butler, one of the grand jury which made the presentment, was, at the time of making the same, keeper of an ordinary, and therefore, not a good grand juror. Whereupon, the following state of facts, was agreed:

That in January 1830, the county court of Fairfax, granted to E. C. Butler, the brother of W. B. Butler, the 740 *grand juror objected to, license to keep an ordinary; which license expired at May term 1830; when the license was renewed, to expire at May term 1831. Both of these licenses were regularly perfected in the manner required by law; and by virtue thereof, a tavern was opened and kept from the 11th January 1830. On the 6th April 1830, a joint advertisement of the said E. C. Butler and of the said W. B. Butler was published, which stated that they had opened a house of entertainment, where they were prepared to accommodate travelers and others; the advertisers recommend their house and their accommodations; and they both signed the advertisement and gave it circulation. But W. B. Butler did not reside at the tavern, though he was there occasionally. E. C. Butler resided there constantly, and acted as the tavern keeper.

Upon this case agreed, sundry questions were adjourned to this court, and among others, the following: Whether the facts agreed were sufficient to prove or constitute the said W. B. Butler an ordinary keeper within the meaning of the statute which excludes ordinary keepers from serving on grand juries? See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 75, § 2, p. 264.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the resolution of the court, That the facts agreed were not sufficient to constitute W. B. Butler an ordinary keeper, within the meaning of the statute.

Criminal Law—Carrying Slaves Out of State.—T. carries the slaves of D. out of the state, without the owner's consent, with intent to deprive him of the slaves, until T. should receive a reward for apprehending and restoring them: Held. this is felony in T. under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 30.

Same—Same—Variance between Indictment and Record of Examining Court as to Name of Slaves—Effect.—Indictment against T. for carrying out of the state, four slaves, named Sandy, Henry, Poll and Hyatt the property of D. without his consent, and with intent to defraud and deprive him of the property; but the record of the examining court, shews he was examined, and committed, for so carrying away the three first named slaves, and another named Harriet, not Hyatt: Held. the indictment ought not to be quashed for this cause: and, the court instructing the jury, that the prisoner was not, under this indictment, to be convicted for carrying away Harriet or Hyatt, and the jury, with this instruction, convicting him: Held. further, this conviction is right.

Thomas was indicted in the circuit court of Hampshire, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 30, p. 428, whereby it is made felony for any person to carry any slave or slaves, not his own property, out of the commonwealth &c. without the consent of the owner, and with intention to defraud or deprive the owner of the property.

The indictment charged Thomas, with carrying out of the county of Hampshire, and out of the commonwealth, into Maryland, five slaves, Henry, Sandy, Poll and Hyatt, the property of E. Dunn, and George, the property of L. I. Dunn, without consent of the owners, and with intention to defraud and deprive them thereof. The prisoner upon being set to the bar, moved the court to quash the indictment; the court overruled the motion; and the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion.

This bill of exceptions sets forth the record of the examining court, and stated the ground of the motion to be, that the examination was not for the same offence, that was charged in the indictment. Upon a comparison of the record of the examining court, with the indictment, it appeared that one of the slaves was called Harriet 742 in the record, and *Hyatt in the indictment. And there was a statement added by the judge, that the name of Hyatt was by mistake inserted in the indictment instead of Harriet, and that upon the trial which afterwards took place, the court instructed the jury, that as to that slave it was not competent for them to find the prisoner guilty.

Upon the trial, the prisoner moved the court to instruct the jury, that "if they believed from the evidence, that the prisoner carried the slaves out of the commonwealth with the intention of getting a reward, and not with the intention of depriving the owners thereof of said slaves, they must find the prisoner not guilty." The court gave the instruction, but added thereto these words: "unless they should also believe from the testimony, that the prisoner did carry them out of the commonwealth, with the intention of depriving the owners of their said slaves until he should receive a reward for their apprehension." And to this addition to the instruction the prisoner filed exceptions.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, assessed a fine upon him, and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be three years; and the court passed sentence upon him accordingly. And now he applied to this court, by petition, for a writ of error to the judgment.

PER CURIAM (unanimously) the writ of error was denied.

743 *Poulson v. The Justices of Accomack.

November, 1830.

(Absent DANIEL, J.)

Justice of Peace—Removal from State—Resumption of Office on Return.—A justice of the peace of the county of A. leaves this state, with intent to establish his residence in another state; he remains in another state nine months, but does not establish his permanent residence there; and then he returns to, and resumes his former residence in, the county of A. HELD, he has no right to resume the exercise of his office of justice of the peace of A.

This was a case adjourned to this court from the circuit court of Accomack.

Upon the motion of Poulson, a rule was made in October 1828, by the circuit court, upon the justices of the county court of Accomack, to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, to command them to restore Poulson to his rights and privileges as a justice of the county court of Accomack; which rights and privileges were withheld from him. And upon the return made by the justices of the county court, an issue of fact was made up between the parties; upon the trial of which, the jury found the following facts:

That Poulson left the commonwealth about October 1820, with intent to take up his permanent residence elsewhere; that he remained about nine months in the state of Kentucky, but did not establish any residence of a permanent character there or elsewhere, until his return to Accomack county about July or August 1821, where he has resided ever since.

Whereupon, the circuit court adjourned the following question to this court: Whether upon the case found by the jury a mandamus ought to be awarded to the justices of the county court?

UPSHUR, J., delivered the resolution of the court, that this case was not distinguishable, in principle, from the case of Chew v. The Justices of Spottsylvania, 2 Virg. Ca. 208, and upon the authority of that case, the court was unanimously of opinion that the mandamus ought not to be awarded.

*Justice of Peace.—See generally, monographic note on "Justices of the Peace" appended to Wallace v. Com. 2 Va. Cas. 130. The principal case was cited in Bunting v. Willis, 27 Gratt. 161.

744 *The Commonwealth v. Snider.

November, 1830.

Indictment—Sufficiency of.—Indictment against a surveyor of a public road describing the road, but not naming the surveyor: HELD, insufficient and bad, on general demurrer.

Same—Record of Finding—Defendants' Names Not Given—Effect.—Record states, that two indictments against surveyors of roads are found true bills by grand jury, not naming the surveyors: HELD, this is not a record of indictments found against any particular surveyors.

At the circuit court of Pendleton, March term 1830, the grand jury found and presented sundry indictments, against several persons by name, and it was recorded that those indictments were found true bills, "and (the record proceeded) two other indictments against surveyors of roads true bills." One of these indictments was against the surveyor of that part or precinct of the public road on the South Fork of the Potowmac which passes by G. P.'s saw mill on the South Fork in Pendleton county. The indictment did not name the surveyor. A summons was issued against Snider, describing him as the surveyor; who appeared, and 1. demurred generally to the indictment; and 2. pleaded, that there was no record of the supposed indictment against him, to which "there was a general replication." Whereupon, the circuit court adjourned the following questions to this court: 1. Whether there was a sufficient record of the indictment having been presented in court by the grand jury as a true bill? 2. Whether the indictment was good and sufficient in law?

SMITH, J., delivered the resolutions of the court. A majority of the court is of opinion, that the decision of this court in Cawood's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 527, is decisive on the first point, that there is not a sufficient finding of the indictment shewn by the record.

As to the 2d question adjourned: the general rule is, that the name of the party indicted ought to be inserted. There is an exception to this rule mentioned in 3 Bac. Abr. Indictment, G. 2, p. 557, and 2 Hawk. P. C. ch. 25, § 68, "that an indictment, that the king's highway in such a place, *is in decay through the default of the inhabitants of such a town, is good without naming any person in certain." This exception is allowed, because of the difficulty, if not utter impracticability, of ascertaining and naming all the inhabitants of the town. But, in the case before the court, where the default is by a single individual, there is no reason why the general rule should not prevail. And we are unanimously of opinion, that the indictment is insufficient, and the demurrer ought to be sustained.

Criminal Law—Passing Counterfeit Bank Notes—Evidence to Prove Sceler.—Upon the trial of an

*See monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com. 14 Gratt. 674.

*Criminal Law—Passing Counterfeit Bank Note.—See monographic note on "Forgery and Counterfeit-indictment for passing counterfeit bank notes, proof that prisoner had, about same time, passed another note of same kind, which was thought to be a counterfeit and which he took back, though this note is not produced at the trial, is admissible evidence to prove the scienter.

Same-Same-Evidence-Notes Passed by Confederate.

—Upon the trial of an indictment against M. for passing counterfeit bank notes, the prisoner appears clearly to have been confederated with one L. in passing counterfeit notes, and present when L. passed such notes; the notes so passed by L. are produced in evidence against the prisoner: HELD, they are proper evidence.

Same-Same-Necessity for Testimony of Bank Officer.

—In a criminal prosecution for passing counterfeit bank notes, it is not necessary to prove the notes to be counterfeit, by an officer of the bank of which the notes are counterfeited.

Jury-Separation before Any Evidence Given-Effect.

—After a jury is empaneled and sworn, but before any evidence is given, three of the jurors separate from their fellows, for a brief space of time: HELD, such separation before any evidence given, is no cause for setting aside a verdict of conviction; especially, in the case at bar, where the separation was so momentary that any tampering with the jurors was hardly possible.

Martin was indicted, tried and convicted, of felony, in the circuit court of Botetourt, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 154, § 1, p. 578. He was convicted upon a count in the indictment, which charged, that he did, on the 17th December 1829, with intention to injure and defraud a certain 746 *W. Smith, pass and tender, and offer to pass and exchange, and cause and procure to be offered to be passed and exchanged, to the said W. Smith, a certain false, forged and counterfeited note, purporting to be a bank note of the bank of Virginia for twenty dollars, knowing the note to be false, forged and counterfeited. The jury ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary, to be ten years, and sentence was passed upon him accordingly.

He filed four bills of exceptions to opinions of the circuit court given at the trial; and after the verdict was rendered, he moved the court to set it aside, and order a new trial; which motion the court overruled, and to this opinion also he filed a bill of exceptions, wherein all the evidence which had been adduced at the trial, was set out at large. And now he applied, by petition, to this court, for a writ of error to the judgment.

From the evidence set out in the last bill of exceptions, it appeared, that one Lewallen, in December 1829, informed an illiterate youth, named Millirous, that the prisoner wished to hire him, to aid in bringing in some horses, which he was going to purchase over the mountains; and that Millirous went to the prisoner, and engaged with him accordingly, the prisoner stating to Millirous, that he would learn to trade &c. Soon afterwards, the prisoner having furnished Millirous with a small horse, they and Lewallen set out from Bedford, on their journey over the mountains. At their first stage, the prisoner gave Millirous a five dollar note, to pay the expenses of the three; which was done, and the surplus, in change, was paid to the prisoner. They staid the first night in Botetourt, where the prisoner gave Millirous two twenty dollar notes, and told him to swap the small horse for a large one. A swap was soon made with W. Smith, who required and received 50 dollars in exchange, the prisoner furnishing another ten dollar note. One of the notes paid Smith, was the note mentioned in the indictment. They all traveled together through Botetourt and Giles, and returned together to Bedford. During 747 this *journey, Lewallen bought several horses, and paid for them with counterfeit notes of the bank of Virginia; some of which were produced in court at the trial. The prisoner appeared to take no part in these purchases; but occasionally joined in conversation about them. The prisoner and Lewallen both concurred in stating that they were going to Kanawha; and were buying horses to move a family. After the swap with Smith, the prisoner rode the horse which had been obtained from him; and, subsequently, one purchased by Lewallen: and on their return, the horses were all shod at the expense of the prisoner. From these and other circumstances, that need not be particularized, the prisoner and Lewallen appeared, very plainly, to have been jointly interested in all these transactions.

1. The first bill of exceptions stated, that upon the cross examination of a witness for the prisoner, the counsel for the commonwealth asked the witness, whether the prisoner had passed to him a five dollar note of one of the Virginia banks, which was said to be counterfeit? to which the witness answered that he had, in the fall of the year 1829, passed a five dollar note to him, which was said to be a counterfeit of one of the banks of Virginia; but the witness did not remember which; and that the prisoner, afterwards, took that note back, and gave him another note in lieu of it. The prisoner's counsel objected to this evidence, because the note was not produced, and because the witness could not state, which of the banks it purported to be the note of. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence.

2. The second bill of exceptions, stated, that the attorney for the commonwealth, having adduced evidence of the facts (above stated) shewing the connexion between the prisoner and Lewallen, introduced a witness, who testified, that he had sold a horse to Lewallen then in company with the prisoner, during their same journey above-mentioned, for sixty-five dollars, which Lewallen paid him in notes purporting to be notes of the bank of Virginia. Upon 748 which *the counsel for the common-ing" appended to Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

*Same-Separation of Jury-Effect.—As authority for the position that the separation of the jury does not per se vitiate a verdict in a criminal case, the principal case, McCarter's Case, 11 Leigh 633, and Thompson's Case, 8 Gratt. 637, are cited in Phillips v. Com., 19 Gratt. 540. To the same effect, the principal case was cited in Thompson v. Com., 8 Gratt. 643.

The separation or discharge of the jury after swearing and impanelling but before the examining of witnesses is no ground of objection to a verdict. Dilworth v. Com., 12 Gratt. 706, citing the principal case.

In Toole v. Com., 11 Leigh 714, 717. It was held that in impanelling a jury for trial of an indictment of felony, there is no necessity to keep jurymen who have been elected and sworn together and separate from other persons, under charge of the sheriff, until the whole number shall be elected and sworn. The principal case was cited as authority for the decision.

See further, monographic note on "Juries" appended to Chahoon v. Com., 30 Gratt. 733.

wealth offered these notes in evidence. The prisoner objected to the admission of them; but the court overrule the objection. It having been farther proved, by the same witness, that on the night of the same day on which he saw the prisoner and Lewallen, a young man, who passed by the name of Leftwich, was with them, and he understood was travelling with them, the attorney for the commonwealth introduced this man, who was Millirous, as a witness; and he testified, that he was employed by the prisoner to go with him to buy horses; that the prisoner, Lewallen and Millirous, were all together at Smith's, when Millirous made the swap of horses with Smith, and gave him fifty dollars to boot; that he Millirous, had no money; that he got the money he paid Smith, from the prisoner, and the horse was for the prisoner; that he, Millirous, could not read or write, and did not know but the money was good, nor did he now know that the prisoner knew it was counterfeit. The prisoner objected to the admission of all this evidence; but the court overruled the objection, and admitted it.

3. The third bill of exceptions stated that the attorney for the commonwealth introduced persons other than bank officers, to say whether the note charged to be counterfeit, was a counterfeit or genuine note; and the prisoner objected to the admissibility of such evidence. The court overruled the objection.

4. After the verdict was rendered, a motion was made to set it aside on two grounds, 1. that it was not warranted by the evidence; and 2. the improper separation of the jury. The court overruled the motion; and the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions, in which all the evidence adduced at the trial was set out at large; including contradictory testimony as to the credit of the witness Millirous; testimony as to the prisoner's character; and testimony as to the credit of a witness, who testified favourably to his character. As to the separation of the jury, it appeared, by affidavits, that immediately after the jury was sworn (whether it had been charged with the case, did not appear, but certainly) before any evidence had been introduced, three of the jurors left their box: one was called back before he got out of the courthouse: the other two went out unattended by an officer; but the sheriff perceiving them, immediately pursued them, and brought them back to the jury box, within about a minute's time, without their being seen or heard to speak to or have communication with any body.

MAY, J., delivered the resolutions of the court. 1. As to the point presented by the first bill of exceptions: in a prosecution for uttering counterfeit money or notes, evidence that the accused had, about the same period, passed other counterfeit money or notes, of the like kind, is admissible as tending to prove the scienter. With this view, the evidence was properly admitted.

2. The prisoner moved to exclude all the evidence respecting the counterfeit notes paid away by Lewallen, for the purchase of horses. We think it may be fairly deduced from the whole evidence, that the prisoner and Lewallen were jointly interested, and had confederated, in thus passing counterfeit notes, in the purchase of horses, during their expedition over the mountains. If so, there could be no stronger evidence to prove that the note mentioned in the indictment, which was of the same description, and was passed to Smith, upon the same journey, was known by the prisoner to be counterfeit.

3. The commonwealth proved by persons well acquainted with the notes of the bank of Virginia, that the note in the indictment mentioned, was counterfeit. The prisoner insisted that the proof should be made by an officer of the bank. We are of opinion, that the evidence was legal and competent, to be weighed by the jury; and, therefore, that the objection was properly overruled.

4. The motion made for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence, was properly overruled. Without admitting, in any manner, the propriety of spreading the evidence on the record, as was done here, and in effect asking this court to review the decision of mere questions of fact; we are all of opinion, that the verdict is fully sustained by the evidence.

Then, as to the separation of the jury. No case has been cited, and we have found none, in which a separation of the jury, before any evidence has been introduced, has been held to be a sufficient cause to set aside their verdict. Coke, Foster and Blackstone say, that after the jury are sworn and charged with the prisoner, and after evidence has been given, the jury cannot be discharged or separated. In Burr's trial, it being impracticable to empanel a jury on the first day, four were sworn; and the question being made, whether they should be confined, the court held that it was unnecessary. We are not disposed to increase the rigour which has prevailed upon this subject. See The King v. Kinnear and others, 2 Barn. & Ald. 462; 7 Howell's St. Tri. 499; 19 Id. 671. There has been no decision of this court, which would require us to set aside the verdict for such a separation of the jury as is here stated.

It is proper to mention, that a majority of the judges have decided this part of the case, on the distinction between a separation before and one after the evidence commenced, without expressing any opinion as to the character of the separation proved; whilst others, upon the authority of Massey Thomas's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 479, and under a belief, that the possibility of any tampering with the jury, under the circumstances of this case, was too remote, are disposed to place it on that ground, without affirming or denying the principle adopted by the court.

November, 1830.

Forgery—Evidence—Possession of Forged Notes and Implements for Forging.—Upon trial of an indictment for forging bank notes, the fact if proved, of the forged notes mentioned in the indictment, and other forged notes of like kind, and the plates, implements and materials for forging such notes, being found in the prisoner's possession, is prima facie or circumstantial, presumptive evidence, that the prisoner was the forger, proper to be given to the jury.

Same—Same—Possession of Forged Notes in Certain County.—And such forged notes &c. being found in possession of the prisoner in the county of B. is like prima facie evidence, proper to be given to the jury, of the fact that he committed the forgery there.

Spencer was indicted, tried and convicted of felony, in the circuit court of Botetourt, at September term 1830, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 154, § 1, p. 578. The indictment contained two counts: he was convicted on the second, which charged, That the prisoner, at the county of Botetourt and within the jurisdiction of the circuit court thereof, on &c. feloniously, made, forged and counterfeited, and caused and procured to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, and aided and assisted in falsely making, forging and counterfeiting, a certain note, purporting to be a note of the farmers' bank of Virginia for ten dollars (which was regularly set forth and described) with intention to injure and defraud the president, directors and company of the said farmers' bank of Virginia. The jury ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be ten years, and the court passed sentence on him accordingly. But he filed three bills of exceptions to opinions of the court given at the trial; and now applied to this court, by petition, for a writ of error to the judgment.

1. The first bill of exceptions stated, that at the trial, the attorney for the commonwealth proved, that the prisoner was seen in the county of Botetourt, in November 1829, in company with one Lewallen, at a public house, and representing himself as a Dr. Davis, a hog drover, from Kentucky, and offered to shave a hundred dollar U. States note, but did not shew it; paid thirty seven and a half cents for repairing his watch, in good money; and inquired
752 the way *to the Big Lick in Botetourt: that he was seen on the 2d day of March court 1830, at a public house, with one Eppes in Botetourt, when he represented himself as a Dr. Davis of Tennessee, and said he was going to Nashville: that a warrant was then issued against him, to apprehend him for forgery, and he was pursued until the witnesses supposed he had left the county: that about twelve or sixteen days after, as he was passing through the town of Fincastle in Botetourt, on horseback, he was arrested and taken from his horse; and his saddle bags being examined, there were found in them above 3500 dollars in counterfeit money, includ-

Forgery—Evidence—Possession of Forged Notes in Certain Counties.—Upon the trial of an indictment for forging bank notes, evidence that the prisoner had the forged notes in his possession in a certain county is proper evidence to go before the jury of the fact that he committed the forgery in that county. To this point, the principal case is cited with approval in State v. Tinger, 32 W. Va. 552, 9 S. E. Rep. 937; State v. Poindexter, 23 W. Va. 814.

"It is not necessary that witnesses should be produced to testify that the offence was committed in the place charged. It is enough if the proof be inferential." State v. Hobbs, 37 W. Va. 816, 17 S. E. Rep. 382, quoting from Whart. Crim. Law (8th Ed. § 108), and citing the principal case.

See further, monographic note on "Forgery and Counterfeiting" appended to Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

The principal case is also cited in Perkins v. Com., 7 Gratt. 666; Wash v. Com., 16 Gratt. 541.

ing the ten dollar note for the forgery of which he was indicted; a number of plates, from one of which that note, and many others of the same denomination, were obviously struck; two canisters of ink, one not full; blank papers, about the size of a bank note, one of which had a slight impression of a bank note on it; part of the notes were imperfect, some of them unsigned, others completed, some erased; a five dollar U. States bank note with the engraving in part erased, and the signatures left; a twenty dollar U. States bank note plate; a plate with broker's marks engraved on it, and some notes with broker's marks on them, obviously made from the plate. He had some good money with him.

When the prisoner was examined, he represented, that he stopped at a house in Campbell county, and going to the stable to feed his horse, pulled down a bundle of fodder; that the notes fell out; that he took them to the master of the house, who said he knew nothing of them; that he carried them to Philadelphia, and brought them back with him; he represented the ink to be blacking. There was no evidence, that he had been out of the county of Botetourt, from the time he was seen in November, and no evidence that he resided in that county, or that he was ever in the county, except the times above stated. He proved, that a witness introduced by him, had, in October 1829, moved his mother from Franklin county, Virginia, to the state of

Kentucky; that he went with that 753 witness to *Kentucky, where they met with Lewallen: the witness returned in December 1829, but did not know when the prisoner returned. Another witness for the prisoner, testified that he had seen notes made in a bank in Ireland, and they used a press weighing about 500 pounds. And this being all the evidence in the case, the attorney for the commonwealth moved the court to instruct the jury, that the circumstances above set forth, were proper evidence for the jury, and were prima facie evidence, that the forgery was committed in the county of Botetourt, and proper for their consideration; which instruction the court gave; and the prisoner excepted to the opinion.

2. The second bill of exceptions stated, that, at the trial, the prisoner's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they were not satisfied from the evidence, that the forgery charged in the indictment, was committed in Botetourt, it was their duty to render a verdict of acquittal. The court instructed the jury, that they ought to be satisfied, that the making and forging, or assisting in making, forging and counterfeiting, was committed in Botetourt; but that the prisoner, being first found in possession of the other notes, plates, ink and paper, in the first bill of exceptions mentioned, in Botetourt, was prima facie evidence of the fact of his having counterfeited them in Botetourt. The prisoner excepted to the latter part of this instruction.

3. The third bill of exceptions stated, that, at the trial, the prisoner's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that, if they were not satisfied from the evidence, that the prisoner falsely made, forged and counterfeited, or caused and procured to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, or acted and assisted, being present, at the forging of the note in the indictment mentioned, they ought to find a verdict for the prisoner. The court instructed the jury, that, though they ought to be satisfied, that the prisoner either did forge and counterfeit the note, or act or assist in the making, forging and counterfeiting, or was present at the making, forging and counterfeiting thereof, yet that the prisoner being "in possession of this note, as well as the other notes, and plates and ink, found in his possession, was prima facie evidence of his having forged or assisted in forging the note in the indictment mentioned. To the latter part of this instruction, the prisoner excepted.

The prisoner, in his petition for the writ of error, assigned the following errors: That the court erred, 1. in instructing the jury, that the prisoner being found in possession of the note mentioned in the indictment, as well as other [forged] notes, plates and ink, amounted to prima facie evidence of his having forged or assisted in forging the note in the indictment mentioned; and 2. in instructing the jury, that the prisoner being first found in possession of the notes, plates, and ink, in Botetourt, was prima facie evidence of his having counterfeited them there.

F. W. Riasque for the petitioner; the attorney general for the commonwealth.

UPSHUR, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The most serious difficulty the court has had in this case, has grown out of the ambiguous phraseology of the bills of exceptions. Some of the judges think, that the expression "the prisoner being first found in possession of the other notes" &c. in the second bill of exceptions, and the expression "the prisoner being in possession of the note in the indictment mentioned" &c. in the third bill of exceptions, ought to be construed as an instruction by the court, that these facts were proved; and of course, that the court, in this respect, encroached upon the proper province of the jury. If this construction had been admitted by the other judges, there would have been no difference of opinion among us, in regard to the law. A majority of us, however, think, from an attentive examination of the record, that the judge meant to submit those facts hypothetically, and that the jury must have so understood him. The expressions above mentioned are not stronger than this, "it being proved, that the prisoner was found in possession" &c. which, without any violence to language, may be interpreted, if it be proved &c. or, if the jury shall believe &c. or, when it is proved &c. to which form of instruction no objection could be urged. We feel warranted in believing, that this was the meaning of the judge, and that the jury so understood him, from the particular terms used in the first bill of exceptions; where, after stating all the facts proved on the trial, the court instructed the jury, that they were prima facie evidence &c. If the instruction contained only these words, they would be precisely equipollent with the expressions "being found in possession" &c. and would receive the same construction: but the court, in the first part of this instruction, explains its own meaning, by saying that "the circumstances above set forth, were proper evidence for the jury." It is to be remarked that the court did not tell the jury, that the facts above proved, were proper evidence for its consideration, nor is there any other word or expression, which warrants us in concluding, that the court meant to assume that the facts were proved. "The circumstances above set forth," that is, the circumstances in relation to which evidence had been offered, were proper for the consideration of the jury. And how were the jury to consider them? Not as facts proved or assumed as true; but they were first to consider, whether the facts were proved or not, and if the evidence in relation to those facts, which the court first declared to be proper for the jury, should satisfy the jury, that the facts themselves were proved, then that those facts amounted to prima facie evidence of guilt, and were proper for their consideration, though not conclusive upon them. This, we think, the fair construction of the language of the court in the first bill of exceptions, and the construction which must have been placed on it by the jury. We think it correct, as a general rule, that where more than one bill of exceptions, is taken in a cause, the court, in considering any one of them, may refer to others, in order to ascertain the precise point to which the mind of the judge was directed, and the precise extent to which he *intended his instruction should apply. This rule is still more applicable to a case in which all the evidence or facts proved, appear in one bill of exceptions, and all the instructions given relate directly to those facts. In the case before us, the second bill of exceptions contains a direct reference to the facts or evidence stated in the first. The instructions in the two cases are in pari materia, and ought, as we believe, to receive the same interpretation. And though the third bill of exceptions contains no such direct reference, still we feel authorized, by the intimate connexion of its subject with that of the other two, to put upon that also, a similar construction.

Upon the whole, a majority of us consider the record in this case, as presenting only the following questions: 1. Is the possession of forged bank notes, together with the plates and other implements used in forging them, prima facie evidence, that the person so found in possession, did feloniously forge them? And 2. Is such possession prima facie evidence, that the forgery was committed in the place where such possession was first discovered?

1. By the terms "prima facie evidence," as used by the judge in the instructions before us, we understand only, such a state of facts, as upon first impression cannot be reasonably accounted for without supposing the guilt of the prisoner. In the absence of every thing to contradict or explain it, such a state of facts ought, in general, to be considered by the jury sufficient to warrant a verdict; but it would not bind them with the force of conclusive proof. It is nothing more than a high degree of presumptive proof, or in other words, such a state of facts, as cannot, by natural and fair construction, consist with the innocence of the prisoner. In some cases of presumptive proof, the influences would be strong and irresistible; in others, weak and wholly inconclusive. In all cases, the jury are to weigh the circumstances, and to draw from them whatever inferences they may warrant. The instruction, therefore, that the facts, in the present case amounted to prima facie evidence of 757 *guilt, was only saying, in other words, that they were such that the jury might (not that they were bound to) infer from them the guilt of the prisoner, without any auxiliary evidence. We think this instruction strictly correct. We can see no reason, why the possession of forged notes, with the plates and other instruments used in forging them, should not create as strong a presumption, that the person so found in possession is the actual forger, as the possession of stolen goods creates, that the person found in possession of them, is the actual thief. In both cases, the presumption may be repelled by proof, explaining or accounting for the possession; but in the absence of all such proof, the inference of guilt, upon any fair view of human conduct, is as strong in the one case as in the other. In the case before us, the inference is still farther justified, by the fact, that the prisoner was found in possession, not only of the note described in the indictment and of the plate with which it was made, but also of a large amount of other forged notes and the plates used in forging them. Apart from all direct authority, therefore, we consider the principle reasonable in itself, and strictly within the analogies afforded by other well established cases of presumptive proof. It derives strength also, from the authorities applying to the second question, which we now proceed to consider.

2. In the case of the U. States v. Britton, 2 Mason's Rep. 470, judge Story, sitting in the federal circuit court, decided, that a check drawn in Philadelphia, in favor of a person then in Philadelphia, but presented in an altered and forged state in Massachusetts, should be presumed, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, to have been altered and forged in Massachusetts. His words are these: "If its existence in a forged state, is not proved in any other place, it must, from the necessity of the case, be presumed to have been forged where its existence in such state is first made known." This decision is not opposed, if it be not supported, by the authorities relied on by the prisoner's counsel, for the contrary position. In Crocker's 758 case, 2 *Leach, 987, (better reported in 5 Bos. & Pul. 87,) the prisoner was indicted for forgery committed in the parish of St. Edmund in Sarum, Wiltshire: the forged note bore date in Somersetshire, in which county it was proved that the prisoner resided at the time of the date of the note; and there were other circumstances tending to shew, that the forgery was not committed in Wilts but in Somerset. The prisoner was pardoned, and the judges gave no opinion upon the point before us. We are informed, however, that it was understood that a majority of them thought the evidence not sufficient to prove the forgery in Wilts. In Thomas's case, 2 East's C. L. 605, the prisoner was indicted for stealing certain letters from the mail; and the venue was laid in Middlesex, where the letters were first found on him. Here also, there was conflicting evidence as to the place where the larceny was committed, and the jury expressly found that it was not committed in Middlesex. In Parke's case, 2 Leach, 775, the question before us did indeed, pass under the notice of the judges, but it was not the principal question, and was not solemnly decided either way. Parkes was indicted at the Old Bailey, for the forgery of a promissory note, which bore date at Righton, Salop. Some of the judges thought that the fact of his being founded in possession of the note in London, was prima facie evidence of his having forged it there; all agreed, that it was evidence proper for the consideration of the jury, but the majority without deciding, whether it was prima facie evidence or not, were of opinion that there was sufficient proof that the forgery was not committed in London; and therefore, that the presumption arising from the fact of his having been found in possession of the forged note there, was contradicted and removed. It is manifest that neither of these cases is in conflict with Britton's case. They no where disaffirm the principle, that the possession of a forged instrument is prima facie a presumptive proof, that the forgery was committed at the place where such possession was first made known, 759 but they all go upon the *ground, that there was sufficient counter proof in the particular case, to remove the presumption.

For these reasons a majority of the court are of opinion, that the writ of error ought to be denied. But in this opinion judges Lomax, May, Semple and Johnston do not concur. All those judges, after much consideration, have placed a different construction upon the bills of exceptions from that which is herein assumed. Had this been otherwise, judge Johnston would have concurred with the majority of the court; and judge Lomax would have so far concurred, as to consider the possession &c. as prima facie evidence of aiding and assisting, at least.

Judges May and Semple are of opinion, that although the evidence would have been legal and proper for the consideration of the jury, and that they might well have deduced therefrom the inference of the prisoner's guilt, yet that it was error to instruct them that it was prima facie evidence thereof.

Writ of error denied.

and mill dam, the property of the defendant, situate near to a common highway, without particular specification or description of the mill, and without expressly alleging that it is in the county wherein the indictment is found: Held, good and sufficient after verdict.

Stephen was indicted in the circuit court of Berkeley for a nuisance. The indictment stated, That the grand jury empaneled for the body of the county of Berkeley, presented, that Stephen, "being possessed of a certain mill and mill dam with their appurtenances, situate near and adjacent to a certain common highway and public road, and the *dwelling houses of divers of the good citizens of this commonwealth," did on the 1st July 1828, and on divers days before and since, unlawfully and injuriously permit the water of the mill pond to overflow the adjacent lands, as well of others as his own, and also the public road or highway; by means whereof the land so overflowed, was rendered and kept marshy, and filled and covered with noxious weeds and putrid vegetation, whereby the air became corrupted and infected, to the great damage and common nuisance, not only of the neighbouring citizens, but of all the good citizens of the commonwealth &c. Stephen put in a general demurrer to the indictment, and pleaded not guilty. The court overruled the demurrer; and, upon trial of the issue, the jury convicted him, and assessed a nominal fine; for which the court gave judgment against him. And now he applied by petition, to this court for a writ of error.

Nicholas, for the petitioner, endeavoured to maintain that the indictment was not sufficiently certain. The highway is not described; nor is any locality given to the mill or mill dam. There is not even an averment, that the mill and mill dam are in the county. That they are in the county, is only to be inferred from the introductory part of the indictment. If, however, this inference is to be construed into an averment, that they are in the county, still the indictment will be insufficient. It should have given a further description of the mill, so as to identify the same. Suppose Stephen had two mills in the county (as is not an uncommon case) he might, upon this indictment (if it be a good one) have been tried for a nuisance in regard to either; so that the indictment gave him no such certain information of the offence charged, as to enable him to defend himself. The charge is not "plainly and in substance set forth with convenient certainty," even within the statute curing defects in criminal proceedings, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 44, p. 611. But here there was a demurrer to the indictment.

tion, that same court only, upon the death of the administrator, has the jurisdiction to grant administration de bonis non.

The attorney general, on behalf of Lyons, moved the court to commit to the sergeant of the city of Richmond, the estate of John Robinson deceased, remaining unadministered. The former administrations were not granted by this court: administration was first granted to Edmund Pendleton and Peter Lyons, by the county court of King & Queen; and after the death of the survivor of them, the same court granted administration de bonis non to Dr. James Lyons, who had since died. And the attorney general said, that if administration had never been granted by the county court, there could be no doubt of the jurisdiction of this court. He insisted, that after the death of the person to whom the county court had granted administration, the jurisdiction of this court was reinstated. He likened it to the case of the grant of administration by an inferior court whose judgment was reversed. After such reversal, there was no subsisting administration; and it might be granted by any court which originally possessed jurisdiction over the subject.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., said, that after full consideration, the judges were unanimously of opinion, that the general court had no jurisdiction in the case: that, there having been a valid administration formerly granted by the county court of King & Queen, the administration de bonis non must necessarily be granted by the same court.

Instrument of Emancipation—Refusal of Court to Admit to Probate—Remedy.—A county court refuses to admit an instrument of emancipation of slaves to probate and record: Held, the circuit court cannot review this judgment, by way of appeal, writ of error or supersedeas.

Same—Admission to Record.—Quære, whether an instrument of emancipation of slaves, ought to be admitted to record, on the deposition of a witness non-resident of the state, and on proof of the handwriting of such absent witness, and of another subscribing witness, who is dead?

This was a case adjourned to this court, from the circuit court of Botetourt.

Upon a motion made in the county court of Botetourt on behalf of Mann and others, to admit to record an instrument of emancipation executed by Thomas Reynolds to his slaves therein named, which was opposed by Givens and others, it appeared, that the instrument bore date the 18th October 1797, and that Samuel Mitchell and Mitchell Porter were the subscribing witnesses to it; that Reynolds at the time he executed the instrument, resided in Botetourt; that the subscribing witness Mitchell was now a resident of the state of Illinois; and that Porter, the other subscribing witness, was dead: whereupon, the plaintiffs offered in evidence, 1. a deposition of the witness Mitchell, regularly taken under a commission issued by the court, upon due notice to the defendants, proving the execution of the instrument of emancipation by Reynolds, and Mitchell's attestation thereof: 2. proof of the handwriting of both the subscribing witnesses: 3. a copy of an order of the district court held at The Sweet Springs,* at October term 1797, shewing, that this instrument of emancipation, was then acknowledged by Reynolds before that court, and ordered to be recorded; and 4. an order of the county court of Monroe,* at February term 1821, shewing, that the instrument *of emancipation was then presented to that court, and that that court, upon proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, and of the death of one of them, and the non-residence of the other, admitted the instrument to record. And this being all the evidence, the county court of Botetourt refused to admit the instrument to record. An appeal was taken for Mann and others to the circuit court; which adjourned to this court, the following question, Whether this instrument of emancipation ought to be admitted to record, upon proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, one of whom was dead and the other a non-resident, and the deposition of the non-resident witness? And (as usual in adjourned cases) any other questions of law arising on the record.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. That the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the case by way of appeal, and the appeal ought to be dismissed by that court; and that it was, therefore, deemed improper to give any opinion on the specific question adjourned from the circuit court.

the oath, and order a discharge of the prisoner accordingly, refuse to do so, a mandamus lies from the circuit court to compel them.

This was a case adjourned to this court from the circuit court of Norfolk.

Harrison presented a petition to the circuit court at September term 1830, representing that he was confined in the jail of Norfolk county, for a debt which he was unable to pay; that he had appeared before Emmerson and Nash, two justices of the county, and prayed that the oath of insolvency might be administered to him, which they refused, notwithstanding he had complied with the requisites of the act, in relation to the notice and schedule; and that he afterwards appeared before Webb and Thompson, two other justices, who refused in like manner. He, therefore, prayed for a writ of mandamus, to compel the justices to administer the oath. A rule was accordingly made upon the justices, to shew cause why the mandamus should not issue. Emmerson and Nash made a return stating, that their reason for not discharging Harrison, was, that they were of opinion, from his confession in answer to interrogatories put to him, that he was in possession of personal property, which ought to have been included in his schedule, but was not mentioned; his schedule stating that he had "no property." And they proceeded to state the facts as they appeared before them, touching this matter. The other two justices made a similar return, referring to that of Emmerson and Nash. Whereupon, the circuit court adjourned to the general court the following questions:

765 *If a prisoner is brought before two magistrates, in order to take the oath of insolvency, and offers to take such oath, and to convey and deliver the property, real and personal, contained in his schedule, and to comply with the other requisites of the law; have the magistrates a discretion to administer the oath or not, on the ground that they have reason to believe, from his own admission, not under oath, or from the testimony of witnesses, that the prisoner has not included all his

that the usual practice in this state, and the most usual practice in this country, is to begin the proceedings by presenting to the court an application in the form of a petition setting forth in detail the grounds, upon which the petitioner asks a writ of mandamus. This petition in this state is usually ex parte, no notice that it will be filed being given to the defendants, and it is always supported by affidavit, when presented by a private person. Goshorn et al. v. Supervisors of Ohio County, 1 W. Va. 312; Board of Supervisors of Mason County v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 302; Shields & Preston v. Bennett, Auditor, 8 W. Va. 76; Barnett v. Meredith, Judge, 10 Gratt. 651; Sights v. Yarnalls, 12 Gratt. 293. If a prima facie case is presented by this petition warranting the relief sought, the court frequently issues a rule, which is served on the opposite party, requiring him to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue. Smith v. Dyer, 1 Call 563; Dew v. Judges of Sweet Springs, 3 H. & M. 1; Barnett v. Meredith, Judge, 10 Gratt. 652; Harrison v. Emmerson and Others, Justices of Norfolk, 2 Leigh 764; Board of Supervisors of Mason County v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 302; The Ohio Valley Iron Works v. The Town of Moundsville, 11 W. Va. 8. But in this state the issuing of this rule is frequently dispensed with; and the most usual practice is to issue the alternative writ immediately on the filing of a proper petition supported by affidavit. See Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 553; Shields & Preston v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74; Fisher v. The Mayor of Charleston, in tra." property in said schedule? 2. Does the return of the justices shew such a case as liberates them from further proceedings on the mandamus? 3. Will a mandamus lie from the circuit court to county justices, to compel them to administer the oath of insolvency, and discharge the prisoner; the circuit court having no power itself to administer the oath? And all other questions arising on the record.

PARKER, J., delivered the resolutions of the court. The first question propounded to this court, involves an important point of practice as well as of principle, which seems to have been differently understood in various parts of the state. We have carefully considered the statute for the relief of insolvent debtors, under which the question arises, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 31, 2, 3, 4, pp. 536, 7, 8. And a large majority of us are of opinion, that the magistrates, under the circumstances stated in the question, have no discretion to administer or not to administer the oath of insolvency, but are bound to do so, and to discharge the prisoner. The provision in the statute was made "for the relief of insolvent debtors," and "to prevent the long imprisonment of unfortunate people, which can be of no benefit, but rather a disadvantage, to their creditors." The conditions imposed are, that the debtor shall deliver in a schedule of his estate, take an oath of a very solemn and comprehensive character, which is prescribed in terms, and under the directions of the court, or persons before whom such oath of insolvency shall 766 be taken, transfer and deliver all the personal *estate contained in such schedule, and convey all the real estate therein to the sheriff. On complying with these conditions, he is entitled to his warrant of discharge. If the schedule does not contain all the debtor's property, but he fraudulently conceals any part of it, he is liable to the penalties of perjury; and all the estate contained in it, and any other estate which may be discovered to belong to him, is absolutely vested in the sheriff, and means are provided, in certain cases, for his recovering it. These are the sanctions of the law, and seem to be the only ones intended to be provided, to ensure a due compliance with that clause of it, which directs that the schedule shall contain the whole of the property of the debtor. No discretion is reserved to the court or justices, to refuse to administer the oath in consequence of their believing he is about to commit a perjury; nor are any means provided, by which they can inquire into the truth or falsehood of the schedule. They cannot summon witnesses to ascertain the fact; nor have they the power to propound any question to the prisoner himself; or to administer any other oath than the one prescribed in the statute. They act, indeed, merely as ministerial officers, designated by law to perform a prescribed duty. It is not probable, that the legislature would ever have confided to two justices of the peace, the power to decide, without appeal, and without the intervention of a jury, the delicate and often intricate questions, which might arise under a different construction of this law. If the justices can inquire into the fraud, and on that ground refuse to administer the oath, as they have done in the case at bar, their decision is final, and the prisoner must remain in jail, until their scruples are satisfied; and thus, the question of liberty or perpetual imprisonment, is made to depend upon the opinion of two individuals, who have not even the means of inquiring fully into the facts. We cannot believe, that such was the intention of the legislature, or that the words it has used are fairly susceptible of such a construction.

In confirmation of this idea, it may 767 be proper to mention, that *during the session of 1826-7, a bill was introduced into the house of delegates, founded on the admission, that a prisoner complying with the other requisites of the law, had a right to take the oath of an insolvent debtor, and to be discharged; the fourth section of which provided "that previously to the administering of any oath of insolvency to any debtor, it shall be lawful for any creditor by judgment, who may be affected thereby, his attorney or agent, to propound to such debtor any question or questions, touching his estate, rights, or credits; and if from his answers, or refusal to answer or any legal evidence, the court or justices, before whom the proceeding may be, shall believe that the debtor has fraudulently concealed, or disposed of any part of his estate to the injury of such creditor, or that the schedule offered is not a schedule of his whole estate, he shall not be allowed to take the oath of insolvency; and every such debtor may require a jury to be empaneled, to try the question, whether he hath been guilty of any fraud or concealment as aforesaid or not, or whether such schedule be a schedule of his whole estate," &c. It further provided, that if the application was made in court, a jury should be empaneled forthwith; but if before justices in the country, upon his finding bail to abide the result of the trial, he was to be discharged from custody; the trial to be had at the next court, either county or circuit, at the election of the debtor; and, if the jury found him guilty, he should not be allowed to take the oath, until all the estate which he might have fraudulently concealed or disposed of, should be surrendered in the mode prescribed by law. The movers and supporters of this bill, obviously, took it for granted, that the powers thereby proposed to be conferred, had not before been given to the justices or the court. It was advocated and opposed upon that assumption: and, notwithstanding the safeguards it provided against the abuse of the power, it was rejected by the legislature, in consequence, it is believed, of the impression, that the sanctions of the law were already sufficient.

768 *We, therefore answer to the 1st question propounded to us by the circuit court, that the magistrates, under the circumstances stated, had no discretion upon the subject, but ought to have administered the oath, and discharged the prisoner: To the 2d, that the return of the justices is insufficient to liberate them from further proceedings on the mandamus: To the 3d, that a mandamus does lie from the circuit court to county justices, to compel them to administer the oath of insolvency and discharge the prisoner; for which we refer to the decision and reasoning of the court, in the case of The Commonwealth v. Justices of Fairfax, 2 Virg. Ca. 9. And, lastly, that the circuit court ought to award a peremptory mandamus, unless (as has been intimated) the applicant has been already discharged from custody.

769 *Brown v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1839.

Criminal Law—Counterfeit Bank Note*—Indictment—Sufficiency.—An indictment for causing and procuring a counterfeited bank note to be offered to be passed, without stating by whom or how the accused caused and procured it to be done, is sufficiently certain, and good.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—An indictment for passing a counterfeited bank note to a slave, with intent to defraud the bank, is good.

Same—Witness—Accomplice.—An accomplice is a competent witness, in a criminal prosecution; and, though the accomplice, on a former occasion, denied on oath all knowledge of the facts to which he testifies at the trial, yet this goes only to his credit; and if the jury find a verdict of conviction on his testimony, and the court before which the trial is had, be satisfied with the verdict, the appellate court will not set it aside.

Jurors—Competency—Preconceived Opinion.—A person, being called as a juror in a case of felony, says, on voir dire, "that he had expressed an opinion on the circumstances as he had heard them narrated in the country; but he had not heard any of the evidence given on the examination of the prisoner, or conversed with any of the witnesses or parties; and he did not think the opinion so formed would have any influence on his mind in trying the case;" and this juror is challenged for cause: HELD, he is an indifferent juror, and the challenge for cause rightly disallowed.

Brown was indicted of felony, in the circuit court of Kanawha, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 154, § 1, p. 578. There were two counts in the indictment. 1. The first charged, that the prisoner feloniously caused and procured to be offered to be passed to a certain E. Perryman, three certain false, forged and counterfeited bank notes of the bank of the U. States, payable at its office of discount and deposit at New Orleans [setting out the tenor of the notes]

+Same—Witness—Accomplice.—In Dove v. Com., 82 Va. 307, it is said: "An accomplice is unquestionably a competent witness against a prisoner charged with a crime unless he has been previously convicted of an infamous offence, and he is competent alone—that is, an accused may be convicted on the testimony of an accomplice uncorroborated by that of any other witness; it being the duty of the jury in all cases to consider the evidence and judge of the credit of the witnesses. Byrd's Case, 2 Va. Cases, 490; Broten's Case, 2 Leigh 769; Oliver's Case, 77 Va. 590; Code 1873, ch. 195, sec. 21." This quotation from Dove v. Com., 82 Va. 307, is approved in Woods v. Com., 86 Va. 932, 11 S. E. Rep. 799.

To the point that a conviction may be had upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, the principal case is also cited in State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 742, 743.

±Same—Jurors—Competency—Preconceived Opinion.—In State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 324, 10 S. E. Rep. 641, the principal case is cited as one of the many cases in Virginia upon the incompetency of jurors in criminal cases, on account of preconceived opinions.

with intent to injure and defraud the said E. Perryman; he, the prisoner, at the time, well knowing the notes to be false, forged and counterfeited. 2. The second count charged, that the prisoner feloniously passed to a certain negro man slave named Milus, the property of J. D. Lewis, three false, forged and counterfeited notes of the bank of the U. States payable at its office at New Orleans [setting out the tenor of the notes] with intent to injure and defraud the president, directors and company of the bank of the U. States; he, the prisoner, well knowing &c.

770 *The prisoner being set to the bar, moved the court to quash both counts of the indictment. The motion was overruled. He then pleaded not guilty, and was put upon his trial. In empaneling the jury, one was called, who being examined on oath, said, "that he had expressed an opinion on the circumstances, as he had heard them narrated in the country, but he had not heard any of the evidence given on the examination, or conversed with any of the witnesses or parties, and that he did not think the opinion so formed, would have any influence on his mind in trying the case." Upon this the prisoner challenged him for cause: the court overruled the challenge; and the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion. And, then, he made a peremptory challenge.

The jury which was empaneled, found the prisoner guilty, and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be ten years. The prisoner moved the court to set aside the verdict, and order a new trial, on the ground that the evidence did not warrant the finding. This motion was overruled. But the judge made a statement of the facts, as they appeared in evidence at the trial, and ordered it to be made part of the record; from which it appeared, That the commonwealth introduced a witness named Ross, whose evidence fully warranted the conviction, if he was to be believed; but, on the cross-examination of this witness, it appeared, that he had been apprehended with the prisoner, and charged jointly with him before the examining magistrate, with the felony of which the prisoner was now indicted; but after some examination by the magistrate, he was discharged, and sworn as a witness against the prisoner; and, on that examination, he denied most, perhaps all, of the material facts to which he now testified. The witness was a young man between eighteen and twenty years of age; and he gave as a reason for this variance in his testimony, that the prisoner had informed him, that if he was examined, he could not be bound to disclose any knowledge he possessed, as in doing so he would implicate himself. It was also disclosed by the witness, in

771 the course *of the cross-examination, that he was to receive part of the profits of the counterfeit notes, which he (and he only) proved to have been given by the prisoner to the negro Milus, to be passed to E. Perryman. The manner of the witness, during his examination, was frequently hesitating; and, in some instances, as to collateral facts implicating himself, he prevaricated; but in his narrative of the main facts, which went to establish the prisoner's guilt, he was unembarrassed and consistent. The other evidence, if Ross's testimony was disregarded, was clearly insufficient to warrant the conviction of the prisoner. And the motion for the new trial was made on the ground, that Ross was an incompetent witness, or if competent, unworthy of credit.

The court passed sentence upon the prisoner according to the verdict. And now he applied, by petition, to this court, for a writ of error to the judgment.

The cause was argued by Johnson for the petitioner, and the attorney general for the commonwealth.

The objection to the first count in the indictment, was, that it did not state whom the prisoner caused or procured to offer the notes, or in what manner or by what means, he caused or procured them to be offered to be passed. And it was objected to the second count, that the intent was laid to defraud the bank of the U. States: that the intent must be laid to defraud the person to whom the notes were offered; or, when offered to a servant or agent, to defraud the master or principal. Sprouce's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 375, was chiefly relied on, to shew that there was good cause of challenge to the juror. And it was insisted, that the new trial ought to have been granted, since it appeared, that the verdict of conviction was founded on the testimony of a witness, who was not only an accomplice, but by his own account, had committed perjury in an earlier stage of this very prosecution.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. Objections to indictments under the statute concerning forgery *and counterfeiting, have several times been made before this court. In Rasmick's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 356, the indictment charged, that the defendants "did falsely make, forge and counterfeit, and did cause and procure to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, and did willingly act and assist in the said false making, forging and counterfeiting" &c. The court decided, that the indictment was sufficient on the ground, that it pursues the words of the statute, and that it is a transcript from certain approved forms to be found in the second and third volumes of Chitty's treatise on criminal law, founded on statutes similar to our own. In Huffman's case, 6 Rand. 685, this subject again came before the court. That was a motion to quash the indictment, before the jury were empaneled. An objection was made to the first count, that it did not set forth "the person, or persons whom the prisoner caused or procured to forge the instrument, and those with whom he willingly acted and assisted in the forgery." The objection did not prevail; and the court said, that where an indictment charges an offence in the words of a statute creating the offence, the indictment, as to the description of the fact, is good; and relied upon the authority of certain forms to be found in Archbold and Chitty, in which are found indictments upon the english statute of forgery of 52 Geo. 3, ch. 138, which our statute very much resembles. It has been urged by the counsel for the present petitioner, that these forms ought not to be relied on, since they do not appear to have undergone the adjudication of any court in England. It might be a sufficient answer to this remark, that they are published to the world as forms which have been used in the english courts without objection, for a long series of years; that they have been adopted after much deliberation; that, in the numerous prosecutions for forgery, and passing and uttering base coin, and counterfeited notes and other instruments, which have occurred in that country, these are the forms which have been uniformly used; and that under them many individuals have suffered the penalty of death. There is, however, at least one case, in which the subject was brought before the 773 *twelve judges of England; The King v. Holden and others, 2 Taunt. 334.

In that case, the count charged, that the prisoner feloniously "did dispose of and put away a certain false, forged and counterfeited bank note [setting out the tenor] with intent to defraud the governor and company of the bank of England, he the prisoner at the time &c. well knowing" &c. The objection made to the indictment was, that it was insufficient as being too general, neither stating in what manner nor to whom the notes were disposed and put away. The same case is reported in 2 Leach, 1019, and in Russell & Ryan's Crown cases, 154. Taunton says, the court did not pronounce any opinion, but the prisoners were executed; which would not have been, unless the court had decided that the indictment was right; and the other reporters of the case, say, that the twelve judges unanimously decided that the conviction was right. It has also been decided, that it is not necessary to set forth the particular manner by which the fraud was effected, which is a mere matter of evidence, although in all these cases of forgery, or passing or uttering base coin, or counterfeited notes, the intent to defraud some person or persons, or body politic or corporate, must be set out. 3 Chitty, 1043, citing 1 Leach, 77. Taking these approved precedents of indictments as evidences of the law, supported as they are by the decision of the twelve judges in the case of Holden and others, we think there can be no doubt, that, in all cases of tendering, offering, passing or uttering counterfeit notes, the indictment is sufficiently certain, if it pursue the words of the statute; if it sets forth the tenor of the instrument, thereby giving it a precise certainty; if it sets forth the scienter, and the intent to defraud some person, or corporate body by name. If the indictment moreover sets forth the person to whom it is tendered or passed, the degree of certainty and precision is greater than (it would seem) is absolutely essential. Nor can we see any real difference between such cases, and those of "causing and procuring to be offered to be passed," which is the charge in the first count under consideration. The statute is closely followed, *the tenor of the notes fully set out, the person to whom they were offered to be passed stated, and the intent to defraud and injure a particular individual distinctly charged. It was urged, that indictments for this offence, ought to pursue the form of indictments charging defendants with obtaining money by false pretences, which are not sufficient without stating what were the particular false pretences. The only statute that we have on the subject of cheats, is the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 153, p. 577, against those who counterfeit letters or privy tokens in other men's names, and which is taken from the statute 33 Hen. 8, ch. 1. In prosecutions under that statute, it is readily admitted, that the counterfeit letter by which the cheat is effected, must be set out according to its tenor; and that is required under the statute now under consideration; so that the precision which we require is just as great as that required in that instance. So the privy token should be stated, that the court may judge whether it is such false token as the statute requires should be used, to bring the party within its terms. The english statute of 30 Geo. 2, concerning cheats by false pretences, uses those general words alone; the courts have required, that the particular pretences should be set out in the indictment, because there may be some false pretences not within the statute, and the court should see what they were. 2 East's C. L. p. 837. The false pretences interdicted by that statute may be mere verbal representations, than which nothing is more evanescent; and unless the indictment fixes the character of those representations, there is nothing which the accused can be required to answer with any degree of certainty. But where a man is charged, that "he procured to be offered to be passed" a certain counterfeit bank note the tenor of which is set out, his attention is drawn to that particular thing which is offered, and the court cannot help seeing, that the procuring of the offering to be passed of that identical thing, is within the statute. But, however it may be as to the statute against false pretences, there is no doubt, that indictments against persons for forgery, and causing and procuring the forgery to be effected, *are in daily use in England, under a great variety of statutes, and that, in no instance, does the indictment charge the accused with having caused or procured any particular person to commit the forgery. Convictions and condemnations have repeatedly taken place under such indictments. See 3 Chitty, 1049, 1052, 7, 1060; 2 Leach, 732, 827. We think the objection to the first count cannot be sustained.

The objection to the second count is, that it alleges the notes to have been passed to the negro Milus, not to defraud or injure either him or his master, but to defraud or injure a corporate body, the bank of the U. States. It is not contended by the counsel, that a note cannot be passed to a slave: although a slave is not capable in law of holding property, except for his master, yet we know, in point of fact, that he may hold it, and that he is a person who may be dealt or traded with; and the law admits such fact, because we have a variety of laws, prohibiting free persons from dealing or trafficking with slaves without the consent of their masters. The objection seems to be, that the count charges the passing to the slave, with intent to defraud the bank of the U. States; which is thought to be impossible. The objection would be equally good, if it was passed to a free person: there is no more impossibility in the one case, than in the other. If Milus had been a free man, the count could not be bad, if charged that the note was passed to him, with intent to injure and defraud the president, directors and company of the bank, because it is within the express words of the statute. The evidence might not have supported the charge, but the charge itself could not be objected to. Neither can the objection be sustained where the passing is to the slave. But is it impossible, that there should be, in any act of passing a counterfeit note, an intent to injure or defraud the corporate body whose notes are counterfeited? The primary intent of every man who forges notes, or passes them knowing them to be forged, is to benefit himself: he intends to increase his own fortune by getting something for nothing. When he passes a counterfeit note of a hundred dollars to another person, he defrauds and injures that person, by obtaining from him, for a worthless piece of paper, property or money to the amount of a hundred dollars. The effect of the passing, is to injure the person with whom he deals; but his intent is to benefit himself. He knows, that the direct consequence of this act of felony, is to injure and defraud his neighbour; he is reckless of the consequence. Then the law steps in, declares, that every man shall be presumed to intend that which is the necessary consequence of his own acts. In this way only, can the law be understood which makes it felony to pass a counterfeit bank note to another, with intent to defraud that other. It is the same thing when the law speaks of the intent to injure or defraud the corporate body. The natural and inevitable consequence of counterfeiting bank notes, or of passing bad notes, is to injure the institution whose notes are so counterfeited or passed. It affects the interest, it impairs the credit of the bank. The man who passes them, knowing them to be counterfeit, is presumed to intend this which is the necessary consequence of his so passing them, and he therefore comes within the provision of the statute. In support of this view of the law, we have the authority of the english judges. Rex v. Mary Mazagora, Russell & Ryan, 291. That was an indictment for disposing of a forged bank note, with intent to defraud the governor and company of the bank of England. It appeared in evidence, that the prisoner disposed of this note and eight others, with a full knowledge that they were all forged. An inspector of the bank proved, that they might readily impose on others, but not on the bank inspectors, who always examined the notes offered at bank; and that it was not a probable consequence of the prisoner's act, that the bank would be defrauded by means of these notes. Bayly, J., directed the jury to say, what their opinion was as to the prisoner's intent to defraud the bank: the jury said, the prisoner intended to defraud whoever might take the notes, but that the intention to defraud the bank, did not enter into her contemplation. The judge referred this question for *consideration: Whether an intention to defraud the bank ought to be inferred, when that intention was not likely to exist in the prisoner's mind, and where the caution ordinarily used would naturally protect the bank from being defrauded? The judges decided, that the prisoner must be taken to have intended to defraud the bank, and, consequently, that the conviction was right. We are all of opinion, that this count, as well as the first, is good. And in these opinions, we are unanimous.

The next question presented to us, is, Whether a new trial ought to have been granted to the prisoner, on account of the incompetency, or want of credibility of the principal witness, whose evidence, mainly, produced the conviction? In Byrd's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 490, this court gave a very decided opinion on the competency of an accomplice as a witness, at any time before his conviction. The question of his credibility may surely be left to the determination of the jury, under the superintendence of the judge who tries the cause. The credit of this witness has been affirmed by the jury, and sanctioned by the judge, who heard and saw him. This court sitting as an appellate court, and knowing nothing of the evidence or of the witness, except as it appears on the paper, feels itself very incompetent to decide on the credibility of the testimony. Unless it was irresistibly clear, that the conviction was wrong, this court would not disturb it. We are unanimously of opinion, that no new trial should be granted in this case on that ground, and we give this opinion, without deciding on the propriety of the judge below stating the proofs which had been given on the trial, as has been done here.

The last objection arises from the bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court disallowing the prisoner's challenge to the juror for cause. It was argued, that Spruce's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 375, is decisive of this; and that Wiant, who was there called as a juror, had not formed and expressed a more decided opinion than did the juror here. But this *court is of opinion, that there is a difference between the cases. There the juror had heard the subject of the trial frequently in the country; had formed a pretty substantial opinion, and expressed it more than once; and this court understood the remark as meaning, that "he had made up, and expressed, a decided opinion." Here the juror says, that he had expressed "an opinion;" he does not say, he had expressed "a decided opinion." It may have been but little more than a vague impression. If it was an opinion formed without much deliberation, without much attention to the facts reported to him, or without reflecting on the various rumours he may have heard, it might be called an opinion, but surely it was one which was slight, which would readily yield to evidence, and which could not be said to be fixed, deliberate, decided. If the opinion was formed, upon the hypothesis that certain facts were true, without knowing whether they were true or not, then the opinion was merely hypothetical, and cannot be said to have been a "decided" opinion. In this case, the juror gives his own account of the strength or weakness of his opinion. He is called on (most probably by the prisoner) to give an account of the state of his mind: his own conscience is referred to; and as that is the only evidence we have on the subject, we must be guided by it. In Lithgow's case, Id. 297, the juror Irvine said, that although he believed he would be guided by the evidence, yet he would be "unwilling to trust himself." But here the juror says, he does not think "that the opinion so formed would have any influence on his mind in trying the case." It must then have been a slight opinion: it could not have the character of fixedness, deliberation, decision. It could not with propriety be denominated "a decided opinion." This case is more like Pollard's case, 5 Rand. 658, than like Spruce's. The court is of opinion, that the bill of exceptions shews no error; but two of our brethren, judges Semple and Upshur, dissent from this opinion.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

I. In cases before Courts of Law.

1. Judgment of a justice of the peace, affirmed by the county court, for debt, principal, interest, damages and costs, not amounting to $3 dollars 33 cents: HELD, circuit court has no appellate jurisdiction to review such judgment by certiorari or otherwise.

Hay's adm'x v. Pistor, Gen. Court, 707

2. A county court refuses to admit an instrument of emancipation of slaves to probat and record: HELD, the circuit court cannot review this judgment, by way of appeal, writ of error or superseas.

Mann and others v. Givens and others, Gen. Court, 762

3. A mandamus lies from circuit court, to compel justices of the peace to administer the oath of insolvency to a debtor in execution, and order his discharge, if upon being applied to, they improperly refuse to do so.

Harrison v. Norfolk Justices, Gen. Court, 764

4. See Mandamus, No. 1, 2, and King William Justices v. Munday, 165

II. In suits in Equity.

5. Upon appeals from interlocutory decrees in chancery, only so much of the cause is before the appellate court, as the court of chancery has acted upon.

Madden v. Madden's ex'ors. 377

6. Suit in chancery against A. and B. Decree against A. for debt, and against B. declaring a conveyance by A. to him fraudulent as against plaintiffs; ca. sa. issued on decree against A. for the debt, and executed; then B. appealed from the decree so far as it affected him; and "the court reverses the decree so far as it affected B. but HELD, that it could not reverse the decree against A. who had not appealed, though the court of chancery had no jurisdiction to make the decree against him.

Tate v. Liggit &c., and Liggit &c. v. Morgan &c.. 84

7. A. and B. are co-defendants in a suit in chancery for recovery of a parcel of slaves and an account of their profits; B. claims the slaves under a mortgage thereof to him by his co-defendant A.; there is a decree for the slaves and profits, against both defendants; B. alone appeals from the decree; the court, holding that the plaintiffs had no right, considered the whole cause before it, upon B.'s appeal, and dismissed the bill as to A. as well as B.

Dickenson v. Davis and others. 401

8. Upon a foreign attachment in chancery, against absent debtor and home defendant as garnishee, decree against absent defendant for debt, and against home defendant for a debt due by him to absentee, to be paid plaintiff in part of debt due him by absentee, the absentee being in default; the home defendant appeals: HELD, the home defendant cannot, in the appellate court, contest the justice of the decree as against the absentee, but only so much of it as affects himself.

ASSIGNMENT.

1. A holding a bond of B. places it in C.'s hands, to collect the money for him when due, and if not paid, to put it in an attorney's hands, to collect by suit; the money was not paid when due, and C. put the bond in attorney's hands for collection; then A. addressed a letter to C. telling him he owed D. about $200 out of the money B. owed him; and desiring C. when he collected the money from B. if A. himself should not happen to be present, to pay the whole to D.; and this letter being presented by D. to C. without accepting the order therein contained, only told him that B.'s bond was in the attorney's hands; the amount of B.'s bond to A. exceeded the amount due from A. to D.: HELD, the letter of A. to C. was neither an equitable assignment by A. to D. of so much of B.'s debt to A., nor a security given by A. to D. for the debt he owed him.

2. A is prosecuting debt against B. the surety of C. and C.'s father agrees in writing to pay the debt with interest, if A. will dismiss his suit against B. at A.'s own costs; A. dismisses his suit, generally; in assumpsit by A. against the father, upon his conditional promise to pay the debt: HELD, A. was bound to perform the condition strictly, in order to entitle himself to enforce the promise, and having dismissed his suit generally instead of at his own costs, he cannot recover upon the promise.

Couch v. Hooper. 557

3. And though the father subsequently approved A.'s dismissal of his suit against the son's surety, generally, yet A. not having averred such subsequent ratification in his declaration on the father's promise, that fact cannot avail him. Ibid., 557

4. A constable levies sundry executions sued out by A. on property of the debtors; the removal and sale of the property is forbidden by the landlords of the debtors, claiming that it liable for the rents; and A. the creditor and B. enter into a written agreement, to indemnify the constable "agreeably to law;" which agreement is signed by A. and B. and by C. also, though C.'s name is not in the body of the instrument; and this agreement is delivered to the officer, on the day and at the place of sale; A. B. and C. all acknowledging it as their act, and B. and C. declaring verbally, that they are A.'s sureties: HELD, this is the joint assumpsit of A., B. and C. to indemnify the constable, for removing and selling the property under A.'s executions *and paying the proceeds to him, and the sale of it by the constable is a consideration to support the assumpsit as to them all.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Where a bill of exceptions to an instruction of a court to a jury, states the instruction so vaguely and imperfectly, that its import and bearing on the case cannot be ascertained with precision, the appellate court will reverse the judgment, and remand the cause for a new trial.

Thompson v. Cumming. 821

2. A bill of exceptions to an opinion of a court, overruling a motion for a new trial, sets forth all the evidence adduced by both parties; but the evidence thus set forth, shews that there was no conflicting evidence, and that excluding all the evidence of the party against whom the verdict was found, and admitting the truth of all the evidence adduced for the party for whom the verdict was found, the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and to justice: HELD, such exceptions, in such a case, are well taken, to enable an appellate court to review and reverse the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

Ewing v. Ewing. 337

3. The principle of Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125, and Carrington v. Bennett, 1 Leigh. 340, explained and approved. Ibid., 337

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

In an action, by holder against indorser, on a bill of exchange, whereof the drawee has refused acceptance when it was presented, and afterwards refused payment when demanded at maturity: HELD, not enough, to charge the indorser, to prove protest for non-payment and due notice thereof to the indorser: It is necessary to prove due notice to him of the dishonour of the bill by the non-acceptance.

Thompson v. Cumming. 821

BOND.

I. Sealing and Delivery.

1. P. agrees to join H. W. as his surety in a forthcoming bond, and executes and delivers the bond, as an escrow, upon condition that K. shall also join in and execute the bond as co-security; and K. agrees to join as surety in the bond, and executes and delivers the same, as an escrow, upon condition that O. W. shall also join in and execute the bond as co-security; but O. W. never unites in the bond: HELD, that upon this state of facts, neither P. nor K. is liable for any part of the debt in equity, any more than they would be liable for any part of it at law, where the facts would amount to proof of non est factum.

King v. Smith and others, and Porterfield v. Same. 157

II. Misrepresentation at the time of execution.

2. A. fi. fa. being sued out by J. against M. and being in the hands of the sheriff, M. the debtor, applies to G. to join him in a forthcoming bond thereon, and represents to him, in the sheriff's presence, that the amount of the debt is about one seventh of the real amount, which representation the sheriff does not contradict; whereupon G. consents to become the surety, and M. and G. sign and seal a forthcoming bond, blank as to the amount of the execution and as to other material particulars, and deliver it to the sheriff, who afterwards fills up the blanks; and execution is awarded upon this forthcoming bond: HELD, G. is not entitled to relief in equity against the obligation of the bond, upon the ground of the deception which induced him to execute it as the creditor to whom it was taken was no party to the fraud, and the sheriff, who was party to it, was not the creditor's agent in taking the bond.

Gordon v. Jeffery, 410

III. Construction of the Instrument; and what will amount to a breach.

3. A. having been guardian of B. and C. and B. being out of country, and C. the younger of the 783 wards having attained to full age, A. delivers to C. six slaves, the property of both wards in equal shares, and takes bond and surety from C. with condition, that, if B. returns to the country, or in any other manner claims his proportion of said slaves and their hires, and receives satisfaction from C. then obligation to be void &c.: HELD, C. and his surety are bound by this bond, though B. die without ever returning to country, to indemnify A. against the claims of B.'s representatives.

Lamb v. Harrison's adm'or, 525

4. One of distributees of B. sues D. as executor of A. his former guardian, for her share of B.'s moiety of the slaves, and recovers decree in chancery for value of share, but no legal representative of B. is party to that suit; and this recovery, and payment of amount recovered, are alleged as breach of condition of C.'s indemnifying bond, in an action thereon against C.'s surety: HELD, it is a breach thereof; and defendant cannot in this action, contest the regularity of the decree in chancery, or take advantage of any error in it; neither can he plead, that D. was never the executor of A.

Ibid., 553

IV. Of Statutory Bonds.

5. Bond with surety taken from an administrator with will annexed, with condition, not in form prescribed by law for official bond of administrator with will annexed, but in form prescribed for an administrator, and not exactly conforming even to that: HELD, this is not a good statutory bond, and no suit, either at law or in equity, can be maintained against the surety for the benefit or at the relation of a legatee.

III. When a new Statute repeals an old one.

5. By statute of 1819, grand larceny is defined stealing goods to value of $4 and upwards, and punished by imprisonment &c. not less than one nor more than three years; by statute of 1824, larceny committed after 1st May 1824, to value of $10 and upwards, is defined grand larceny, and punished as grand larceny theretofore was; and larceny of goods of less value than $10, is defined petit larceny, and punished as petit larceny theretofore was; and the latter statute neither makes provision as to larcenies committed before 1st May 1824, nor contains any express repeal of the former statute. HELD, the latter statute does not repeal the former, as to larcenies committed before 1st May 1824.

1. Deeds of gift, or of release and acquittance, made by ward to guardian, or person who has borne part of guardian, shortly after ward's attainment to full age, but before delivering of ward's estate, and without any settlement of account, are void on a principle of public policy, without proof of actual fraud; much more, if circumstances of transaction evince actual fraud.

Waller v. Armistead's adm'ors, 11

2. No just distinction, in this respect, between deeds of gift, and deeds of release and acquittance, by ward to guardian: both equally condemned by equity. Ibid., 11

II. Where made for an Expectant Interest, or Price is inadequate.

3. Inadequacy of price, whether it be so gross as to be per se proof of fraud or not, if attended by circumstances evincing unconscientious advantage taken by vendee of improvidence and distress of vendor, will avoid the contract in equity, though it be a contract executed.

McKinney v. Pinckard's ex'or, 149

4. Quære, whether every vendor of an expectant interest is not to be regarded in equity as a young heir dealing for his expectancies? Ibid., 149

5. But clear, that very anxious protection is extended by equity to all persons selling expectant interests, whether they stand in relation of expectant heirs or not, and trivial circumstances, added to inadequacy of price, sufficient to set aside such sales. Ibid., 149

COVENANT.

1. Upon a sale of land by T. to B. the vendors covenants for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to warrant the land to B., his heirs and assigns; B. is evicted, and brings covenant for breach of this warranty: Held, the proper measure of damages is the purchase money with interest from the date of the actual eviction, the costs incurred in defending the title, and such damages as the vendee may have paid, or may be shewn to be clearly liable to pay, to the person who evicted him. Threlkeld's adm'r v. Fitzhugh's ex'x, 451

2. But, though the purchase money with interest &c. was held to give the proper measure of damages in the particular case, the opinions of the judges leave it still questionable, whether the actual value of the land at the time of sale, if proved to be greater than the purchase money, with interest &c., may not be justly demanded. Ibid., 451

EASEMENT.

How Commonwealth may ratify a contract for purchase of the fee.

A county court, empowered by act of assembly in 1784, to select a place on which to establish an inspection of hemp and hemp warehouses, and if the proprietor of the ground will not erect the warehouses, to cause them to be erected at public expense, but not empowered by the law to purchase the ground itself for the commonwealth, contracts with the proprietor to purchase the ground itself, and orders payment of the purchase money thereof out of the treasury, and the same is paid to the proprietor accordingly: the commonwealth holds the ground till 1797, when the inspection is discontinued, and thenceforth till 1816, when an act of assembly is passed, claiming this ground as the property of the state, putting it under care of the executive, and directing it to be sold: Held, that the actual holding possession under the contract of the county court, and the assertion of the right of property by the act of 1816, are a ratification of the contract made for the purchase of the ground by the county court, and a sanction of the contract.

EMANCIPATION.

I. How Instruments of Emancipation must be proved or acknowledged.

1. Semble, an instrument of emancipation, being partly proved in the court of the county where the emancipator resides at the time, may be fully proved in the same county, though before full proof made, the emancipator removes to another county.

Thriff v. Hannah &c.,

2. Quære, whether an instrument of emancipation of slaves, ought to be admitted to record, on the deposition of a witness non-resident of the state, and on proof of the handwriting of such absent witness, and of another subscribing witness, who is dead?

Mann and others v. Givens and others,

3. See Appellate Jurisdiction, No. 2. and Mann and others v. Givens and others,

762

II. When instrument takes effect.

4. A feme sole, owner of slaves, makes a written instrument of emancipation of them, in November 1798, to take effect in futuro; this instrument is attested by two witnesses; it is partly proved by one of them, and continued for further proof, in April 1799, in the county court of Fluvanna, where the emancipator then resided: in November 1799, the emancipator holding the persons named in her instrument of emancipation, in her possession, marries T. who is ignorant of the execution of the instrument; then, T. removes with his wife to Albemarle, carrying the persons named in the instrument of emancipation, with him as slaves: the wife dies in 1811: the husband continues to hold the persons in question, as his slaves: in 1819, the instrument of emancipation is fully proved by the other attesting witness, in the county court of Fluvanna; and, afterwards, the persons therein named, bring a suit against the husband, to recover their freedom:

Held, under the statute of Virginia, an instrument of emancipation is ineffectual to confer freedom, till full probat thereof be made according to law, and takes effect only from the date of the complete probat; and as the rights of the husband, in this case, attached to the property long before full probat was made, the subsequent full probat did not divest or affect those rights, or give any right to freedom.

III. Construction of instrument.

5. Testator, by will, in 1819, bequeaths "and provides" "if it be agreeable to the laws of this state, Virginia, that after death of my wife, it is my will, that the following slaves owned by me, viz. Joan &c. shall, as soon as they attain the age of 31 years, be freed; and I appoint my friends J. M. and E. H. trustees for the liberation of said slaves, and for them to make the necessary application to court, on said slaves' behalf, both as to their freedom and their remaining in the state. If the laws of the state be against such procedure, then my will is, that said slaves be equally divided among my children &c." Held, upon construction of this will, that it was not testator's intention to emancipate these slaves, unless by change of law they might be permitted to remain as free persons in Virginia; and as by the law at date of will and of testator's death, and at death of his widow, these slaves, if emancipated, could not be allowed to remain in Virginia, they are not entitled to their freedom, but pass to testator's children.

EQUITABLE ASSETS.

1. Upon a bill by certain creditors of a decedent, to charge the debts due them, on the debtor's real estate in the hands of his devisees, the court ought always to make an order to call in all creditors, to receive their dividends of the real assets.

EQUITY.

The maxim of courts of equity, that a plaintiff asking equity, must do equity to the party against whom he asks it, applies only to cases where the plaintiff is wholly without remedy at law, and is entirely dependent on the court of equity for relief.

ESTATES TAIL.

1. Tenant in fee tail general aliens in fee, by deed of lease and release with general warranty, 1769; and tenant in tail lives till 1816, and then dies leaving issue: Held, that the statutes of 1776 and 1785, abolishing entails, barred the issue, and converted the estate tail, even though it were in abeyance, into a pure and absolute fee, and confirmed the fee simple to the tenant in tail's alienee in fee.

2. S. W. tenant in tail, in 1783, covenants to stand seized to use of L. W. his then eldest son and heir apparent, and his heirs, in fee simple; and then subjoins a covenant, that L. W. may immediately after his S. W.'s death enter upon and enjoy the land; L. W. died before S. W. who always continued in possession; Held, this conveyance worked no change in S. W.'s estate, but he continued seized of an estate tail as before it was made, and therefore, the limitation of the estate to L. W. after S. W.'s death, was void; neither did L. W. acquire any seizin in fact or in law, upon which a writ of right could be sustained.

ESTOPPEL.

1. A suit in chancery and decree therein, can neither be pleaded in bar, nor given in evidence, in an action at law, between the same parties, unless the very same matter of controversy was involved in both suits, and unless the court of chancery had competent jurisdiction to decide the matter. Therefore, where P. filed bill in chancery against C. charging fraud practised by defendant in sale of a slave, and praying that the contract might be rescinded, and that C. might be enjoined from taking measures to recover the purchase money of P. and the bill was dismissed on a hearing; and then P. brought an action at law against C. to recover damages for breach of warranty of the soundness of the slave: Held, the proceedings and decree 789 in the "suit in chancery could neither be pleaded by C. in bar of the action at law, nor was the record thereof admissible evidence on the trial of the action at law.

EVIDENCE.

I. Matter of record and proceedings of Courts.

1. In a suit in chancery, though the defendants are in default; yet the record or proceedings in another suit inter alios, is not competent evidence against them.

Frazier & c. v. Frazier's ex'ors & c., 642

2. A suit in chancery and decree therein can neither be pleaded in bar, nor given in evidence to prove the matter which is the ground of the decree, in an action afterwards between the same parties, unless the very same matter of controversy was involved in both suits, and unless the court of chancery had competent jurisdiction to decide the matter. See Estoppel, No. 1, and

Pleasants v. Clements, 474

3. A motion is made against a sheriff for default of his deputy, upon which the sheriff, with assent of the deputy, but without the knowledge of his sureties, confesses judgment: Held, the record of this judgment, is admissible evidence against the deputy's sureties, upon a motion by the sheriff against the deputy and his sureties.

Jacobs v. Hill and others, 393

4. See Motion, No. 9, and

Fletcher v. Chapman, 560

II. Written documents and parol evidence in relation thereto.

5. Parol evidence is not admissible to vary, contradict, add to, or explain, a written agreement; but, in cases of equivocal written agreements, the circumstances under which they were made, may be given in evidence to explain their meaning.

Crawford and others v. Jarrett's adm'or, 630

6. In ejectment for land in Wood county, lessor of plaintiff claims under grant of land described in the patent as lying in Monongalia; defendant shews by the statute of 1784, dividing Monongalia and establishing Harrison county, and other evidence, that the land described in the patent, at the date of the patent, lay not in the then county of Monongalia, but in that of Harrison, and that no part of the present county of Wood was then part of Monongalia: Held, competent to plaintiff to prove, that the land in Wood was the same land granted by the patent, notwithstanding the error of the patent as to the county it lay in.

be dead, or otherwise not capable of attending the trial.

Pleasants v. Clements, 474

IV. Confessions and Declarations.

9. If a threat be made, or promise held out, to a person in custody on a charge of felony, to induce him to make confession, and he denies his guilt at the time, but afterwards makes a confession, which appears, from the time and circumstances, not to have been induced by such previous threat or promise, this confession, so afterwards made, is a voluntary one, and proper evidence against him on his trial.

V. Competency of witness.

11. In suit by persons held in slavery against their master to recover their freedom, defendant claimed plaintiffs as slaves by purchase of them as slaves from W. K. deceased; and plaintiffs offered K. K. widow of W. K. to prove that W. K. in his lifetime, before sale to defendant, repeatedly declared, in presence of his family, and without injunction of secrecy, that mother of plaintiffs then held by him in slavery, was an Indian woman: Held, widow not competent witness to prove such declarations of her deceased husband.

Beverly v. Brooke and others, 425

13. And though A. the mortgagor, after executing the second mortgage, having been arrested under a ca. sa. had been discharged as an insolvent debtor, upon surrendering all his effects, which had been sold for a sum less than the debt for which he had been taken in execution; and though A. therefore, in his answer to the bill of B. the first mortgagee, disclaimed all interest in this controversy between his creditors; yet though B. put in no replication to this answer; yet Held, that, this disclaimer of interest did not restore A.'s competency as a witness for his co-parties to prove the usury against B. since he could not by such disclaimer exempt himself from liability to any personal decree to which B. might be entitled against him either for debt or costs. •

EXECUTIONS.

I. What may be taken under a Fieri Facias.

1. H. makes a bill of sale of slaves to C. without any consideration, and notwithstanding the deed, remains in uninterrupted possession for 25 years, and dies in possession; after his death, his widow claims these slaves as her own property, and holds adversary possession of them for more than five years; then administration of H.'s estate is committed to the sheriff, who gets possession of the slaves, and a creditor of H. who had recovered judgment against the sheriff administrator, levies an execution on one of them, which is sold to satisfy the same; in detinue by the widow against the purchaser: HELD, that though H.'s bill of sale to C. was good as between the parties, yet being fraudulent as to H.'s creditors, and the subject having come to the hands of H.'s administrator, it was liable to execution at the suit of a creditor of H. and the levy of such execution and the sale under it may be pleaded in bar of any claim set up by C. the fraudulent grantee under the fraudulent bill of sale.

II. Under an Elegit.

2. Real estate is vested in a trustee by deed of marriage settlement, in trust to pay the wife an annuity out of the profits, and, subject to the annuity, in trust for a son of the grantor; while the annuitant is yet living, a creditor of the son recovers a judgment against him: HELD, that the son's equitable interest in the estate cannot be taken in execution at law.

Coutts v. Walker. 368

III. Lien of a Capias ad Satisfaciendum.

3. The question in Jackson v. Heiskell, 1 Leigh, 257, reconsidered in a full court, and decided contrary to the decision in that case.

Foreman v. Loyd and others. 284

*4. Several creditors recover judgment against N., and sue out writs of ca. sa., upon which he is taken and charged in execution; then F. recovers judgment against the same debtor, and sues out an elegit, on which his lands are extended, and a moiety delivered to F.; and then the debtor is regularly discharged from custody under the writs of ca. sa. as an insolvent debtor, putting into his schedule the whole of the lands which had been extended under F.'s elegit: HELD, the lien of the writs of ca. sa. executed, given by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 10, does not overreach and avoid the extent under F.'s elegit. Ibid., 284

IV. When a second Execution may issue.

5. Construction of the 3d section of the statute of executions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134: It authorizes a party who has sued out one execution, to sue out other executions, if the first be not returned and be not executed; if the first be executed, though not returned, the party is not entitled to sue out any other execution.

6. If a debtor be arrested on a ca. sa. and discharged by order of the creditor or his agent, no other execution can be had on the same judgment or decree. Ibid., 361

7. If a debtor in custody under a ca. sa. be permitted to escape, the creditor is entitled to another execution against the debtor as well as to an action against the sheriff for the escape. By GREEN, J., in S. C., 361

V. Remedy against Sheriff for not returning Execution.

8. A fi. fa. sued out by C. against P. is delivered to the sheriff, and P. the debtor pays the amount of the execution to C. the creditor; the sheriff fails to make due return of the execution: HELD, P. the debtor cannot maintain a motion in the name of C. the creditor against the sheriff for a fine for failing to return the execution, even though the debtor were a party injured thereby.

Fletcher v. Chapman. 560

9. Neither the statute which gives a motion against a sheriff for a fine for failing to return an execution, nor the statute which gives a motion to the sheriff against his deputy, to recover the amount of fines imposed upon the sheriff for the alleged defaults of the deputy, is imperative on the court to give such judgments; but the court, in its sound discretion, may give or deny judgment in such cases.

Ibid., 560

VI. Remedy where Execution Issues Irregularly.

10. A fi. fa. is directed to the sheriff of Campbell, but is delivered to and levied by the serjeant of Lynchburg, who takes a forthcoming bond upon it, reciting that the writ had been directed to the serjeant: HELD, the writ gave no authority to the serjeant, and no warrant to him to take the forthcoming bond, and that the bond is variant from the execution, and therefore the bond ought to be quashed.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

I. What Court may grant Probate or Administration.

A resident of Kentucky dies intestate there, having no estate in Virginia, but a claim on this commonwealth for money: HELD, the circuit court of Henrico county, wherein is the seat of government, has jurisdiction to grant administration of such decedent's estate.

Commonwealth v. Hudgin. 248

2. Letters of administration granted by a court having no jurisdiction to grant them, are merely void; and the court having competent jurisdiction to grant the administration, may proceed to grant it, though the letters of administration before improperly granted, have not been revoked.

Ex parte Barker, Gen. Court. 719

3. When administration of a decedent's estate has been duly granted by any court of competent jurisdiction, that same court only, upon the death of the administrator, has the jurisdiction to grant administration de bonis non.

Ex parte Lyons, Gen. Court. 761

II. Who should be preferred in granting Administration.

4. A person dies intestate in 1825; and in 1830, a distributee and a creditor come, at the same time, to ask administration: HELD, the court has no discretion to choose between them, but must prefer the distributee.

Haxall v. Lee. 267

III. Bond required of Executor or Administrator.

5. Bond with surety taken from an administrator with will annexed, with condition, not in form prescribed by law for official bond of administrator with will annexed, but in form prescribed for an administrator, and not exactly conforming even to that: HELD, this is not a good statutory bond, and no suit either at law or in equity, can be maintained against the surety, for the benefit or at the relation of a legatee.

6. Quære, whether such a bond be good as a common law bond, for the indemnity of the justices to whom it was given? Ibid., 642

IV. Remedies of Executor or Administrator.

7. Testator bequeaths slaves to his son G. for life, remainder to G.'s children; the executor, being apprehensive that G. will sell the slaves to persons who will carry them out of the state, applies to court of chancery to restrain G. from so doing, and to compel him to give security that the property shall be forthcoming at his death for the legatees in remainder; the executor alleging that he had never assented to the legacy, and the legatee for life alleging that he had assented thereto: HELD, if the executor had not assented to the legacy, he had plain remedy at law to recover the subject; if he had assented to it to the legatee for life, that assent enured to benefit of legatees in remainder, and though they might, the executor could not, ask the aid of the court to secure the subject to the legatees in remainder.

V. Remedies of Administrator de bonis non.

Heffernan's adm'or &c. v. Grymes' adm'or &c., 512

10. A. having been guardian of B. & C., and B. being out of country, and C. the younger of the wards, having attained to full age, A. delivers to C. six slaves, the property of both wards in equal shares, and takes bond and security from C., with condition that if B. returns to the country, or in any other manner claims his proportion of said slaves, and their hires, and receive satisfaction from C., then obligation to be void &c. One of distributees of B. sues D. as executor of A., his former guardian, for his share of B.'s moiety of the slaves, and recovers decree in chancery for value of share, which is satisfied out of A.'s estate: Held, the administrator de bonis non of A. is entitled to an action on the indemnifying bond given by C. to A. to recover the amount so paid from C.'s surety therein bound.

Lamb v. Harrison's adm'or &c., 525

VI. Remedies against Administrator de bonis non.

11. See Declaration, No. 1, 2, and Bishop v. Harrison's adm'or &c., 532

VII. Right of Executor or Administrator to be substituted for creditors of Decedent.

12. Bill by creditors against executors and devisees, to charge their demands on decedent's real estate, the same being charged with debts by his will; on the settlement of the executor's accounts, it is found he is largely in advance to the estate, for payments made by him to creditors, beyond the available assets by him received; though there is a much greater amount, due the testator's estate, of debts not desperate: Held, the executor shall rank as a creditor on the real, by substitution in place of the creditors, whose demands he has satisfied out of his own pocket.

Kinney's ex'ors &c. v. Harvey &c., 70

EXECUTORY LIMITATIONS.

1. Testator devises and bequeaths to his two grandsons D. and T. B. children of his deceased daughter M. B. sundry real and personal estate, and adds "all the estate given to my grandsons and to *be equally divided between them, each holding his part in fee simple, upon condition that each shall have issue of his body; but if either should die leaving no such issue, then his share shall pass to the surviving grandson; and such survivor shall hold and enjoy in fee simple the whole estate given to both, upon condition that such surviving grandson shall, at the time of his death, leave issue of his body; but if both my grandsons shall die, neither of them leaving such issue as aforesaid, and any of the children or grandchildren of my daughter E. M.T. should be then living, the whole estate given to my two grandsons shall be considered as given for life only, and the same shall, after their death without such issue as aforesaid, be equally divided in fee simple among the issue of my daughter E. M.T. then living, and the children of such of them as may then be dead." Held, each of the grandsons took a fee simple in the moiety devised to him, with an executory devise limited and well limited thereon to the other, on the contingency of either dying without leaving issue living at his death.

FELONY.

I. In Forging Bank Notes.

1. Upon trial of an indictment for forging bank notes, the fact, if proved, of the forged notes mentioned in the indictment, and other forged notes of like kind, and the plates, implements and materials, for forging such notes, being found in the prisoner's possession is prima facie or circumstantial, presumptive evidence, that the prisoner was the forger, proper to be given to the jury.

Spencer v. Commonwealth, 751

2. And such forged notes &c. being found in possession of the prisoner in the county of B. is like prima facie evidence, proper to be given to the jury, of the fact that he committed the forgery there. Ibid., 751

II. In passing Counterfeit Bank Notes.

3. Upon the trial of an indictment for passing counterfeit bank notes, proof that prisoner had, about same time, passed another note of same kind, which was thought to be a counterfeit, and which he took back, though this note is not produced at the trial, is admissible evidence to prove the scienter.

Martin v. Commonwealth, 745

4. Upon the trial of an indictment against M. for passing counterfeit bank notes, the prisoner appears clearly to have been confederated with one L. in passing counterfeit notes, and present when L. passed such notes; the notes so passed by L. are produced in evidence against the prisoner: Held, they are proper evidence. Ibid., 745

5. In a criminal prosecution for passing counterfeit bank notes, it is not necessary to prove the notes to be counterfeit, by an officer of the bank, of which the notes are counterfeited. Ibid., 745

III. In Stealing Bank Notes.

6. In an indictment for larceny of bank notes, it is not indispensably necessary to produce the stolen notes upon the trial.

V. In carrying Slaves out of State.

8. T. carries the slaves of D. out of the state, without the owner's consent, with intent to deprive him of the slaves, until T. should receive a reward for apprehending and restoring them: Held, this is felony in T. under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 30.

Thomas v. Commonwealth, 741

9. Indictment against T. for carrying out of the state, four slaves named Sandy, Henry, Poll and Hyatt, the property of D. without his consent, and with intent to defraud and deprive him of the property; but the record of the examining court, shews he was examined, and committed, for so carrying away the three first named slaves, and another named Harriet, not Hyatt: Held, the indictment ought not to be quashed for this cause; and the court instructing the jury, that the prisoner was not, under this indictment, to be convicted for carrying away Harriet or Hyatt, and the jury, with this instruction, convicting him: Held, further, this conviction is right. Ibid., 741

VI. Legal Consequences of Conviction of Felony.

10. A justice of the peace is convicted of the felony of malicious stabbing, sentenced to the penitentiary, confined there, and then pardoned: Held, the conviction and judgment for this felony, was a forfeiture of his office of justice, and incapacitated him from afterwards acting under his commission; and the pardon neither avoided the forfeiture, nor restored his capacity. Commonwealth v. Fugate, 724

VII. Other matters relating to Indictment for Felony.

Female ward makes deed of general release and acquittance to guardian, without any settlement of accounts, and deed of gift to guardian's infant son, without having its contents and effect explained to her; and marries the same day; husband lives for more than 20 years, and then dies: Held, the lapse of time during the coverture does not affect the right of the wife to impeach the deeds in equity.

Waller v. Armistead's adm'ors, 11

2. To debt on bond, defendant pleaded, that she was feme covert at time the bond was executed; plaintiff replied, that defendant's husband had abjured the commonwealth, and was not then or now a citizen thereof; on general demurrer to this replication, it was held nought.

Branch v. Bowman, 170

3. FORTHCOMING BOND.

1. It is competent to the obligors in a forthcoming bond to move to quash it for irregularity.

Couch v. Miller, 545

2. A fl. fa. is directed to the sheriff of Campbell, but is delivered to and levied by the sergeant of Lynchburg, who takes a forthcoming bond upon it, reciting that the writ had been directed to the sergeant: HELD, the writ gave no authority to the sergeant, and no warrant to him to take the forthcoming bond, and that the bond is variant from the execution, and therefore the bond ought to be quashed. Ibid., 545

3. Upon a motion to quash a forthcoming bond, for defects apparent on the face of the execution on which it was taken, an appellate court will regard the execution as part of the record, though not made so by any express order to that effect. Ibid., 545

FRAUD, MISTAKE AND SURPRISE.

1. A fl. fa. being sued out by J. against M., and being in the hands of the sheriff, M. the debtor, applies to G. to join him in a forthcoming bond thereon, and represents to him, in the sheriff's presence, that the amount of the debt is about one seventh of the real amount, which representation the sheriff does not contradict; whereupon, G. consents to become the surety, and M. and G. sign and seal a forthcoming bond, blank as to the amount of the execution, and as to other material particulars, and deliver it to the sheriff, who afterwards fills up the blanks; and execution is awarded upon this forthcoming bond: HELD, G. is not entitled to relief in equity against the obligation of the bond, upon the ground of the deception which induced him to execute it, as the creditor to whom it was taken, was no party to the fraud, and the sheriff, who was party to it, was not the creditor's agent in taking the bond. Gordon v. Jeffery, 410

2. But the award of execution on the forthcoming bond, was founded on proof by the sheriff, of notice given by him to G., "when in fact no such notice had been given, and the sheriff had induced G.'s attorney to believe that no notice would be given; whereby G. was deprived of the opportunity of defending himself at law, upon the plea of non est factum: HELD, that in giving notice on a forthcoming bond, the sheriff acts as agent of the creditor, who is not entitled to benefit by any fraud he commits in relation thereto; and that, in the present case, the surety was entitled to relief in equity, upon the ground of surprise, but only on terms that he himself shall do equity; that is, that he shall pay the amount for which he really intended to bind himself as surety. Waller v. Armistead's adm'ors, 11

III. As between Purchaser with notice of Fraudulent Deed, and Creditors of Grantor.

3. If A. make a fraudulent conveyance of personal property to B., and then make a conveyance for valuable consideration to C., who has full notice of the previous fraudulent conveyance, the statute of frauds and perjuries does not apply to protect such a subsequent purchaser against the previous fraudulent conveyance, nor upon the principles of the common law can he claim against the previous fraudulent conveyance whereof he had notice when he purchased. By GREEN, J., in Tate v. Liggett and Matthews, 84

4. Delson mortgages property to secure a fair debt due The Farmers' Bank, and a pretended debt to Tate: L. and M. bring a suit in chancery impeaching the security provided by the mortgage for pretended debt to T. as fraudulent: pending this suit, D. mortgages not the property, but his equity of redemption in it, to S. & Co., fair creditors, to secure a just debt due them; and then L. and M. obtain a decree for their claim against D.: HELD, that S. & Co. purchased only what D. could rightfully convey, that is, his equity of redemption, and took, subject not only to the fair debt due The Farmers' Bank, but the pretended debt secured to T., and L. and M. being creditors by decree, and thus having a right to satisfaction in preference to the pretended creditor T., acquired a preference also over the second mortgagees S. & Co., who were postponed by contract to the pretended creditor T. Tate v. Liggett &c., 84

IV. Remedy of Creditors, at law, to subject property fraudulently conveyed.

5. See Executions, No. 1, and

Clark v. Hardiman, 347

V. When Creditors may come into Equity.

6. A creditor at large, not having obtained judgment or decree against his debtor, cannot resort to equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor, though interference of the court be also prayed to prevent a sale or removal of the subject, and though the subject be equitable estate not liable to execution. Tate v. Liggett &c., 84

VI. When Equity will decree a Sale of the Subject fraudulently conveyed.

7. A father makes a voluntary and fraudulent conveyance of real estate to his children, and dies, leaving other real estate which descends; upon a bill by a creditor against the donees and heirs at law, to subject the land conveyed and land descended, to debt of the donor and ancestor, chancellor may decree a sale of both, out and out, to satisfy the creditor's demand. Blow v. Maynard, 30

VII. Responsibility of Fraudulent Donees for Rents and Profits.

8. A man makes a conveyance of real estate to the use of his children, and contingently to the use of his wife, and dies; upon a bill by a creditor after grantor's death, against grantees, who claim under the deed, conveyance declared not only voluntary, but fraudulent in fact on the part of the grantor: yet HELD, that the grantees are not accountable for rents and profits prior to the decree. Blow v. Maynard, 30

VIII. Widow's Right of Dower in Property fraudulently conveyed by Husband.

9. See Dower, No. 2, and FREEDOM—Suits for.

I. How Emancipation may be effected.

1. See Emancipation.

706 *II. Evidence in Suits for Freedom.

2. Quære, whether, in the case of a person claiming freedom on the ground of descent from a female Indian ancestor, hearsay be admissible, not only to prove the plaintiff's pedigree, but also to prove that the female ancestor, from whom he derives his descent, was an Indian? The court, four judges sitting, being divided on the point. Gregory v. Baugh, 665

3. Quære, also, whether, if a person claiming freedom on the ground of Indian descent in the maternal line, prove his descent from a native American Indian female ancestor, the onus probandi lies on the defendant to prove that such female ancestor was brought into the country, at a time and under such circumstances that such Indians might lawfully be enslaved, or on the plaintiff to prove that such his ancestor was brought into the country, at a time and under such circumstances that she could not lawfully be enslaved? The court being divided on the point. Ibid., 665

4. A woman named S. brought a suit for her freedom in 1772, and dying soon after, that proceeding was abated: some twenty-five or thirty years after, one W., an old person, informed her son, that S. was free, and her family, in consequence of their Indian descent from the mother; in a suit brought by S.'s grandson to recover his freedom, W.'s son testifies to those declarations of his mother, as to the plaintiff's ancestor S.: HELD, that this hearsay evidence is not objectionable on the ground, that the declarations of W. were made post litem motam. Ibid. Dissentiente, BROOKE, P. 665

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

1. Deeds of gift, or of release and acquittance, made by ward to guardian, or person who has borne part of guardian, shortly after ward's attainment to full age, but before delivering of ward's estate, and without any settlement of accounts, are void on a principle of public policy, without proof of actual fraud; much more, if circumstances of transaction evince actual fraud.

Waller v. Armistead's adm'ors, 11
2. No just distinction in this respect, between deeds of gift, and deeds of release and acquittance, by ward to guardian: both equally condemned by equity. Ibid., 11

3. See Lapse of time, No. 2, and S. C., 11

4. See Payment by Mistake, and Lee and wife v. Stuart &c., 76

HANDWRITING.

B. is appointed adm'r of S. at a time when S. was supposed to have died without a will; a will is afterwards found; B. had never seen S. write; but acquired a knowledge of his handwriting from examination of his papers after his death, and testifies from his knowledge of the handwriting thus acquired, that the will is wholly in S.'s hand: HELD, this is competent evidence of the handwriting in the court of probat.

Sharp v. Sharp and others, 249

HEIR.

I. Summary remedy against Heir.

1. The 37th section of the statute concerning sheriffs, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, which binds the lands of a sheriff to his sureties, does not authorize a surety, upon summary motion against a sheriff, his heirs or devisees, to obtain a judgment for the money paid by such surety; but where a judgment has been previously obtained, authorizes the court to award an execution against the lands.

Bacchus v. Gee, 68

II. Power of Equity to decree Sale of lands descended.

2. A father makes a voluntary and fraudulent conveyance of real estate to his children, and dies, leaving other real estate which descends; upon a bill by a creditor against the donees and heirs at law, to subject the land conveyed and land descended, to debt of the donor and ancestor, chancellor may decree a sale of both, out and out, to satisfy the creditor's demand.

Blow v. Maynard, 80

797 *III. Responsibility of Heir for Rents and Profits.

3. Upon a bill against an heir at law, to subject real estate descended, to a debt of the ancestor, the heir at law is not accountable for rents and profits accrued before decree.

Blow v. Maynard, 80

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

I. Marital Rights of Husband.

1. To property of wife conveyed immediately before marriage, without knowledge of husband. See Fraudulent Deeds, No. 2, and

Waller v. Armistead's adm'ors, 11

2. To slaves for which wife had executed instrument of emancipation; but the instrument was not fully proved before the marriage. See Emancipation, No. 4, and

Thrift v. Hannah &c., 300

II. Rights of wife in Separate Estate.

3. A feme covert, quoad property settled to her separate use, is a feme sole, and has a right to dispose of all her separate personal estate, and the profits of her separate real, in same manner as if she were feme sole, unless her power of alienation be restrained by the instrument creating the separate estate.

INDEMNIFYING BOND.

1. An indemnifying bond given to a sheriff, under statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 25, 26, can only be put in suit at the relation of the person having the legal title, to the property taken in execution and sold by the sheriff, not at the relation of any person having an equitable right therein.

Garlands v. Jacobs &c., 651

2. An officer is indemnified for selling property taken under execution, the sale whereof is forbidden by landlords of the debtor, claiming payment of rents in arrear; the officer sells; the landlords bring action against him and recover judgment for damages: Quære, under what circumstances, in an action brought by the officer upon the contract for the indemnity, it may be competent to the defendants to prove the real value of the property to be less than the damages assessed in the action against the officer, or what is the effect of the judgment against the officer, as against the persons bound to indemnify him?

INDICTMENTS, INFORMATIONS AND PRESENTMENTS.

I. Sufficiency of indictment.

1. An indictment for causing and procuring a counterfeit bank note to be offered to be passed, without stating by whom or how the accused caused and procured it to be done, is sufficiently certain, and good.

Brown v. Commonwealth, 760

2. An indictment for passing a counterfeit bank note to a slave, with intent to defraud the bank, is good. Ibid., 760

3. In an indictment against justices of the county court, for misbehaviour in office, it is necessary that the act imputed as misbehaviour, be distinctly and substantially charged to have been done with corrupt, partial, malicious or improper motives, and above all, with knowledge that it was wrong, though there are no technical words indispensably required, in which the charge of corruption, partiality &c. shall be made.

Jacobs and others v. Commonwealth, 709

4. An indictment, in such case, not charging the corruption, partiality &c. distinctly and substantially, and not charging the scienter: HELD, naught after verdict of conviction, its defects not being cured by the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 100, § 44.

5. Indictment for a nuisance, caused by a certain mill and mill dam, the property of the defendant, situate near to a common highway, without particular specification or description of the mill and 798 without expressly alleging that it is in "the county wherein the indictment is found: HELD, good and sufficient upon general demurrer.

Stephen v. Commonwealth, 759

6. Indictment against a surveyor of a public road, describing the road, but not naming the surveyor: HELD, insufficient and bad, on general demurrer.

Commonwealth v. Snider, 744

II. Record of Indictment found.

7. Record states, that two indictments against surveyors of roads, are found true bills by grand jury, not naming the surveyors: HELD, this is not a record of indictments found against any particular surveyors.

Commonwealth v. Snider, 744

III. Process upon Presentment.

8. Upon a presentment in a circuit court, for an offence for which the penalty prescribed by law, exceeds not 20 dollars, the court cannot proceed by way of information, but only in a summary way, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 100, § 65.

Webb v. Commonwealth, 721

IV. Motion to quash Indictment.

9. Indictment against T for carrying out of the state, four slaves named Sandy, Henry, Poll and Hyatt, the property of D. without his consent, and with intent to defraud and deprive him of the property; but the record of the examining court, shews he was examined, and committed, for so carrying away the three first named slaves, and another named Harriet, not Hyatt: HELD, the indictment; ought not to be quashed for this cause; and, the court instructing the jury, that the prisoner was not, under this indictment, to be convicted for carrying away Harriet or Hyatt, and the jury, with this instruction, convicting him: Held, further, this conviction is right.

INJUNCTION.

I. To Judgment at Law.

1. In an action of debt, defendant pleads, a special plea in bar, and the issue joined thereon is found against him, and judgment rendered for plaintiff; then defendant exhibits bill in chancery, stating that though he was unable to prove the matter of his plea on the trial at law, he is now able to prove it, without suggesting fraud, accident, mistake or other circumstance which prevented him from establishing his defence at law, and praying relief against the judgment: Held, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to grant relief in such a case.

Norris v. Hume.

II. To Injoin Sale under Execution.

2. M, a non-resident of the state, causes a f. fa. to be levied on tobacco, corn &c. in possession of L, the debtor; and C, who claims a legal right to the goods, joins L, in a forthcoming bond for the delivery thereof at the time and place of sale: Held, that C, if he has the legal right he claims, has a plain remedy at law, by action against the sheriff; and therefore cannot ask the interference of a court of equity to injoin M's proceeding under his execution and upon the forthcoming bond.

Miller v. Crews.

II. To restrain Tenant for life from carrying Slaves out of State.

3. Testator bequeaths slaves to his son G, for life, remainder to G's children: the executor, being apprehensive that G, will sell the slaves to persons who will carry them out of the state, applies to court of chancery, to restrain G, from so doing, and to compel him to give security, that 799 the property shall be forthcoming at his death for the legatees in remainder: the executor, alleging that he had never assented to the legacy, and the legatee for life alleging that he had assented thereto: Held, if the executor had not assented to the legacy he had plain remedy at law to recover the subject; if he had assented to it to the legatee for life, that assent enured to benefit of legatees in remainder, and though they might, the executor could not, ask the aid of the court to secure the subject to the legatees in remainder.

IV. Order dissolving Injunction.

4. Four plaintiffs in equity unite in same bill, praying injunction to stay proceedings on four several judgments at law against them, respectively, on grounds of equity common to all: the bill is exhibited against five parties defendants: the injunction awarded: pending suit, two of plaintiffs and three of defendants die: and chancellor makes an order that unless living plaintiffs and representatives of deceased plaintiffs, revive the injunction, in name of representatives of deceased plaintiffs, against representatives of deceased defendants, on or before a given day, the injunction shall stand and be dissolved: this order is irregular and erroneous.

M'Kays v. Hite and others.

INSOLVENTS.

1. A county court, or justices of the peace in the country, to whom a debtor in execution applies to have the oath of insolvency administered to him, and to be thereupon discharged, have no discretion to administer or refuse the oath, but are bound to administer it, though they may be of opinion, that the debtor has effects not put into his schedule to be surrendered, which he fraudulently conceals.

Harrison v. Norfolk Justices, Gen. Court.

2. And if the justices being asked to administer the oath, and order a discharge of the prisoner accordingly, refuse to do so, a mandamus lies from the circuit court to compel them.

JURISDICTION.

I. Cases in which Equity will not take Jurisdiction.

1. Bill in chancery, stating that plaintiff is entitled to fee simple and absolute estate in certain real and personal property held by her; but that defendants insist she has only a life estate, remainder to them; and praying a decree declaring and settling her rights: Held, the court has no jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

2. Bill in chancery, by plaintiff against the executors of his deceased father and a purchaser under them, claiming slaves "under parol gift of the father in his lifetime, accompanied by delivery of possession, and praying discovery of the increase of the slaves, of which, bill shews plaintiff was not ignorant, and a decree for the slaves and their increase before suit brought as well as pendent lite, and an account of profits: Held, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

3. M. and D. merchants and partners, contract debts to L, for which M. in the name of the firm of M. and D. with R. as surety, executes bonds to L, in 1799 and 1801: D. dies: M. lives till 1818, and then dies insolvent, the principal of the debts due L, with interest from 1816 remaining unpaid: R. the surety is perfectly solvent: in 1821, L., without bringing suit on the bonds against R. the surety, exhibits bill in chancery against the representatives of D., the administrator of M., the surviving partner, and R. the surety, to charge D.'s estate with the debts, or to have payment of them from the parties, according to their respective liabilities: Held, that L. had a clear and complete remedy at law, by action on the bonds against R. the surety; and therefore the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

JURORS.

1. A. obtains a license to keep an ordinary: A. opens a tavern under this license, and B. is his partner in the business; but A. alone resides at the tavern, and acts as keeper thereof: HELD, B. is not the keeper of an ordinary, disqualified to serve on grand juries, within the meaning of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 72, § 2.

Commonwealth v. Willson, 739

2. A person, being called as a juror in a case of felony, says, on voir dire, "that he had expressed an opinion on the circumstances as he had heard them narrated in the country; but he had not heard any of the evidence given on the examination of the prisoner, or conversed with any of the witnesses or parties; and he did not think the opinion so formed would have any influence on his mind in trying the case;" and this juror is challenged for cause: HELD, he is an indifferent juror, and the challenge for cause rightly disallowed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

I. Liability of Landlord for Taxes.

1. Private act of assembly in 1813, authorizes *the paving of streets of Petersburg, and ascertains manner of levying expense on proprietors and tenants of lots in town: in 1815 B. lets a lot to S. for term of five years, S. yielding and paying therefor an annual ground rent of $50 besides all taxes and other public dues in any manner accruing, and besides taxes and public dues of every kind: in 1817, the street on which the lot lies, is paved according to act of assembly, and the expense of paving apportioned and charged to and paid by S. the tenant. In the first instance: HELD, this expense of paving, is not a tax or public due of any kind, within the meaning of the covenants in the lease, which the tenant is bound to bear, and therefore he has a right to demand and recover the same of the landlord.

3. Defendant in ejectment claims under a sale made by a sheriff in 1815, under the statute of 1814, for taxes in arrear, and shews the return of the land as delinquent, and the sale made by the sheriff, without shewing that the sheriff had strictly pursued the statute in the steps preparatory to the sale: HELD, this is not enough to divest the title of the original owner.

Chapman v. Bennett, 329

4. Under the statute of 1818-14 for sale of lands forfeited for non-payment of taxes, the deputy sheriff as well as the high sheriff is competent to make such sales. Ibid., 329

LAPSE OF TIME.

1. T. sheriff of B. for the years 1808 and 1804, collects the poor rates; and in November 1823, the overseers of the poor commence proceedings against him, by motions for balances unaccounted for: HELD, after such a lapse of time, the motions ought not to be entertained.

Overseers of the Poor v. Tucker, 580

2. Female ward makes deed of general release and acquittance to guardian, without any settlement of accounts, and deed of gift to guardian's infant son, without having its contents and effect explained to her, and marries the same day: husband lives for more than 20 years, and then dies: HELD, the lapse of time during the coverture does not affect the right of the wife to impeach the deeds in equity.

LEGACY.

1. Testator bequeaths his personal estate to his brother J. to be sold, and the proceeds to be distributed by the brother among testator's next of kin, according to their deserts, as he should see at a future time what may turn up; the brother dies without making any appointment: HELD, the testator is to be regarded as intestate quoad this subject, and the same is distributable among his next of kin according to law.

Frazier &c. v. Frazier's ex'ors &c., 642

2. Testator bequeaths residuum of his estate to the four children of a deceased brother: two of the legatees die before testator, whereby the intended legacy of the moiety of the residuum to those two lapses: HELD, this moiety does not go to the two residuary legatees that survived testator, but as to it he was intestate and it is distributable among his next of kin according to law. Ibid., 642

3. The rule, that all legacies which fail by lapse or otherwise fall into the residuum and go to the residuary legatees, applies to specific or pecuniary legacies, but not to the subject of the residuary legacy itself. Ibid., 642

4. See Wills.

LIEN.

I. By Judgment or Decree.

1. A judgment has relation to the first day of the term at which it is rendered, *and this relation is allowed in equity as well as at law.

Counts v. Walker, 268

2. A judgment creditor has a lien in equity on the equitable estate of the debtor, in like manner as he has a lien at law on his legal estate. Ibid., 268

3. Real estate is vested in a trustee by deed of marriage settlement, in trust to pay the wife an annuity out of the profits, and, subject to the annuity, in trust for a son of the grantor; while the annuitant is yet living, a creditor of the son recovers a judgment against him, and exhibits his bill in chancery, to subject the son's equitable interest in the estate, to the debt: HELD, 1. that such an equitable interest cannot be taken in execution at law; 2. that it is bound by the judgment in equity, which will apply it to the satisfaction of the debt; but 3. as the annuitant is yet living and is not compellable to take a gross sum in satisfaction of the annuity, and as the trustee is to hold the subject and pay the annuity out of the profits, the court of chancery ought not to direct the sale out and out of the debtor's equitable interest, subject to the annuity, but ought only to direct the application of the surplus of profits as they accrue, after paying the annuity, to the debt. Ibid., 208

4. A judgment is obtained against a debtor; and then the debtor alien his lands to divers alienees by divers conveyances: HELD, all the debtor's lands in the hands of his several alienees, are alike liable to the judgment creditor, and the lands in the hands of the several alienees must contribute pro rata to satisfy the judgment.

Beverly v. Brooke and others, 426

5. Lien of ca. sa. executed, given by statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 184, § 10. See Execution, No. 3, 4, and Foreman v. Loyd and others, 284

II. By Deed.

6. See Mortgages and Trusts.

III. Implied Lien.

7. A vendor, taking a mortgage of the subject sold to secure the purchase money, can only claim under the mortgage, and according to its terms: the mortgage supersedes the implied equitable lien for the purchase money, which but for the mortgage would have been attached to the subject.

Little & Telford v. Brown, 353

8. The implied equitable lien of a vendor upon the subject sold, for the purchase money, does not give the vendor asserting the lien, any claim for the profits of the subject. Ibid., 353

9. If goods be pawned for the security of a particular specified debt, the pawnee has no lien on the goods pawned, for any other or subsequent debt contracted by the pawnor to him, without an agreement to that effect, either express or implied from the nature or circumstances of the transaction.

Gilliat v. Lynch, 408

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

I. When the Statute begins to run.

1. H. makes a bill of sale of slaves to C. without any consideration, and notwithstanding the deed, remains in uninterrupted possession for 25 years, and dies in possession; after his death, his widow claims these slaves as her own property, and holds adversary possession of them for more than five years; then administration of H.'s estate is committed to the sheriff who gets possession of the slaves, and a creditor of H. who had recovered judgment against the sheriff administrator, levies an execution on one of them, which is sold to satisfy the same: in detinue by the widow against the purchaser: HELD, that the statute of limitations did not enure to give the widow a title to the slaves since it did not begin to run till an administrator of her husband's estate was appointed.

II. How Defendant must rely upon the Statute.

2. Mandamus does not lie for the undertaker of a public bridge, to compel the county court to levy the stipulated reward *in the county levy, because a specific remedy is given him by statute, to recover the same by action of debt against the justices refusing to levy it. Ibid., 165

3. Mandamus lies from circuit court to compel justices of the peace to administer the oath of insolvency to a debtor in execution, and order his discharge, if upon being applied to, they improperly refuse to do so.

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

1. A deed of marriage settlement is made before marriage, between infant female and her guardian, the intended husband, and trustees; whereby her real estate is settled on her and her children &c. and husband covenants that he will, when after required, execute any and every further conveyance proper for more effectually settling and assuring the subject to the uses declared by the deed: husband and wife exhibit bill in chancery praying that this settlement be set aside, on the ground of the infancy of the wife at the time it was executed; and the wife on a privy examination directed by the chancellor, declares that she had freely and voluntarily joined in the bill: HELD, whether the infant feme were bound by the deed or not, the husband was bound by his covenant, and equity will not aid him to avoid it; and bill dismissed.

Webb v. Commonwealth, 721

2. Indictment for a nuisance, caused by a certain mill and mill dam, the property of the defendant, situate near to a common highway, without particular specification or description of the mill, and without expressly alleging that it is in the county wherein the indictment is found: HELD, good and sufficient upon general demurrer.

MORTGAGES AND TRUSTS.

1. What will be construed a Mortgage, as distinguished from a Conditional Sale.

1. See Leavell v. Robinson, 161

II. Mortgagee claims only as Purchaser.

2. A creditor at large, procuring a mortgage of his debtor's property, cannot claim as a creditor, or in the double character of creditor and purchaser, but only as purchaser.

Tate v. Liggett &c., 84

III. Like other Purchasers affected with notice of Prior Mortgage.

3. C. takes a mortgage from A. to secure just debts and is informed immediately before the mortgage is executed, that A. has mortgaged the same subject to B. to secure a debt due him, but that the debt to B. is usurious; which mortgage to B. is not duly recorded: HELD, that C. and all claiming under the mortgage to him, are purchasers with notice of the prior unrecorded mortgage to B. and that the contemporary information that the prior mortgage was usurious, does not affect the question of notice of the prior mortgage.

Beverly v. Brooke and others, 426

IV. When a Prior Mortgage shall be postponed to a Subsequent Mortgage.

4. A. applies to B. for a loan of money, upon the security of a mortgage of *slaves then held by A., and B. being doubtful as to A.'s title to the slaves, and apprehensive that C. has some claim to them, applies to C. to know whether he has such claim, explaining his reason for the enquiry; upon which C. informs him he has no right to the slaves, being at the time apprised of all the facts, on which his right, if any he has, depends: B. lends the money, and takes the mortgage of the slaves: HELD, that C. cannot be allowed, in equity, to assert the right he had disclaimed against the mortgagee B.

Dickenson v. Davis and others, 401

V. When a Prior Mortgage shall be postponed to a Subsequent Judgment.

5. Deison mortgages property to secure a fair debt due The Farmers' Bank, and a pretended debt to Tate: L. and M. bring a suit in chancery impeaching the security provided by the mortgage for pretended debt to T. as fraudulent: pending this suit, D. mortgages not the property, but his equity of redemption in it, to S. & Co. fair creditors, to secure a just debt due them; and then L. and M. obtain a decree for their claim against D.: HELD, that S. & Co. purchased only what D. could rightfully convey, that is, his equity of redemption, and took, subject not only to the fair debt due The Farmers' Bank, but the pretended debt secured to T. And L. and M. being creditors by decree, and thus having a right to satisfaction in preference to the pretended creditor T. acquired a preference also over the second mortgagees S. and Co. who were postponed by contract to the pretended creditor T.

Tate v. Liggit &c., 84

VI. Construction of the meaning and import of Mortgage.

6 J. and D. W. purchase lands of B., and to secure the purchase money, payable in instalments, convey same lands to a trustee, upon trust to permit J. and D. W. to take the profits thereof, to their order, use and benefit, till the time appointed for payment of the last instalment, and then, in default of payment, to sell the subject, and apply proceeds to satisfaction of the debt: afterwards, and before the last instalment of the debt to B. falls due, J. and D. W. mortgage same lands, and all yearly rents, issues and profits thereof, and all their right and interest therein, to L. and T. to secure a debt due them: HELD, that L. and T. are entitled, in preference to B., to all profits accruing prior to the time when the last instalment of debt to B. falls due

Little and Telford v. Brown, 353

7. A. mortgages lands to B. to secure a debt due to him: and then, by a general deed of trust, conveys the equity of redemption of the same lands, together with sundry personal property, to a trustee, to raise a fund to pay all his debts, including debts due B. other than that specifically secured by the mortgage: HELD, B. is entitled to receive the whole of the debt specifically secured to him by the mortgage, out of the proceeds of the mortgaged lands, and then to come in for distribution of the fund in the hands of the trustee under the general deed of trust, for satisfaction of the other debts due him, pro rata with the other creditors.

MOTION.

I. By Surety against Principal.

1. Under the statute giving summary remedy to all sureties against their principals, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 116, § 1, no motion lies for sureties against devisees of their principals.

Bacchus v. Gee, 68

II. By Creditor against Sheriff for not returning Execution.

2. A fl. fa. sued out by C. against P. is delivered to the sheriff, and P. the debtor pays the amount of the execution to C. the creditor: the sheriff fails to make due return of the execution: HELD, P. the debtor cannot maintain a motion in the name of C. the creditor, against the sheriff for a fine for failing to return the execution, even though the debtor were a party injured thereby.

Fletcher v. Chapman, 560

III. By surety of sheriff against his heirs or devisees.

3. The 37th section of the statute concerning sheriffs, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, which binds the lands of a sheriff to his surety, does not authorize a surety, upon summary motion, against a sheriff, his heirs or devisees, to obtain a judgment for the money paid by such surety: but where a judgment has been previously obtained, authorizes the court to award an execution against the lands.

Bacchus v. Gee, 68

806 *IV. By sheriff against deputy and his securities.

4. A deputy sheriff gives bond with eight sureties to the sheriff: one of the sureties dies: HELD, a motion lies on the bond against the deputy and the surviving sureties.

Jacobs v. Hill and others, 393

5. A bond is executed to a sheriff, during the first year of his shrievalty, by a deputy sheriff and his sureties, the condition whereof recites that the sheriff has been commissioned sheriff of N. and that the deputy has undertaken the duties of the said office for and during the time the sheriff may continue in office &c.: HELD, that the contract here recited is a deputation of the office not only for the first but for the second year also of the shrievalty, and the sureties are bound for the conduct of the deputy during both years.

6. What evidence is admissible against sureties of deputy. See Evidence, No. 3, and S. C. 393

7. The statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 33, giving a summary remedy by motion for a sheriff against his deputy and his sureties, does not authorize the court to allow interest.

8. Neither the statute which gives a motion against a sheriff for a fine for failing to return an execution, nor the statute which gives a motion to a sheriff against his deputy to recover the amount of fines imposed upon the sheriff for the alleged defaults of the deputy, is imperative on the court to give such judgments, but the court, in its sound discretion, may give or deny judgment in such cases.

Fletcher v. Chapman, 560

9. Judgment is rendered against a sheriff for a fine for the alleged default of his deputy, the sheriff making no defence, nor giving any notice to the deputy of the proceeding: this judgment is erroneous in point of law, and unjust upon the merits: HELD, in such case, the sheriff is not entitled to recover the amount of the fine from the deputy.

NEW TRIAL.

I. In Civil Suits.

1. A circuit court, in a charge or instruction to the jury, states matter as being in a written deposition, and instructs the jury that that matter is legal evidence, but in point of fact no such matter is in the deposition: HELD, this was calculated to mislead the jury, and is error, for which the verdict should be set aside and the judgment upon it reversed.

Gregory v. Baugh, 645

2. When new trial will be granted because of the vagueness with which instruction is stated in bill of exceptions. See Bill of Exceptions, No. 1, and

3. When bill of exceptions to opinion overruling motion for a new trial will be sufficient to enable appellate court to review and reverse the judgment. See Bill of exceptions, No. 2, 3, and

Ewing v. Ewing, 337

4. As an appellate court will review an order of an inferior court, overruling a motion for a new trial and reverse the proceedings of new trial improperly refused, so it will review an order granting a new trial, and reverse proceedings, if improperly granted.

Pleasants v. Clements, 474

5. An affidavit of a party, that he failed to summon material witnesses at the trial, owing to advice of counsel that their testimony was not necessary, no ground to set aside verdict and grant a new trial.

Ibid., 474

6. If appellate court, reverses judgment, on ground that new trial has been previously improperly granted, it will examine the proceedings of the trial set aside, and if it find error in them reverse and correct them, otherwise affirm them.

Ibid., 474

II. In Criminal Causes.

7. After a jury is impanelled and sworn, but before any evidence is given, three of the jurors separate from their fellows, for a brief space of time: HELD, such separation before any evidence given, is no cause for setting aside a verdict of conviction; especially, in the case at bar, where the separation was so momentary, that any tampering with the jurors was hardly possible.

Martin v. Commonwealth, 745

8. See Evidence, No. 14, and

Brown v. Commonwealth, 769

9. At the trial of an indictment for a crime, the punishment whereof, prescribed by law, is imprisonment &c. not less than one nor more than three years the clerk charges the jury, that the term of imprisonment is to be not less than two nor more than three years; verdict finds prisoner guilty, and ascertains his imprisonment to be 806 two years; the attorney for "commonwealth remits one year of the term; whereupon, the court sentences prisoner to one year's imprisonment: Held, 1. the attorney had no power to make such remission, which was therefore merely void; 2. the judgment was erroneous, not being according to verdict; 3. the verdict ought to be set aside, on account of the erroneous charge as to the minimum term of imprisonment.

1. The pleadings ought not to be set aside, and tenants permitted to plead this matter in abatement; but,

2. The court ought to stay proceedings, till W. the person prosecuting the suit, shall shew, by proof, that demandant was living at commencement thereof;

3. That W. who instituted suit for his own benefit, ought not to be allowed to prosecute it to judgment, without shewing demandant was living at commencement thereof, though W. may shew evidence of title to land demanded, and deduce title from H. the demandant;

4. That court ought to make a rule upon W. and his attorneys, and enquire into their conduct herein, as a contempt, and abuse of the process of the court; and

5. That unless W. within reasonable time after rule given for the purpose, produce proof, that demandant was living at commencement of suit, it ought to be dismissed, and payment of tenant's costs enforced, by attachment, against W. or his attorney.

I. Parties and Process.

1. If one person to whom alone the right asserted in a bill in chancery appertains, and other persons who have no right, join in the bill, and the cause be proceeded in to a decree in the court of chancery, without any objection there to the joining of improper parties plaintiff in the bill: upon appeal from the decree to the court of appeals, the objection will have only this effect in the appellate court, that the court will consider the right as vested in the plaintiff entitled thereto, and affected by his acts or omissions.

2. A defendant in equity is charged as executrix, and as devisee of a decedent: in the caption of her answer, she professes to answer only as executrix; but, in the body of her answer, she in fact answers as devisee: HELD, such answer places her before the court, in her character of devisee.

6. When the deposition of a party in a suit in chancery is taken under a special commission, subject to all just exceptions, whether the deposition be excepted against on the ground of incompetency or not, it behooves the court to examine and decide the question of competency; and though the deposition be read at the hearing in the court of chancery without exception, yet if, on an appeal from the decree, the appellate court finds the deposition incompetent evidence by reason of the deponent's interest in the event, it will pay no regard to the deposition.

1. Writ of right abates by death of tenant in 1812, and the abatement is entered of record: sci. fa. sued out by defendant in 1820, to revive the suit against heirs of tenant: HELD, the abatement was absolute, and suit could not be revived under provisions of statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 37; that provision being prospective. Lovell v. Arnold.	16
II. Upon Recognizance of Special Bail.
2. In a joint action of debt against three obligors, three persons severally undertake, by several recognizances, as special bail for each of the three defendants: after judgment, creditor sues out one sci. fa. against the three bail, upon their several recognizances: HELD, they cannot be joined in one sci. fa. and that the sci. fa. is naught, and ought to be quashed. Garland v. Ellis.	555
3. A demurrer to a sci. fa. upon a recognizance of special bail, is regular practice. Ibid.	555
SEAL.
1. To a printed form of a bond, there are put printed stamps or scrolls by way of seals; the blanks are filled up; and the instrument executed by the obligors, by signing their names to the printed stamps or scrolls, which are recognized as their seals in the body of the instrument: this is a sealed instrument within the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 94. Buckner v. Mackay.	498

SET-OFF.
Against a debt due by A. and B. jointly to C., a debt due by C. to B. alone, cannot be set-off in equity any more than at law. Per GREEN, J., in Gilliat v. Lynch.	493
SHERIFF.
1. Concerning motions against sheriff by his sureties or by creditors: and concerning motions by sheriff against a deputy and his sureties. See Motion.
2. An officer takes under execution, and removes, goods of a lessee, without paying the rent in arrear due to the landlord: HELD, in an action by the landlord against the officer for so doing, not the amount of the rent in arrear, but the value of the goods, is the just measure of damages. Crawford and others v. Jarrett's adm'or.	630
3. Measure of damages in action brought by the officer upon contract for his indemnity. See Indemnifying Bond, No. 2, and S. C.	630

1. It seems that the statute of uses of Virginia, does not apply to uses created by devise, and transfer such uses into possession of the cestui que use.
Bass and wife and others v. Scott and others, 356
2. Testator devises and bequeaths real and personal estate to trustees, in trust for the equal use and benefit of testator's four sisters (naming them) and their heirs forever, to be managed as the trustees should think most conducive to the interest of each of the parties; two of the sisters, being females covert: HELD, 1. that each of the sisters took a fee simple as to the real, and the absolute property as to the personal subject, in her share of the trust estate; and, 2. that the legal title remains in the trustees in order that they may manage the part of the subject intended for the use and benefit of each sister, in such manner as the trustees shall think most conducive to the interests of each respectively. Fitzhugh v. Gordon, 626
2. F. contracts usurious debt to G. and gives him a deed of trust of land to secure it; F. exhibits bill in chancery, against G. and the trustee, charging the usury, disclaiming any demand of discovery from the creditor, insisting that deed of trust is null and void, and praying that plaintiff's testimony may be perpetuated, and defendants enjoined from selling trust subject till the validity of the deed can be tried at law; G. denies the usury; but it is proved: Quære, whether, in such case, the court of chancery ought to enjoin the trustee from selling under the deed of trust, till the creditor claiming under it shall establish its legal validity in some proper forum where the debtor may have an opportunity to contest it? - WIDOW.
- B. makes a deed of settlement of property upon his wife, and then by will makes a disposition of the property, different from that made by the deed of settlement, and far less beneficial to the wife, and dies; the wife takes administration with the will annexed:
HELD, 1. the widow may claim under the deed of settlement, without having renounced the provision made for her by the will according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 26. And, 2. the widow taking administration with the will annexed, is not an election by her to take under the will, and not to claim under the deed of settlement.
Taylor &c. v. Browne and others, 419
- WILLS.
- I. Attestation and Probat.
1. B. is appointed adm'or of S. at a time when S. was supposed to have died without a will; a will is afterwards found: B. had never seen S. write; but acquired a knowledge of his handwriting from examination of his papers after his death, and testifies from his knowledge of the handwriting thus acquired, that the will is wholly in S.'s hand: HELD, this is competent evidence of the handwriting in the court of probat.
Sharp v. Sharp and others, 349

2. Question, whether an instrument is a complete will, or only a note, memorandum, or plan of a will to be afterwards made? Ibid., 349

II. Construction of Will.

3. Testator bequeaths that "all his moveable property, after the death of his wife, shall be sold, and the proceeds divided among his five daughters: after all his debts paid, all his moveable property should be at the intire disposal of his wife: on her decease, the same to be disposed of as above mentioned:" Held, that the wife took only a life estate in such of the moveables as were capable of being used and returned in kind; and, therefore, the wife's gift of a slave to one of the daughters, passed only the wife's life estate therein to the donee.

Madden v. Madden's ex'ors, 377

4. Quære, whether the wife, or her estate after her death, was accountable to the legatees in remainder, for such of the moveables as were consumable in the use, such as grain, or for the proceeds of crops left on hand by the testator, or for money or debts collected? Ibid., 377

WRIT OF RIGHT.

I. Upon what seizin writ may be sustained.

1. See Estates Tail, No. 2, and Watts v. Cole &c., 653

II. Where demandant is dead before writ issues, what course will be taken.

2. A writ of right having been brought in name of H. against R. and P. and the mise regularly joined on the mere right, and the tenants shewing by affidavits, that H. was dead before the writ purchased, and that they had come to knowledge of the fact after the mise was joined: Held,

1. The pleadings ought not to be set aside, and tenants permitted to plead this matter in abatement: but,

2. The court ought to stay proceedings, till W. the person prosecuting the suit, shall shew, by proof, that demandant was living at commencement thereof:

3. That W. who instituted suit for his own benefit, ought not to be allowed to prosecute it to judgment, without shewing demandant was living at commencement thereof, though W. may shew evidence of title to land demanded, and deduce title from H. the demandant:

4. That court ought to make a rule upon W. 816 and his attorneys, and inquire into *their conduct herein, as a contempt, and abuse of the process of the court: and

5. That unless W. within reasonable time after rule given for the purpose, produce proof, that demandant was living at commencement of suit, it ought to be dismissed, and payment of tenant's costs enforced, by attachment, against W. or his attorney.

Howard v. Rawson and Pugh, Gen. Court, 733

III. Where either Party dies after writ issues.

3. Writ of right abates by death of tenant in 1812, and the abatement is entered of record: scl. fa. sued out by demandant in 1820, to revive the suit against heirs of tenant: Held, the abatement was absolute; and suit could not be revived under provision of statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 37, that provision being prospective.

Lovell v. Arnold, 16

IV. Where Tenant is an Infant.

4. In a writ of right, the præcipe and count describe tenant as an infant; tenant appears, pleads and defends himself by attorney, no guardian ad litem being assigned him; nor does it appear he came to full age pending the writ; verdict and judgment for demandants; tenant in person appeals to this court: Quære, whether he can object to the proceedings on account of his infancy here, or ought to have resorted to writ of error coram nobis?

Watts v. Cole &c., 653

V. See Count, Plea and Replication; and effect of statute of Jeofails upon misjoining of mise.

5. The count in writ of right demands a certain tenement consisting of the one stone house with the appurtenances &c.: Held, this is a demand of the land on which the house stands, and is certain enough.

Snapp v. Spengler and wife, 1

6. To count in writ of right by husband and wife in right of wife, tenant files a plea in blank throughout, and tenders the mise to the demandant in the singular; replication filed by both demandants join the mise as for male demandant only; assize is charged to inquire whether demandants have right as they demand: Held, after verdict for demandants, the blanks, informalities and bad grammar of plea and replication, immaterial. Ibid., 1

7. In a writ of right, there is count and plea, in the statutory forms, but no replication; the assize is regularly charged to make recognition; verdict and judgment for demandants: Quære, whether the mise was joined by the count and plea, without a replication? and whether the irregularity was not cured by the verdict?

REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE COURT OF APPEALS, AND IN THE GENERAL COURT,

By BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH.

VOLUME III.

Eastern District of Virginia, to wit:

BE IT REMEMBERED, That on the sixth day of June, Anno Domini one { L. S. } thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH, of the said district, for and on behalf of the commonwealth of Virginia, hath deposited in this office, the title of a book, (for the benefit of the said commonwealth,) the title of which is in the words following, to wit:

“Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Court of Appeals, and in the General Court, of Virginia. By Benjamin Watkins Leigh. Volume III.”

the right whereof he claims as author, in conformity with an act of congress, entitled, “an act to amend the several acts respecting copy rights.”

R'D JEFFRIES,
Clerk of the District.

P R E F A C E .

The amended constitution of Virginia, adopted in convention on the 15th January 1830, provided, that the judges of the court of appeals, of the general court, and of the superiour courts of chancery should remain in office, until the termination of the first legislature elected under that constitution, and no longer, art. 5, § 3. and that all the courts of justice should continue with the jurisdiction they then had, until and except so far as the judicial system might or should be otherwise organized by the legislature, art. 7.

The legislature, at the session of 1830-31, passed three acts for re-organizing, or rather new modeling, the judicial system of the commonwealth.

By one of those acts it was provided, that the court of appeals, from and after the termination of that session of assembly, should consist of a president and four other judges, and the office of president should be so far distinct from that of the other judges, that vacancies occurring in the office of president should be filled by particular election or appointment and commission thereto : and that the court should hold a session annually at Lewisburg in the county of Greenbrier, to commence on the first Monday in July, and to continue ninety days unless the business should be sooner dispatched, and to be divided into such terms as the court should from time to time direct and appoint, for the hearing and determining all causes brought to the court by appeal &c. from the courts of the counties lying on the western side of the blue ridge of mountains, with the exception of certain counties particularly mentioned; and another session at Richmond, to continue one hundred and sixty days unless the business should be sooner dispatched, and to commence at such times, and be divided into such terms, as the court should from time to time direct and appoint, for the hearing and determining all causes brought to the court by appeal &c. from the courts of the counties and corporations on the eastern side of the mountains, and from those counties on the other side excepted out of the western district : provided, that the parties to causes arising in either district, might by consent carry the same to the court at its session in the other. Sess. acts 1830-31, ch. 4, p. 37.

It was provided by another act, that the general court should consist of twenty judges, and should hold its terms in July and December, with the same jurisdiction it before had, except such as had been taken away by the amended constitution (the jurisdiction, namely, to try impeachments, now vested in the senate, amend. const. art. 3, § 13.) and except also the jurisdiction to hear and determine questions of law in civil causes thereto adjourned, which, it was provided, it should no longer have and exercise. Id. ch. 7, p. 39.

The third act abolished the former superiour courts of chancery, and circuit courts of law, and established a circuit superiour court of law and chancery in each and every county of the commonwealth, and in certain corporations therein mentioned, with very general jurisdiction, civil and criminal, at common law and in equity; combining, indeed, the jurisdiction of the former superiour courts of chancery, and that of the former circuit courts of law, and vesting both in these new tribunals, though the equitable and common law jurisdictions were still to be exercised each separately and distinctly from the other. The counties and corporations were divided into ten districts, and each district into two circuits : two of the judges of the general court were assigned to each of the ten districts, and of the two judges so assigned to each district, one was assigned to each circuit of the district : and thus the twenty judges of the general court were assigned, respectively, to twenty circuits : and the judge assigned to each of the twenty circuits, was required to hold the circuit superiour courts of law and chancery, two terms every year, in each of the counties and corporations of his circuit. Id. ch. 11, p. 42.

All the twenty judges were required to attend the session of the general court at July term 1831—but it was provided, that, thenceforth, they should attend the sessions of the general court alternately, so that but one of the judges assigned to each of the ten districts should attend at the same term : and that five judges should constitute a quorum. Id. ch. 7, § 1. In consequence of this provision, ten of the judges (that is, one from each of the ten districts) were, by an arrangement of the court at July term 1831, assigned to attend the summer term, and the other ten (one from each district) to attend the winter term, of the general court.

The judges of the court of appeals, and of the general court, under the new organization, were elected and appointed by joint vote of the two houses of assembly during the session of 1830-31.

Overseers of Poor of Henrico v. Hart.

Chancery—Jurisdiction to Injoin Overseer of Poor from Selling Glebe Lands of Church.*—The rector of the protestant episcopal church of the parish of H. insisting that the glebe land of that parish was a private donation to the church made before the revolution, and so reserved to the church within the exception of the statute of 1802 for the resumption of glebe lands, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, b. and therefore claiming the legal estate of this glebe land, files a bill in chancery, praying an injunction to inhibit the overseers of the poor of the county from selling the same, under the general provisions of the statute: Held, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction of such a case.

This was an appeal from a decree of the superior court of chancery of Richmond, upon a bill exhibited by the reverend William H. Hart, against William Montague and others, Overseers of the poor of the county of Henrico, wherein he alleged, That the glebe land of the parish of Henrico in that county, was a private donation for the use and benefit of the rector of that parish, made more than a hundred years ago, and therefore exempted from sale, *and preserved to the church, by the exception contained in the statute of January 1802, providing for the resumption and sale of glebe lands of the protestant episcopal church, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 32, b. p. 79, 81. That, at the time that statute was enacted, the reverend John Buchanan, now deceased, was rector of the parish, and incumbent of the glebe; and the plaintiff having been, some years before his death, appointed his assistant, was by him put into possession of the glebe, and permitted to enjoy the rents and profits thereof. That, upon the death of Mr. Buchanan, the plaintiff was regularly chosen his successor, and solemnly instituted rector of the church and parish of Henrico, and thus became entitled to the possession and enjoyment of the glebe belonging to the parish. But that the Overseers of the poor, proceeding under the general provisions of the statute, had advertised the glebe for sale. Therefore, the bill made them defendants; called upon them to shew their authority for so proceeding; and prayed that they should be enjoined from selling or otherwise disposing of the glebe. The injunction was awarded.

The Overseers of the poor answered, That the glebe in question having become vacant by the death of the reverend John Buchanan, the late incumbent, they had advertised the same for sale, as was their duty, under the general provisions of the statute of January 1802. That the glebe lands in Virginia, generally, were purchased by public contributions of, or assessments in the form of parish levies upon, the people of the respective parishes, in pursuance of statutes of the colonial legislature; they referred to the acts of March 1655, act 9, 1 Hen. Stat. at large, p. 400, and of October 1748, ch. 34, 6 Id. p. 88. That if this glebe was, as the bill alleged, a private donation for the use and benefit of the rector of the parish, it formed an exception to the general mode by which such lands were acquired for the church; an exception which it was incumbent on the plaintiff to establish by proper proof; and, unless he should be able to prove that the glebe was a private *donation, and therefore excepted from the general disposition, which the statute of January 1802 required to be made of vacant glebe lands, it became the right and the duty of the Overseers of the poor, upon the death of the late incumbent, to make sale of it.

The depositions of two aged witnesses were taken and filed, to prove the declarations of many old inhabitants of the parish, now dead, that the glebe in question was given to the episcopal church by one Farrar; and that such was the ancient and general report and understanding, among the inhabitants of the parish, as to the manner in which the glebe was acquired. And to account for not producing the deed of the donor Farrar to the church, it was proved, that many of the records of the county court of Henrico, and papers deposited in the clerk's office, were destroyed by the british army in 1781.

The chancellor, upon the hearing, perpetuated the injunction; and the Overseers of the poor appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Williams and Daniel for the appellants, and Stanard for the appellee. But the only point considered and determined by this court, was the question of jurisdiction, Whether the case stated in the bill, was proper for relief in equity?

CARR, J. It has been decided by this court (so often and so recently that I need not cite the cases) that where a party has a complete remedy at law, equity will not interfere. We have also decided upon solemn argument, that a court of equity is not the proper tribunal to try legal titles, and that a bill bringing before this court, the dry legal title to lands, is demurrable: Stuart's heirs v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74, is one of the cases in which this point was decided, after the most careful examination. Upon the case stated in the bill, did the plaintiff want the aid of equity? He had, as he says, the legal title and the possession; and the *glebe was a private donation, protected by the exceptions contained in the statute of January 1802. What had he, then, to fear from the defendants' sale of the property? That sale could not divest his possession, nor affect his title in the least: he had only to hold on, and let the defendants' vendee bring his action: and then the legal title would have been discussed, and passed upon, in that forum to which such questions properly belong. But he has come into equity, whose aid he does not need, according to his own shewing; and brought up for its decision a title to real estate purely legal. Such a bill should never have been entertained.

The other judges concurring, the decree was reversed, and bill dismissed.

Powell v. Watson.

May, 1831.

Practice—Common Order—Entry upon Office Judgment List*—Case at Bar.—Capias ad respondendum, in debt on bond, returnable to August rules, being returned executed, and defendant not appearing, clerk enters the common order; at September rules, defendant appears, and puts in special bail, but does not plead; plaintiff insists that clerk shall enter a confirmation of the common order, so as to put the case on the office judgment list of the next term, which clerk refuses to do; at next term, court orders case to be put on office judgment list, and then defendant puts in a plea to the action; and, at the ensuing term, there is a trial, verdict and judgment, for plaintiff.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Quære.—Whether regular to order the case to be put on office judgment list?

Same—Same—Same—Waiver of Objection.—But HELD, if not regular, defendant's pleading to the action, was a waiver of objection to the regularity of the order.

This was an action of debt on a bond for $14 dollars, brought by Watson against Powell in the circuit court of Amherst. The capias ad respondendum, upon which bail was required, was sued out in July, and made returnable to the rules to be held in the clerk's office in August. The writ being

5 taken as *his appearance bail, was returned to the August rules; at which Watson filed his declaration; and thereupon, the clerk entered the common order, that unless the defendant should appear at the next rule day, and plead to issue, judgment should be entered for the debt &c. against him and Coleman his appearance bail. At the September rules, Powell appeared, filed a recognizance of special bail entered into by Coleman, and cravedoyer of the writ and the bond, of which an entry was made; but he put in no plea to the action; and, therefore, Watson's attorney insisted, that the clerk should enter a rule confirming the common order, so as to put the cause upon the list of office judgments at the next term of the court; which the clerk refused to do. At the next term, Watson, insisting that the clerk ought to have entered an office judgment at the September rules, upon the failure of Powell to plead according to the rule given him at the August rules, moved the court to order the cause to be put upon the list of office judgments of that term: Powell objected, that if the clerk had erred, the court could only remand the cause to the rules, with directions to the clerk to correct the error there: but the court disregarded the objection, and ordered the cause to be put on the list of office judgments of that term. Powell filed exceptions to this proceeding. And then, (special bail having been filed in the office as above mentioned) he pleaded payment; upon which the office judgment was set aside, and the cause continued for the trial of the issue made up upon the plea, until the next term; at which there was a trial, verdict and judgment for Watson. Powell applied to this court for a supersedeas to the proceedings and judgment, which was awarded.

Taylor, for the plaintiff in error. Supposing the clerk erred in not entering an office judgment at the September rules, upon the failure of Powell to plead according to the rule given him at the August rules, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 72, 73, p. 507, yet that error of the clerk was nowise 6 *imputable as a fault to Powell, nor ought he to be at all prejudiced thereby.

The statute, Id. § 77, p. 508, provides, that "the court shall have control over all proceedings in the office during the preceding vacation, may correct any mistakes or errors which may have happened therein, and may, for good cause shewn, set aside any of the rules or proceedings, and make such order concerning the same as may be just and right." Here, there was no rule or proceeding to be set aside; the error complained of, was an omission of the clerk to enter an office judgment at the September rules in the office, which could only be entered there; the effect of that omission was, that the cause remained at the rules; and the court in term could correct this error of omission, only by directing the clerk to enter the office judgment at the rules. The court could not enter an office judgment; it could not order a cause in which no office judgment had been entered, to stand upon the list of office judgments.

Johnson, for the defendant in error. Watson being clearly entitled to demand an office judgment at the September rules, it was a palpable mistake or error in the clerk not to enter it. The court at the ensuing term, was certainly authorized to correct this mistake or error, and to make such order as was just and right; and the only effectual mode of correcting the error, the order which justice required, was to enter the office judgment nunc pro tunc; or, which is the same thing, to consider the office judgment as having been entered at the rules, as it ought to have been, and to put the cause on the list of office judgments of the term. The effect of the clerk's error was, that Powell gained the delay of a term; the error could only be corrected by taking away that advantage from him. The method of correction adopted by the court, placed Watson in the situation in which he would have stood, if the clerk had not committed the error, and took from Powell, the advantage which

7 that error gave him: the mode of correction which *Powell proposed, would have left him all the advantage arising from the error, and left all the injustice done to Watson unredressed. But this point is now wholly immaterial: for, supposing the court erred in the method by which it intended to correct the proceedings at the rules, Powell himself cured that error, by pleading to the action in open court; the effect of which was to set aside all the proceedings at the rules, and to put an end to all enquiry as to the regularity of those proceedings, and as to the proper method of correcting them if irregular. His defence was admitted, and fairly tried; he does not complain of any injustice in the trial and judgment.

Taylor. The court, by ordering the cause to be put upon the list of office judgments, imposed upon him the alternative of pleading to the action, or of suffering judgment by default. He was compelled to plead; and if it was irregular to compel him to plead, his pleading ought not to preclude him from complaining of this irregular compulsion.

GREEN, J. The substance of the opinion and direction of the court, excepted to by Powell, was, that Watson was entitled to a confirmation of the common order at the rule day preceding the then term of the court, and that what had been done in the office should be corrected accordingly, so as to put the cause on the list of office judgments of that term. If this had been done; if the office judgment had been entered on the docket, and not set aside during the term, it would have been final: and if the court erred in correcting the rules so as to produce that result, it might have been reversed for that error, which in that case would have been the foundation of the judgment. But the judgment appealed from, was not the consequence of, or in any degree affected by, that opinion and direction of the court: they were not in fact carried into effect. But if they had been, the voluntary plea of the defendant upon the merits, would have authorized and bound the court to set 8 *aside the office judgment, and no question could afterwards be entertained as to the validity of the judgment so set aside. But no office judgment having in fact been entered on the docket, there was none to set aside. The interposition of the defendant's plea obviated the necessity of entering any office judgment, and was a waiver of all objections on his part to the former proceedings and order. The judgment appealed from, being clearly right in itself, must be affirmed, whether the opinion and direction of the court below in respect to the proceedings at rules, were right or wrong; a question of which the court, therefore, waives the discussion.

Rucker's Adm'r &c. v. Gilbert.

May, 1881.

WILLS.—Direction That Slave Shall Enjoy Benefit of His Own Labor, but Shall Be under Control of Executor.—Effect.—Testator expresses his will and desire, that his slave J. Gilbert should be free, but finding it would be difficult for it to be so, and for him to remain in Virginia, he directs his ex'ors to lay off three acres of land for him, and to let him settle on it and have the use of it during his life and good behaviour, and that he wished Gilbert to enjoy the benefit of his own labour, but to be always under control and direction of his ex'ors; and Gilbert is carefully excepted out of every Slaves.—Emancipation.—For the proposition that emancipation of slaves, to be effective, must be absolute, the principal case is cited in the following: foot-note to Wynn v. disposition of testator's slave property in the will: Held, this slave is not hereby emancipated.

The appellee Gilbert brought suit, in forma pauperis, against the appellant Rucker administrator with the will annexed of Rucker, to recover his freedom. in the county court of Amherst. The proceedings and pleadings were in the usual form, putting in issue the plaintiff's right to freedom. Upon the trial, the jury found a special verdict, stating—

That the plaintiff Gilbert was the slave of the defendant's testator Rucker, at the 9 time of his death. That *Rucker by his last will and testament, duly proved and recorded in the county court of Amherst, after making certain dispositions of slave property, directed, devised and bequeathed, as follows: "My said executors and trustees are hereby authorized to act in hiring out the balance of my negroes, except my mulatto man James Gilbert, from year to year, and rent land &c. during the lifetime of my wife, and apply the money arising therefrom to the best advantage for the benefit of my estate. Item, it is my will and desire that my mulatto man James Gilbert should be free; but finding there would be some difficulty for it to be so, and for him to remain here, I therefore request my executors to lay off three acres of land for said James Gilbert, at any corner of my land, and let him settle on it, that they may think proper; and he is to have it during his natural life on good behaviour, and then to return to my estate. I wish the said James Gilbert to enjoy the benefit of his labour, but always to be under the control and direction of my executors and trustees." That, in a subsequent part of the will, the testator directed all his personal estate and lands to be divided among his children, excepting said James Gilbert, and all his slaves to be valued, excepting said James Gilbert, of whom he made no other or further disposition than as above mentioned. And that the plaintiff was the same person mentioned in the will by the name of James Gilbert. And the jury referred the question to the court, Whether, upon this state of the case, Gilbert was entitled to his freedom?

The county court gave judgment that he was. Rucker's administrator appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, cited Walthall's ex'or v. Robertson and others, 2 Leigh, 189.

Nicholas, assigned counsel for the pauper, said, that the judgment, in a doubtful case ought to be in favorem libertatis;
10 *and he endeavored to maintain, that the main intent of the testator in regard to this mar, to be collected from the whole will was to emancipate him, and that the other provisions respecting him, ought to be held subservient or subordinate to the main intent. He insisted, that the court ought to look to the main intent, and give it effect if consistent with the law. He said, the words willing and desiring, in a will, have always been held to create a trust for the person in whose favour the will and desire are expressed. Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 470; Sanders' Edi. note 1; Dunn v. Amey, 1

Leigh, 467. This testator expressed "his will and desire that his man Gilbert should be free;" and throughout the will, there was no disposition made of Gilbert, as property. The emancipation of the man was the testator's main object, as well as his wish: but finding that there was a difficulty in his remaining in Virginia, he proceeded to make a provision for his subsistence and comfort, supposing he should remain here; and, as this provision was perfectly consistent with, and indeed auxiliary to, the main object, the court ought not to allow it such an effect as to defeat the main intent. That provision was a devise of land to the man he had before willed and desired should be free; a devise of land, which he could not hold unless he was made free: therefore, this very provision of itself implied an emancipation, instead of operating to defeat the will and desire to emancipate before expressed.

BROOKE, J. The question of freedom or slavery in this case, depends on the construction of the two clauses in Rucker's will, set out in the special verdict. No doubt the intention of testators must always be carried into effect, if consistent with the rules of law. But the question is, Whether this testator did intend, that at his death Gilbert should be a free man? If he did, the provisions in the will are very inconsistent. He says, "it is my will and desire that my mulatto man James Gilbert should be free: if he had stopped here, there would have been no doubt, that James *Gilbert would have been free;" and here he would have stopped, if he had simply intended to emancipate him: "but finding" (as he says) "there would be some difficulty for it to be so, and for him to remain here," that is, as a freeman, he does not desire his executors to remove that difficulty, by sending him out of the state, but desires them to lay off three acres of land, which he is to have on good behaviour; certainly not as a freeman, because as such he could impose no such condition upon him; nor could he, as he has done in the last member of the clause, subject him to the control and direction of his executors, in the character of a freeman. However much the testator desired that Gilbert should be free, it was very clear, that he was deterred by the difficulties which the law presented with respect to residence here; and, under the circumstances, determined to do what he considered next best for him; to settle him for life on a piece of land, there to enjoy the fruits of his own labour.

Both judgments are to be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

Winston v. Same.

May, 1881.

Wills—Direction to Sell Realty—Authority of Administrator c. t. a. to Sell.—Testator, being about to leave the county, makes his will, and devises, that in case of his death, or if he should not be heard of for ten years, his land should be sold for the best price that could be got, as was directed by letter of attorney to J. H. of game date with the will, and proceeds divided among his four sisters: HELD, the adm'r with the will annexed has power to sell the land, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 52.

Administrators c. t. a.—Sale of Realty under Will—Bond Taken as Guardian.—The adm'r with the will annexed is guardian of testator's four sisters: he sells the land under power given by testator's will; and takes bonds for the proceeds payable to himself as guardian: HELD he is chargeable in his character of guardian, and his sureties for the guardianship are responsible.

Same—Same—Breach of Trust—Collusion—Liability.—The purchaser of the land, executes bonds for the purchase money in such proportions as the guardian requires, with a view to enable him to transfer bonds to others, for his own purposes: the guardian assigns one bond to T. and another to N. (who are both apprised of the right in which he held them, and that he is in failing circumstances) partly for his own individual debts and for cash advanced him; the guardian dies insolvent: HELD, the sureties of the guardian are primarily responsible to the wards, for so much of these bonds as the guardian misapplied to his own use; the assignees are bound to reimburse the sureties, the debt and costs recovered of them by the wards; each assignee is severally liable for what he received; if assignees prove unable to pay, the purchaser is bound to reimburse the sureties; and if sureties fail, the wards may have recourse against the assignees first, and then the purchaser, they being apprised of, and aiding in, the guardian's breach of his trust.

Guardians—Expenditure of Principal of Ward's Estate for Goods—Duty of One Who Furnishes Supplies.—Though a guardian has no right to expend the principal of his ward's estate, yet if he take up goods for his ward, the merchant who furnishes them, is not bound to see that the profits of ward's estate are sufficient to pay for them, and that the principal is not applied to pay for them.

There is not the least evidence that said McGavock ever charged himself, or was chargeable as guardian, for the value of the negroes sold. It was incumbent on the complainants to produce such evidence to support their claim. Smith v. Gregory, 26 Gratt. 263, and cases there cited: Broadus v. Rosson, etc., 3 Leigh 25."

Bonds—Assignment—Equities of Third Parties Not Parties.—In Thomas v. Linn, 40 W. Va. 127, 20 S. E. Rep. 880, it is said: "The legal title (of nonnegotiable paper) cannot pass by assignment, death alone can pass the legal title, but the equitable owner by assignment may sue in his own name at law, under our statute (see section 14, ch. 90, Code); and, whether overdue or not, the assignee steps into the shoes of the assignor, taking it subject to all prior equities between previous parties (see 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 1-31), being in no better situation than the assignor: for the holder can only sell and transfer such interest as he has (Stockton v. Cook, 8 Munf. 68), but it seems not subject to any equity of a third person not a party to the bond, of which he had no notice (Broadus v. Rosson, 3 Leigh 12)." death or his not being heard of for ten years, "the land aforementioned should be sold for the best price that could be got, which was directed by a power of attorney to John Hilton of the same date." and that the proceeds should be divided among his four sisters, 13 ters, *Clarissa, Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines. The will was duly proved and recorded in the county court of Culpeper at March term 1812; and, the executors therein named, renouncing the executorship, the court granted administration with the will annexed to William Gaines, taking from him an administration bond, wherein William Broadus the younger was bound as his surety.

On or about the 1st January 1814, William Gaines as administrator with the will annexed of Thomas, sold the land in the will mentioned, to William Broadus the elder, for 1058 dollars, on a credit of twelve months; but he did not immediately make a conveyance to the vendee or take his bonds for the purchase money.

At the time this sale was made, Clarissa Gaines was married to Boswell Yates, but William Gaines, the administrator of Thomas, had been her guardian: he was still the guardian of Mary and Lucy Gaines, having been appointed in 1805, and Thomas Freeman, Archibald Tutt, Isaac Winston and Anthony Hughes being the sureties bound in the bond he gave as their guardian: and he was the guardian also of Susan Gaines, appointed in 1813, and the same Archibald Tutt with Philip Jones were the sureties in the bond he gave as her guardian. Before the sale was made, Gaines had contracted a small debt to Richard Norris, a retail dealer, to the amount of about 82 dollars, for articles of cloathing furnished by his directions, to his three wards, Clarissa, Susan and Mary, in different proportions; and he had contracted another debt to William Thompson, for like articles furnished by his directions, to his four wards, Clarissa, Susan, Mary and Lucy, in different proportions, and Thompson held a bond of his testator Thomas Gaines, for a small debt; these claims of Thompson amounted to about 300 dollars; and Gaines owed Thompson, on other accounts, 300 dollars more. The accounts of both Norris and Thompson appeared to have been settled by Gaines. Gaines himself was in failing circumstances, if not quite insolvent; and 14 this was well *known to Broadus the purchaser of the land, and to Norris and Thompson.

Very shortly after the sale of the land to Broadus the elder, Gaines drew an order on him in favour of Norris, for some £ 30. or £ 40. on account of the purchase money; but his son, Broadus the younger, who was Gaines's surety in his administration bond, apprehensive that he might be held responsible for the proceeds of the sale of the land, if the same should be misapplied by Gaines, interposed; and, at his instance, Broadus the elder refused to accept the draft. Upon this, Gaines, in order to enable himself to command the fund, agreed to give Broadus the younger counter security; and, accordingly, at the county court of Culpeper, on the 17th January 1814, he gave a new administration bond, wherein Boswell Yates and Larkin Nalle were his sureties. There was little doubt, that Yates, when he became Gaines's surety in the new bond, was aware of his object in giving it; namely, to obviate the objection of his original surety, Broadus the younger, and to enable him to command the fund arising from the sale of the land to Broadus the elder.

On the 18th January 1814, Broadus the elder, with Broadus the younger as his surety, executed three bonds for the purchase money of the land, though these bonds were ante-dated the 1st of that month; one to Yates for his wife Clarissa's share of the purchase money; and two to Gaines, as the guardian of Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines, one for 600 dollars, the other for 183 dollars 50 cents; Gaines apprising him, that he wanted the bond executed for 600 dollars, in order that he might transfer it to Thompson, and the other bond executed for 183 dollars 50 cents, in order that he might transfer it to Norris. Yates was present, understood the whole arrangement, and made no objection. Gaines, at the same time, executed a conveyance of the land to Broadus, (which he afterwards sold to other persons). And Gaines then transferred the bond for 600 dollars to Thompson, in satisfaction of the amount *due him on the various accounts above mentioned: and he transferred the other bond to Norris, the debt due Norris for the goods furnished by him to the wards Clarissa, Susan and Mary Gaines, being discounted from the amount, and the balance paid by Norris to Gaines in cash. At the time these bonds were assigned to Thompson and Norris, they each knew the consideration for which they had been executed.

Very shortly after these transactions, Gaines went off to Tennessee, where he died insolvent.

In March 1814, Boswell Yates was appointed the guardian of Susau, Mary and Lucy Gaines, and James Yates was his surety in his guardian's bond. And upon the 24th of that month, he gave a written notice to Thompson, Norris and Broadus, warning Broadus that, as the money for which the two bonds for 600 dollars and for 183 dollars 50 cents were executed to Gaines, belonging to his wards, he must not pay the amount thereof to Thompson and Norris the assignees, and warning Thompson and Norris not to assign them away. Nevertheless, Broadus paid Thompson the whole amount of the larger bond which had been transferred to him by Gaines, with the avowed purpose of securing the money to him; and he paid Norris 150 dollars in part of the other bond that had been assigned to him.

Afterwards, Susan Gaines intermarried with Nimrod Rosson: and then a bill was exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg by Boswell Yates and Clarissa his wife, Nimrod Rosson and Susan his wife, and Mary and Lucy Gaines, infants by Boswell Yates their next friend, against Broadus the elder, Thompson and Norris, setting forth the facts of the transactions; insisting, that the money for which the bonds executed by Broadus to Gaines, and by him assigned to Thompson and Norris, were given, belonged to Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines, that Broadus was bound to look to the application of the purchase money of the land sold to him by Gaines under his testator's will, and that 16 Thompson and Norris, having *taken the assignments of those bonds from Gaines, with full notice of the plaintiffs' rights, were not entitled to hold them; and praying, that Broadus should be decreed to pay the money due by those bonds to the three plaintiffs thereto entitled, and that Thompson and Norris should be compelled, respectively, to deliver the bonds, if they yet held them, or if they had received the contents, to account for and pay the amount they had respectively received, to the three plaintiffs entitled.

Broadus, in his answer to this bill, insisted that he was not bound to see to the application of the purchase money, and that his only duty was to pay the same to Gaines or to his assignees. And Thompson and Norris, in their answers, respectively, insisted that they were entitled to hold the bonds under Gaines's assignment, and that the plaintiffs could only look for redress to the sureties bound for Gaines in his guardian's bonds.

Pending this bill, Mary Gaines intermarried with Willis Carr, and the suit was thenceforth prosecuted in the name of Carr and wife. And the cause being heard on this bill, the answers thereto, exhibits and proofs, the court dismissed the bill as to the plaintiffs Boswell Yates and wife with costs; and gave the other plaintiffs leave to amend and make new parties, and substituted Nimrod Rosson in place of Yates, as the next friend of the infant plaintiff Lucy Gaines, to prosecute the suit on her behalf. Whereupon, Nimrod Rosson and Susan his wife, Willis Carr and Mary his wife, and Lucy Gaines by Rosson her next friend, exhibited an amended bill, wherein, referring to the former bill and proceedings thereupon, they made the following parties defendants, in addition to those made by the former bill; namely, William Broadus the younger, the surety of William Gaines in his first bond for the due administration of Thomas Gaines's estate; Boswell Yates and Larkin Nalle, the sureties in Gaines's second administration bond; Arch. Tutt and Philip Jones, the sureties of Gaines in the bond he gave as guardian of Susan 17 Gaines; *Arch. Tutt, Isaac Winston and Elizabeth Hughes executrix of Anthony Hughes, three of the sureties of Gaines in the bond he gave as guardian of Mary and Lucy Gaines, Thomas Freeman the other surety therein bound, having removed from the commonwealth, and died insolvent; and Boswell Yates as the successor guardian of Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines, and James Yates the surety bound in his guardian's bond: and the bill prayed relief generally, against such of the parties defendants made by the original and amended bills, as the court should hold liable to the plaintiffs; and that Boswell Yates, the last guardian, should render accounts of his guardianship.

Most of these new parties filed their answers, insisting, respectively, that they were exempt from liability to the plaintiffs; and as to the others, the bill was regularly taken pro confesso.

The facts of the case as above stated, appeared, clearly enough, upon the pleadings and proofs in the cause. It also appeared, that Jones the co-surety with Tutt for William Gaines as guardian of Susan Gaines, was not a resident of Virginia: That the three wards Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines, had other property besides their shares of the proceeds of the land bequeathed to them by Thomas Gaines's will: And that in another suit prosecuted by the plaintiffs against the sureties of Gaines as their guardian, accounts of the guardianship had been taken, in which the proceeds of this land had not been accounted for, and yet on those accounts there was a balance found in favor of the wards.

The chancellor held, that the sureties of Gaines as guardian for Susan Gaines, were responsible to her for her share of the proceeds of the land, subject to a deduction for the goods furnished her by Thompson and by Norris respectively; and deducing, accordingly, the amount of their bills respectively, from her share, he decreed that Tutt (Jones being a non resident) should pay the balance with interest, to the plaintiffs Rosson 18 and wife. He held, *likewise, that

Tutt, Winston, and the executrix of Hughes, the sureties of Gaines as guardian for Mary and Lucy Gaines (the other surety, Freeman, being dead insolvent) were responsible to them respectively for their shares of the proceeds of the land, subject to deductions for the goods furnished them respectively, by Thompson and Norris; and deducting the amount of Thompson's and Norris's bills for goods furnished to each of them, he decreed that Tutt, Winston and Hughes's executrix should pay to Carr and wife, and to Lucy Gaines, the balances due to each respectively, with interest. And he decreed the plaintiffs their costs against the defendants Tutt, Winston and Hughes's executrix. But the decree required the plaintiffs to release, by proper deeds, all their right, title and interest in the land, directed to be sold by Thomas Gaines's will, to the purchaser thereof from William Gaines his administrator, as a condition upon which they should be entitled to payment of the balances decreed to them. And the chancellor, declaring that the liabilities which he had thus imposed on the sureties of Gaines as guardian of the plaintiffs, were caused by a fraudulent combination of the defendants Thompson, Norris, Broadus the elder, and Boswell Yates, with Gaines the guardian; that each and all of those defendants participated in procuring Gaines's breach of trust, in regard to the fraud; and that, therefore, he would not undertake to discriminate among them, or to inquire how far the transaction enured to the benefit of either, but would hold each and all bound to reimburse the sureties, to the full extent of the injury sustained by them in consequence of this fraudulent combination; therefore, decreed against the defendants Thompson, Norris, Broadus the elder, and Boswell Yates, jointly, that they should pay to the sureties the sums which they were respectively decreed to pay the plaintiff, and their own costs expended in their defence.

From this decree. Broadus, Thompson and Norris, first, appealed; and afterwards. Winston also, one of Gaines's sureties, prayed an appeal, which was allowed.

19 *Stanard, for the appellants Thompson and Norris, 1. endeavoured to maintain, that they were entitled to hold the bonds assigned to them respectively by Gaines, or the money they had received from Broadus upon them: that they acquired by the assignment, the legal right to the bonds, and were not chargeable with any fraud, or participation in fraud, which could impair that right in equity. Norris had a just claim against Gaines as guardian of Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines: he took an assignment from Gaines of a bond executed to him as guardian of the same persons, for a greater amount, and paid him the difference in cash. Thompson, having claims against Gaines, as the representative of Thomas Gaines, upon that testator's bond, and as the guardian of Clarissa, Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines, the cestuis que trust to whom he was accountable for the proceeds of the land he had sold to Broadus, amounting to 300 dollars, took from Gaines, the assignment of Broadus's bond for 600 dollars, in discharge of those claims, and of a debt of 300 dollars due him from Gaines on other accounts. To the amount of 300 dollars, then, this part of the fund was justly applied. And as to the residue of the bond assigned to Thompson, Gaines got no other advantage, and his wards, or the sureties for his guardianship, sustained no other loss, than he would have got, or they sustained, if he had sold the bond in the market. The assignees, in effect, did no more than cash the bonds; they paid Gaines the money, instead of Broadus. If Broadus had paid it to him, and he had then paid it to Thompson and Norris, for exactly the same consideration for which he assigned them Broadus's bonds; in that case, he asked, could they have ever been held bound to refund the money? and would not Gaines's sureties have been held liable for his alleged misapplication of the fund, without recourse against them? He said, the actual case, in substance and in principle, was not materially different. And he argued, that if cestuis que trust may pursue the trust subject in the hands of assignees of the trustee, in a case where the trustee has given no security

20 *for the due discharge of the trust, it was because the trustee has given no security, and the rights of the cestuis que trust can no otherwise be preserved; and it by no means followed, nor had it ever been held, that where the trustee has given ample security, his sureties, who have expressly undertaken to stand sponsors for his fidelity, may, for their own indemnity, pursue the subject in the hands of assignees who have acquired the legal title from the trustee. But, 2. supposing Thompson and Norris bound to refund to Gaines's wards, or to his sureties, he said they could not be held jointly liable, each with the other and with Broadus and Yates: each of them should be held severally liable for what he had received of the money due on the bond assigned to him, over and above the amount of the debt due him by Gaines in his character of trustee. Now, Norris had received of Broadus, only 150 dollars, in part of the bond for 183 dollars 50 cents assigned to him; he was entitled to 82 dollars for goods furnished Gaines's wards Clarissa, Susan and Mary, and was, therefore, bound to refund only 68

dollars with interest: the balance still due from Broadus upon this bond, ought to be decreed against him. And Thompson was also entitled to retain, out of the bond for 600 dollars assigned to him, the amount of the debts which were due to him from Gaines in his character of trustee, and which were fairly chargeable upon this fund, and ought only to refund the residue with interest.

Williams and Briggs, for Tutt, Winston and Hughes, contended, 1. that there ought to have been no decree against these parties, the sureties bound for Gaines in his guardian's bond. For the fund consisted wholly of the proceeds of land, sold by him as administrator with the will annexed of Thomas Gaines: the purchase money was due to him only in that character: he was accountable for it, as administrator, to the legatees, of his testator, not as guardian of the legatees, to them as his wards: he could not vary the character of his responsibility, and charge his sureties as guardian, 21 *by taking the bonds as guardian, for money due him as administrator. But 2. supposing these sureties were responsible at all, they insisted, that they ought not to be held primarily liable. Broadus, after he had been warned, that Gaines would probably misapply the fund, with full knowledge that he was in failing circumstances, with express notice that he intended to transfer the bonds to Thompson and Norris, and for the purpose of enabling him so to transfer them, executed the bonds, at Gaines's request, for different sums: he was, therefore, a party to Gaines's breach of trust. He paid the money to the assignees, after he was warned of the just claims of the legatees: he thus wilfully aided the assignees in appropriating the funds to themselves. As to Thompson and Norris, they too knew that Gaines was in failing circumstances; and the bonds bore evidence on the face of them, that they were the property of Gaines's wards, Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines; yet they took the assignment of them from Gaines, and enabled him to appropriate the money, in part at least, to his own use: they also were parties to his breach of trust. It was immaterial, whether they were seeking advantage to themselves, at the expense of his wards, or at the expense of his sureties. The parties entitled to the fund, have a right to pursue it in their hands. Graff v. Castleman, 5 Rand. 195. Then, 3. Broadus, having participated and aided in Gaines's breach of trust; Thompson and Norris, having received the fund from him, with notice of the trust and of the breach of it; and these parties being bound to make good the loss ultimately, either to Gaines's wards, or to his sureties, whichever shall sustain it; and they, as well as the sureties being before the court, they ought to be held directly and primarily liable, instead of subjecting the sureties in the first instance, and giving them a decree over against the others. And 4. the chancellor ought to have given the sureties a decree against the same parties, for the costs of the plaintiffs which were decreed against them, as well as for their own costs incurred in their defence.

22 *Johnson, for the appellees who were plaintiffs below, and for Boswell Yates, maintained, that the former were entitled to relief against the sureties of their guardian ; and, if necessary, against Thompson and Norris, who had got possession of their funds by improper dealings with the guardian ; and, in case these parties should prove insufficient, against Broadus, who had aided the guardian to misapply the fund. That the sureties of the guardian were, by law, directly responsible to the wards ; and though in equity they might have recourse against others, if the sureties should fail, yet they were not bound to pursue their recourse against any but the sureties ; and though it might have been immaterial, perhaps, how the order of responsibility had been arranged, there was no occasion to correct the decree in this respect. That the sureties of the guardian, being held accountable to the wards, for the fund which he had transferred to Thompson and Norris, these parties, who had received the fund, ought to be compelled to pay it to the sureties ; and if they prove insolvent, Broadus, who had certainly aided in the misapplication of the fund, ought to be held responsible to the sureties. But, he said, there was no reason why Yates should be held responsible in any way, in any event, or to any body ; for, even supposing, with the chancellor, that he was a confederate with Gaines, Broadus, Thompson, and Norris, in the misapplication of the fund, yet he had received none of it himself, and it was not the province of the court to punish him ; however, no such confederacy was justly imputable to him. The dismissal of the original bill as to him and his wife was improper ; and it was yet more improper to decree the defendants their costs against him, and that before the final hearing. The decree was erroneous in two other respects : 1st, in requiring the plaintiffs to execute deeds of release of the land ; a condition imposed upon them, it seemed, upon the supposition that it was doubtful, at least, whether Gaines had a right to sell it under the will of his testator ; but there could be no doubt about it ; for, though the will

23 *of Thomas Gaines devised that the land should be sold, as was directed in a power of attorney to John Hilton, yet that power was annulled by the testator's death, and the administrator with the will annexed was the proper person, and the only proper person, to make the sale. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 52, p. 388. 2ndly, In deducting the amount of the claims of Thompson and Norris, for the goods furnished by them to Susan, Mary and Lucy Gaines, from their shares of the fund in question ; because there was no proof that the claims were just ; and because the guardian of an infant cannot apply the principal of his ward's estate to his maintenance, without an express order of court. Myers v. Wade, 6 Rand. 444. But if the chancellors properly allowed this deduction, he was plainly right in allowing only the amount of Thompson and Norris's bills against Susan, Mary and Lucy, respectively, to be deducted from the share of each ; they had no pretence to claim, that their bills against Clarissa, should also be deducted.

Stanard. The claims of Thompson and Norris for goods furnished the wards, were well proved ; for it appears, that their accounts were settled by Gaines the guardian, who was competent to make such settlement, and had no motive to admit any item which was unjust. As to the expenditure of the principal of the wards' estate : it appears they had other estate ; and it nowise appears, that the whole expenditure for their support, exceeded the profits of their whole property.

TUCKER, P. It seems to be agreed on all hands, that there are errors in the proceedings and decree in this cause.

The first that occurs, is the dismissal of the original bill, as to Yates and wife, and decreeing them to pay costs. Whether he was or was not a participator in the fraudulent transaction complained of, his wife, and he of course, were necessary parties, either as plaintiffs or defendants, in this suit for 24 the proceeds of the sale of the land, which were to be divided among them all ; and he being a proper party with his wife, they might well be joined as plaintiffs, for conformity. The dismissal as to them was therefore erroneous, and the more so, as the defendants were decreed their costs against them, before the cause was finally heard. Out of this error grew another. Yates having been, by the amended bill, made a party defendant, solely upon the supposition that he was liable for the fraud, his wife was not made a party, and was not a party at the hearing. These errors, however, are rendered unimportant by the subsequent proceedings in the cause.

The errors in the final decree, are much more vital. All the parties complain of it. The plaintiffs complain, that Thompson and Norris's store accounts against them were allowed, and thus their recovery against the sureties of their guardian, was improperly reduced ; and that the chancellor improperly required them to execute deeds of release of the land to the purchaser ; which last objection, indeed, seems very obvious. The sureties of the guardian complain, that they are improperly charged, because the money claimed was not due to their principal Gaines as guardian, but as the representative of his testator, and he was responsible as administrator to the legatees, not as guardian to his wards ; that, supposing them chargeable, they ought not to have been charged in the first instance ; and that only their own costs are decreed to them against Thompson and others, without including the costs decreed to the plaintiffs against them. Thompson, Norris, Broadus and Yates, each and all, insist that there ought to have been no decree against them ; and complain yet more, that they are made jointly responsible for the whole of the sums decreed. Let us consider these objections, succinctly, in their order.

As to the plaintiffs' objection to the allowance of the store accounts. This rests upon two grounds ; that there is no sufficient proof of the advance of the goods ; and that, if there was, they were improperly paid for out of the principal of the infants' estate. The first of these grounds is 25 not tenable. As it respects Thompson and Norris's demands, the bona fide settlement and acknowledgment of the guardian, are, I think, conclusive. He and his sureties, indeed, are bound to shew, that those advances were necessary, and that they were really made; but the merchant is not bound to shew that they were necessary, since it is the province of the guardian to judge of that; nor can he be called upon for further proof of the delivery and price, than the acknowledgment of the guardian with whom he dealt. The other question is more difficult. If the guardian runs up an account for his ward, and pays it out of the principal of his estate, the merchant cannot be bound to refund if he was ignorant of the fact. But, where he is aware that he is receiving payment out of a fund which the law will not permit to be encroached on without an order of the court, I think he stands on no more advantageous ground than the guardian himself. In this case, both Norris and Thompson knew, before they received this money, that it was a part of the wards' principal estate. As such, according to Myers v. Wade, it could not properly be applied to their current expenses, without the authority of the proper tribunal; and it is, therefore, as necessary in reference to them, as it would be in relation to Gaines, to institute an inquiry, if it be insisted on, as to the propriety of the charge upon this portion of those funds.

We come now to consider the objections of the sureties to the decree. They insist, that they ought not to be charged at all, because their principal was not chargeable as guardian, but as administrator to the legatees. But, in selling the land, he did not act as administrator, properly speaking; he acted as trustee. In taking the bonds as guardian, he charged himself with the fund as guardian; and in this he did right. But the sureties complain, that, at any rate, they should not be first charged. And this complaint I think well founded. If, as I suppose, Thompson and Norris are responsible and bound to refund, they ought to have been first charged. It is natural justice, 26 not only to put the burden *on the right person, but to place it there in the first instance; since, otherwise, the most innocent party will bear the brunt of the suit. The only injury the plaintiff can sustain by this compliance with the terms of the tribunal whose aid he invokes, is a short delay which is more than compensated by his proceeding here against all the parties together, instead of in detail. The claim of the sureties to have the costs which are decreed to the plaintiffs against them, reimbursed to them by the parties ultimately responsible, is deemed well founded.

The other parties, over against whom the decree is rendered in favour of the sureties, are most loud in their complaints. They complain, and very justly, that they are all banded together, and the whole made responsible on the ground of fraud and conspiracy, not only for what they have received, but for what they have not received. Yates, for instance, has received nothing over and above his wife's just portion of the money; yet because he is supposed to have connived at the fraud, he is made responsible for the whole amount, although he has neither participated in the spoils, nor been the means of enabling others to acquire them. He was only engaged, I think, and that very naturally, in securing his wife's portion of the proceeds of sale which he had a right to receive. He was therefore improperly made a party with the view to charge him with this responsibility, but as he was a necessary party on other grounds (for a settlement of his accounts as guardian is demanded) the question of his costs must await the final decree as to that matter. Neither were Yates or Nalle, Gaines's sureties in the counter administration bond, necessary or proper parties in that character, since the sureties of the administrator were not liable for the proceeds of sale of the land. For the like reason, and because there was no foundation for proceeding against him, Wm. Broadus the younger was an improper party. And as to James Yates the surety in the guardian's bond of Boswell Yates, it is difficult to conceive on what ground he was made a party. As to all these the bill should have been dismissed.

27 *With respect to Norris and Thompson the case is very different. Thompson's case seems to me beyond all doubt. He procured the payment out of the funds of Gaines's wards, of debts which were not due from them, or fairly chargeable on them. He procured this payment from a guardian notoriously failing, if not intirely insolvent, with a full knowledge of the misapplication of the funds, to the prejudice of his wards or of his sureties. He was thus getting payment of his claims out of money which he knew could not be so applied without defrauding an infant or a surety. Equity has no allowance for such transactions, and will rigorously compel the restoration of the unjust acquisition. Whether he shall be made responsible directly to the infant, or held responsible over to the sureties, is a matter, indeed, which the court arranges with regard to the rights of the plaintiffs who have a title to charge them all: but in whatever mode the responsibilities are arranged, he is bound (and in my opinion primarily chargeable) for what he has illegally received, though for nothing more. This can only be finally adjusted by an account, ascertaining how far the store account against the wards was fairly chargeable on the fund in question, unless the plaintiffs in the cause should waive the inquiry, and admit the account.

The case of Norris is less clear so far as respects the money advanced for the bond. But, as by cashing the bond with a knowledge of the failing condition of Gaines, he must have foreseen, that he was facilitating the perpetration of a fraud and misapplication of the fund, I think he cannot shelter himself behind the technicality that Gaines had a right to receive the amount of the bond from Broadus, and that the transfer of it for the full amount in cash, was the same thing in effect. But for his interference the money might not, probably would not, and perhaps ought not to have been paid by Broadus, eleven months before it was due; and in the mean time, the sureties might have protected themselves by the ordinary remedies afforded by the law. I am therefore of opinion, that he too is chargeable in like manner as Thompson.

28 *As to Wm. Broadus the elder, if his case rested solely on the ground of his obligation to see to the proper application of the purchase money for the land sold by the administrator, I should regard him as exonerated by the execution of the bonds to the guardian, if the subsequent payment of them had been without objection. So far from its having been fraudulent to execute the bonds to the guardian, it was a prudent step, and not an improper one in Broadus, who was bound to see that those funds came to the guardian's hands. But his knowledge of the embarrassments of Gaines, his objecting to make any payment while his son was bound, and waiving all objection as soon as he was released, certainly place his conduct in an unfavorable light; and, as he has paid or in some manner satisfied the amount of the bonds or the greater part of them, notwithstanding the early warning he received not to do so, it cannot be denied that he ought to be held ultimately responsible in case of the insolvency of the other parties.

I, therefore, should reverse the decree, and enter a decree conforming with the opinions I have expressed on the several points. But the other judges differ with me in opinion upon some of the points, and concur in an order to be entered, which expresses the opinion of the court.

The decree which was entered upon Winston's appeal, declared, that he, and consequently his co-sureties for Gaines, were not injured by the decree of the court of chancery; and, therefore, affirmed it as to him, with damages and costs.

The decree entered upon the appeal taken by Broadus, Thompson and Norris, declared, that so much of the chancellor's decree as was pronounced between the appellants and Boswell Yates, on the one side, and the sureties of Gaines the guardian, on the other, was erroneous in charging the former, jointly, to indemnify the latter against their responsibility to the plaintiffs; that Yates was in no way liable to indemnify them in any respect; and that the appellants

29 *were bound to indemnify them only to the amount of the bonds of Broadus the elder assigned by Gaines to Thompson and Norris, respectively, after deducting their respective accounts against him as guardian, for the three female plaintiffs, respectively, and in respect to which, Thompson and Norris were severally liable, in the first instance, each for the amount of the bond assigned to him, subject to that deduction, and Broadus the elder was only responsible for any part thereof, which could not be recovered from them respectively; that Winston and others, the sureties, should not be at liberty to enforce payment of the sums of money decreed to them respectively, against Thompson, Norris and Broadus the elder, until they themselves should have paid the plaintiffs the sums decreed to be paid by them respectively; that the plaintiffs in case the sureties, or any of them, should fail to make due payment to them, should be at liberty to resort to this decree, and to prosecute it for their benefit, in the name of the surety so failing, against Thompson, Norris and Broadus, to make good the deficiency. And Thompson, Norris and Broadus were decreed to reimburse to the sureties, the costs of the court of chancery, decreed to the plaintiffs against them, as well as to pay them their own costs expended in their defence there.

30 *Christian and Wife and Another v. Coleman's Adm'r and Others.

(Absent TUCKER, P. and BROOKE, J.)

Hotchpot—Advancements*—Profits of Lands in Possession of Children during Life of Mother.—A mother tenant for life of lands, gives possession of several parcels thereof, to four of her children, respectively, to be cultivated by them for their own use, but makes them no conveyance: these children hold the respective parcels of land, as tenants at will of their mother, till her death, taking the profits to their own use, no rents being rendered or demanded: HELD, they are not bound to account for these profits, and bring them into hotchpot, as an advancement, real or personal, in the division and distribution of the mother's estate, under the statutes 1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 17, ch. 104, § 29.

Elizabeth Coleman died in 1819, seized and possessed of sundry real and personal estate, and intestate. Her daughter Mary, who afterwards married Daniel Christian, her sons James, Thomas and Samuel, and her grandchildren, John, Elizabeth, Robert, Lindsay and James Hardwick, the children of her deceased daughter Anne Hardwick, were her heirs and distributees. Her son Thomas was her administrator. Mrs. Coleman had been, during her life, entitled to a life estate in lands devised to her by her husband, who died in 1778: and, many years before her death, she put several parcels of this land into the possession of her sons, Thomas, Samuel and James, as they attained to manhood, and her daughter Nancy, when she married, to cultivate for their own use, respectively; but she made no conveyance to either; they were all mere tenants at will; and so they continued to hold till her death, enjoying the profits without any account rendered or demanded. To her daughter Mary she did not give the use of any of the land: this daughter remaining unmarried, lived with her mother, after her attainment to full age, without being charged for board or maintenance, and on her part rendering her mother in her old age, such services as were proper to the relation between mother and daughter in their condition of life.

31 *In a suit brought by Christian and wife and James Coleman against their co-heirs and distributees, Thomas and Samuel Coleman and the five children of Mrs. Hardwick, and Thomas as the administrator of his mother, among various points of controversy between the parties, one was, Whether, in the division and distribution of the mother's estate, James, Thomas, Samuel, and the children of Mrs. Hardwick, respectively, were bound to account for the profits of the several parcels of land, of which their mother, during her life, had given them the use, and which they had held till her death without rendering rent, and to bring the profits into hotchpot as an advancement, real or personal, according to the statutes of descents and distributions? See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 17, ch. 104, § 29, pp. 357, 382.

The chancellor, in an interlocutory decree determining all matters in controversy in the cause, declared, that these profits were not to be regarded as advancements to the parties, respectively, who had enjoyed them by their mother's permission, and that they were not bound to account for and bring them into hotchpot in the division of her estate. And upon an appeal from the decree to this court, taken by the plaintiffs below, this was the main point here, and the only one involving any question of law.

Johnson for the appellants.

Stanard for the appellees.

This court concurring with the chancellor upon the question, held, That the possession and use of the land given by the mother to the four children, being permissive and precarious, could not be considered as an advancement made towards their permanent establishment in life, nor could they have converted such a right as they held into money to be applied to that purpose.

32 *Boyd and Another v. Cook, Ex'or of Vass.

(Absent TUCKER, P. and BROOKE, J.)

Wills—Testator Blind—Validity—Case at Bar.—The will of a blind man shall be admitted to probat and record, as a will of real as well as personal estate, if attested at his request in the same room with him, though it be not proved that the will was read to him in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or that it was ever read to him, provided it appears satisfactorily to the court, that he was acquainted with its contents, and intended to make the testamentary dispositions therein contained.

Same—Probate Court—Province.—A court of probat occupies the place of a jury as to questions of fact, and its province is, like that of a jury, to draw all just inferences from the evidence.

Same—Revocation—Belief as to Destruction.—A blind testator orders a will made by him to be destroyed, and believes it is destroyed accordingly, but it is not destroyed, and no act towards destruction done: this is not a revocation by destruction or cancellation, within the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 3. At least, a court of probat cannot consider this as amounting to a revocation.

A writing purporting to be the last will and testament of Philip Vass deceased, was offered for probat in the county court of Halifax, by J. W. Cook, the executor therein named; and the probat was contested by Alex. Boyd and John Shepperd. The county court, upon a hearing of the evidence on both sides, refused the probat. Cook appealed to the circuit court; which reversed the sentence of the county court, and ordered, in general terms, that the paper "should be recorded as the last will and testament of the decedent;" that is, admitted the will to full probat, as a will of real as well as of personal estate. The circuit court refused to admit some of the evidence offered by Boyd and Shepperd against the will; to which they filed exceptions; and, at their instance, all the evidence heard by the court, was ordered to be stated on the record. They then applied to a judge of this court for a supersedeas to the sentence; which was awarded.

The following is a copy of the paper in question:

"In the name of God amen. I Philip Vass of Halifax county, do make this my last will and testament, in manner *and form as followeth, viz: It is my desire, that all my debts be first paid. If any of my children should die without an heir or will, their estate hereafter devised or given shall return again to my estate, to be divided as shall be hereafter directed. If any of the legatees shall attempt to break this will, or shall enter a suit in law against the legatees, or any one of them, shall forfeit his or their estate hereafter given to them; the forfeited estate returned back to my estate, to be divided as shall be hereafter directed. I give unto my daughter Mary Boyd, negro girl Lydia and her increase, to dispose of as she pleaseth: also I lend unto A. M. B. Rachel and her increase; which negro and increase shall not be sold for no debt or debts of Alexander Boyd or his wife Mary Boyd, in no case whatever; the aforesaid negro Rachel and her increase is not to be removed out of the county of Halifax, without the consent of a majority of the legatees concerned: in either of these two cases a breach be made, a sale or removal, negro Rachel and her increase is forfeited, and return immediately into my estate, to be divided as shall hereafter be directed. Negro Rachel and her increase is lent unto Alexander Boyd and Mary Boyd his wife during their lives, with the above exceptions; and at their death, to return into my estate, and to be divided as shall be hereafter directed. I give unto my son James, negro Amy and her child Leatha and their increase, to him and his heirs forever. I give unto my daughter Sarah L. Vass, three negroes Lucinda, Harriet her daughter, and Amanda Melvina, with their increase, to her and her heirs forever. I give unto my daughter Anna Vass, three negroes, Easter, Eliza and Caroline, with their increase, to her and her heirs forever. I give unto my daughter Apphia Vass, three negroes Martha, Ealle and Maria Louisa, with their increase, to her and her heirs forever. I give unto my son Philip E. Vass, Mary and her brother Jacob, with her increase, to him and his heirs forever. I give unto my grand daughter Mary Elizabeth Shepperd, negro girl Rose and her increase; provided my grand daughter Mary

34 *E. Shepperd dieth under age or without a child lawfully begotten, then negro Rose and her increase to be divided between her surviving brothers and sisters and their heirs forever. I lend unto my beloved wife Elizabeth Vass, during her widowhood, the land whereon I now live, and all the rest of my estate which I have not devised or given; recommending to her particular care my dear daughter Elizabeth Sheppard and her children, during your life. And at the death of my dear wife, my land whereon I now live, to be sold by my executor, on a credit of four annual equal payments, security taken on the land for the payment thereof; the one fourth of the sale of this land to be put out at interest, which interest is to support my daughter Elizabeth Shepperd, and her children with schooling &c. and the principal at her death, to be equally divided between her children, and their heirs forever. It is also my desire, that my western land be sold, when there the Indian right is extinguished, and my land surveyed, it be sold at with four equal annual payments, security taken on the land for the payment thereof: this land may be sold sooner than above mentioned, if it is thought best by the legatees. The money arising from the sale of the western land, three-fourths of the money arising from the sale of the land whereon I now live, with all the remainder of my estate not already given, to be equally divided by commissioners appointed by court, between my children James P. Vass, Sarah L. Vass, Anna Vass, Apphia Vass and Philip E. Vass, and their heirs forever. I appoint my beloved friend Jarrett W. Cook my executor to this will who is to receive a reasonable sum out of my estate for his services. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 13th day of December 1816.

"Witness, Anderson Powell,

"Moses Shearan.

"Philip Vass, [seal]."

The evidence for the will, was, in substance, as follows:

1. The subscribing witness, Anderson Powell, was examined in open court, and testified, that he attested the 35 *will, in the summer of the year 1817—that he went to the house of the decedent Mr. Vass; Moses Shearan was there; he took a seat, and entered into conversation; Mr. Vass said, he wished them to witness his will, and called to one of his daughters (the witness believed, it was Sarah) and directed her to bring his will, and she brought the paper now exhibited as his will. He asked the witness, if he had ever seen a blind man write his name; the witness answered he had not; he then told him, if he would hand him a pen with ink in it, he would shew him that a blind man could write his name. The witness handed him a pen: he placed the paper on a table before him, and asked the witness to put his hand at the proper place; which the witness did; and the decedent wrote his name, and then acknowledged it to be his will, and requested the witness and Shearan to witness it, which they both did, immediately, in his presence; that is, (as the witness explained himself) in the same room with him. Before the attestation of the will, the decedent told the witness, he had been "very near slipping off the other day without a will;" and then called them (the witnesses) as before stated. After the attestation, Mrs. Vass, his wife, came into the room, and remarked, that she thought he wished to have some alteration made in the will, and it was not worth while to have it witnessed before that was done: he answered, that he intended to have that alteration made, "but he expected brother Cook down in a few days, and he could then have it done." The decedent was of sound mind and memory at the time the will was executed, and was a man of good understanding: but he was quite blind, and had been so ever since the witness's first acquaintance with him, which was in 1809. The will was in the hand writing of the decedent's daughter, Sarah E. Vass, a legatee mentioned in the will. It might have been read to the decedent in the presence of others, for aught the witness knew;

but it was never read to him in his presence or hearing; nor did the decedent mention, that it had been written in 1816, or say 36 who had written it, *or explain why his daughter Sarah, who had in fact written it, could not also alter it.

2. The other attesting witness, Moses Shearan, was examined under a commission from the circuit court, and deposed, That the paper in question was attested by him, he thought in the year 1816, at the request of the decedent, who told him that it was his will; and the witness saw him sign his name to it. The will itself was not written in the witness's presence. The witness had been acquainted with the decedent only one or two years: he thought him very precise and particular about matters of business: at the time the will was executed, he was in good health and cheerful, and of sound disposing mind and memory. After it was executed, he gave it to one of his daughters to put away. The will was not read to the decedent in the witness's presence, nor had the witness ever heard it read. He did not recollect any conversation between the decedent and his wife, at the time of the execution of the will.

3. Francis Ford, a resident of North Carolina, examined under a commission from the circuit court, deposed, That he had been long and intimately acquainted with the decedent Mr. Vass, and had had many dealings with him; and he described him as very punctual, and exact in his dealings. He had been at the decedent's house to see him, since he was blind, several times; the last time was in March or April 1823, when the witness staid there with him five or six days, and there was a great deal of conversation between them concerning their respective family affairs, in the course of which, the decedent told him, that he had made his will: that he had not given Mr. Shepperd any of his property, but had, in his will, directed the land he lived on to be sold at the death of his wife, and one fourth of the proceeds to be put out at interest, and Mrs. Shepperd was to draw the interest for the support of herself and children as long as she lived, and at her death the money was to be divided among all her children: that he had given his grand daughter, Mr. Shepperd's

*on certain conditions, which the witness did not recollect: that he had given his daughter Mary Boyd one negro girl and her increase, to do as she pleased with, and the other negroes which she then had and their increase, at the death of Mr. and Mrs. Boyd, were to be returned back to his estate: that he had given his sons, James and Philip, two slaves apiece, and his three daughters, Sally, Anna and Apphia, three slaves apiece: that he had made ample provision for his wife, if she should outlive him; that she was to keep the land, and several of the best working hands, and all the stock, and household and kitchen furniture, as long as she lived: that he had traded his western lands for lots in Danville and a tract of land above Danville, and one below Halifax court house: that he had a notion of altering his will, and settling his son James's property so that he could not spend it, for he wished his children to have the benefit of it: that his reason for not giving as much of his property to Mrs. Boyd as to some others of his children, was, that he did not think she would ever have children, and he did not wish her husband or any of his family to have any of his property; he wished his own children to have it: and that Mr. Sheppard had treated him and all his family coldly; and he believed for no other reason than because he would not make him a right to some of his property, which was what he never intended to do, and had so directed it in his will. As to that important provision of the will whereby the residue of the money arising from the sale of the land he lived on, with all the residuum of his estate, were bequeathed to be equally divided among his children, James, Sarah, Anna, Apphia and Philip, the witness did not state, that the decedent made any mention of it whatever.

4. Eight witnesses, residents of North Carolina, deposed as to the general reputation of the deponent Ford, that they esteemed him, and he was generally esteemed, a man of integrity and veracity.

38 *5. John Webb, also a resident of North Carolina, examined under a commission from the circuit court, deposed, That he was the brother of Mrs. Vass, the wife of the decedent, and that he visited the decedent and his family some years before his death; and while he was with him, the decedent told him how he intended to make his will, for the purpose of providing for his two daughters, Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. Sheppard—that the property he intended for his daughter, Mrs. Boyd, she and her husband were to keep possession of as long as they both lived, and at their death it was to be returned to his estate; and his reason for intending to do this, was, that he thought Mrs. Boyd would never have children, and he did not wish his property to fall into the hands of the Boyd family; that what he intended to give Mrs. Sheppard, was to be in money to be put out at interest, and she was to draw the interest for the support of herself and children as long as she lived, and at her death the principal was to be divided among all her children. The witness farther deposed, that since Mr. Vass's death, he had made a visit to his sister Mrs. Vass; Mrs. Vass shewed him a paper, which she told him, was her husband's will; he read a part of it, but not being able to read it as distinctly as he wished, he desired it should be read to him; it was accordingly read to him; and the bequests to Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. Sheppard, therein contained, were nearly such as the decedent had told the witness he intended to make to those two daughters, according to the deponent's memory of the conversation: but the witness did not know, that the paper shewn to him was Mr. Vass's will; or that its contents were truly read to him; he believed it was correctly read. Being asked, how long it had been since he had the conversation with the deceased? he answered, "he did not recollect."

In the deposition of this witness taken under a commission from the county court, his answer to the same question, was, that "he supposed it was before the will was made."

39 *6. J. W. Cooke junior testified,

That, in a conversation he had with the decedent, the date of which he did not certainly remember, but he thought it was in 1823, Mr. Vass told him, he had a will, but he was not well pleased with it, and he intended to go to Mr. Bruce or Mr. Medley [gentlemen who lived in the neighbourhood] and have a will prepared, and in case he should not get there, that will was to stand; that when he was a young man, he did not keep a will, but since he had like to have dropped off in a fit of epilepsy, and after that "he had kept a will by him," or "had one prepared." The decedent said also, that he had given Mr. Sheppard's oldest daughter a negro girl; the witness did not remember the name of this girl, but believed it was Betsey. The decedent mentioned to the witness his reasons for not giving Mr. Boyd or Mr. Sheppard any of his property: he said, his daughter Mrs. Boyd had no children, and he believed would never have any, and if he gave Mr. Boyd any thing, it would fall to the Boyd family; and he did not think Mr. Boyd capable of managing an estate: and as to Mr. Sheppard, the witness had often heard him say, that if he gave him any part of his estate, he was such a drunkard, he would spend it, or drink it up.

7. D. C. Goode testified, That in a conversation between him and the decedent in August 1823, he made declarations of his intentions with respect to his daughters Mrs. Sheppard and Mrs. Boyd, to the same effect with those detailed by the other witnesses.

The evidence against the will, was, in substance, as follows:

1. Spencer Laws testified, That he had a conversation with the decedent, at his house, in October 1820, in the course of which the decedent said that some of his children (without saying which, did not please him: the witness remarked to him, that he had a good deal of property to dispose of; the decedent replied that he had, and "that he had had a will, but had destroyed it." And the witness then suggesting, that the laws of the country would make an equal distribution, *he said "they would, if a man could be reconciled to it." The witness's acquaintance with the decedent commenced in the spring preceding this conversation; he had been in his company some five or six times; they were on friendly terms, but there was no intimacy between them.

2. Notley Jordan testified, That shortly after the death of a Mr. Bruce, in the latter part of 1824 or the first of 1825 he went to see the decedent, to hire one of his slaves; when the decedent asked the witness if he had understood whether Mr. Bruce left a will or not? The witness told him, he understood he had, but it had been made fifteen or twenty years before. The decedent then said, "it was right that a man should keep a will by him, for he knew not what day or hour he was to die, but "that he himself had no will by him at that time, and intended sending for brother Cook in a few days, or sometime shortly, to write him a will;" which was all that passed about the will. According to the witness's account, his acquaintance with the decedent was a slight one, and recently commenced.

1. William Cabaniss testified, That a few days after the decedent's death, the witness meeting with Mr. Cook, the executor, who had been to the house of the deceased, and was on his return from thence, he asked Mr. Cook, whether there was a will or not? Mr. Cook said, "there was no will; that the old lady had found a small piece of a will in the old man's pocket; they supposed he had put it in his pocket not knowing what it was, where it had been worn out." The witness supposed Mr. Cook said this, upon the information of Mrs. Vass.

4. Halcomb Bailey testified, That the deponent Francis Ford was at the house of Mrs. Vass before his deposition was first taken under a commission from the county court: he came there on his way to Lynchburg; he departed on a Sunday; returned to Mrs. Vass's the Thursday or Friday following, and went from thence on Saturday, to the place where his deposition was taken.

41 "The deposition of Ford, taken under the commission from the county court, was substantially the same with that taken under the commission from the circuit court.

The bill of exceptions filed by Boyd and Shepperd, stated, that, at the hearing in the circuit court, Boyd and Shepperd offered in evidence the deposition of one Morgan; the counsel for Cook objected to the reading of so much of it as related to declarations of Sarah E. Vass, the daughter of the decedent who wrote the will in question, and a legatee therein; and the court sustained the objection. They then offered to prove by a witness introduced for the purpose, that the same Sarah E. Vass admitted in the witness's presence, that her father had directed her to destroy the paper produced in court as his will, and that he believed it was done: the counsel for Cook objected to the admission of this evidence also, and the court sustained the objection.

Stanard, for the plaintiffs in error. I. The evidence rejected by the court, ought to have been heard, since the person whose declarations it was offered to prove, was a legatee named in the supposed will, and, in effect, a party to the controversy, who could not have been compelled to give evidence against the will. King v. Woburn, 10 East. 395; King v. Hardwick, 11 East. 578; Burton v. Scott, 3 Rand. 399. If this evidence had been admitted, and had established the fact, that the decedent had directed the paper in question to be destroyed, and believed it was destroyed, that would have amounted to a revocation. 3 Stark. Law of Ev. p. 1714, note 2,* and the cases there cited.

II. The execution of the will was not well proved. 1st, it was not well proved to have been duly attested as a will of real estate, according to the requisitions of the statute of wills: only one of the attesting witnesses, Anderson, says that he attested the paper in the decedent's presence,

him: the other, Shearan, says it was attested by him at the decedent's request, who told him it was his will, and that he saw him sign his name to it; but he does not say he attested it in the decedent's presence; and if he subscribed his name as a witness, in another room, and at another time, such an attestation would be perfectly consistent with his deposition. This court has decided, that there must be two witnesses to every fact material to the due execution of the will. Burwell v. Corbin, 1 Rand. 131. But, 2ndly, this is the will of a blind man; and the attesting witnesses both say, expressly, that it was never, at any time, read to him in their presence; and there is no proof by any witness, that it ever was read to him. According to Swinburne, a blind man "cannot make his testament in writing, unless the same be read before witnesses, and in their presence acknowledged by the testator for his last will. And, therefore, if a writing were delivered to the testator, and he not hearing the same read, acknowledged the same for his will, this were not sufficient; for it may be, that if he should hear the same, he would not own it." Swinb. on Wills, part II, § XI, p. 166. And this was always regarded as the law of England, till the case of Longchamp v. Fish, 2 New Rep. 415, in which case it was held not to be necessary, that the will of a blind man should be read over to him in the presence of the attesting witnesses; but it was agreed, that stronger evidence would be required in the case of a blind testator, than mere attestation of the signature; and the proof there was allowed to be sufficient, only on the ground that there was not the least reason to suspect fraud or unfair contrivance. In that case, the terms of the will had been dictated by the testator to a disinterested person who wrote it, and who was afterwards one of the attesting witnesses; after it was written, it was read over to the testator, by his desire, in the presence of several; a fair copy was prepared; and the testator, two months afterwards, had an alteration made, and perfectly understood what he was doing;

43 neither was there the least *ground to suspect any thing unfair. Though, therefore, according to that authority, it be unnecessary that the will of a blind testator should be read to him in the presence of the attesting witnesses to the execution; yet there must be proof by witnesses, that it was truly read to him before the execution, so as to ascertain that he was apprised of its contents at the time of execution; and there must be nothing suspicious in the transaction. Now here there is no positive proof by any witness, that the will was ever read to the decedent; and no proof of any kind, that it was ever truly and wholly read to him, before the execution, or indeed at any time. There is an effort to prove, that the decedent was apprised of the contents of the paper; and thence to infer that it must have been read to him. The principal evidence to this purpose is that of Ford, who details a conversation he had with the decedent in 1823, in which the latter recounted the dispositions of this will: which proves, at most, that he was apprised of its contents in 1823, not that he was apprised of them before the execution of it in the summer of 1817. This witness details the specific bequests of this will, as having been stated to him by the decedent in conversation, in minute and exact conformity with the contents of the paper itself; so minute and so exact, indeed, as to leave little doubt that he gathered so much of the contents of the will, from a recent perusal or accurate communication to them (for which, it appears by Bailey's testimony, he had full opportunity) and not from the conversation with the decedent many years before; but of the general and by far the most important provision, that which disposed of the residuum of the estate, even this witness does not depose that the decedent said one word; so that there is really no proof, that the decedent was acquainted with the whole of the contents of this paper, and, therefore, no ground to infer, that it had ever been truly and wholly read over to him. The evidence relied on to corroborate this evidence of Ford, is that of the witnesses

44 Cook and Webb: but neither of them *says, that the decedent communicated to him any of his testamentary dispositions, made or intended, except those relating to his daughters Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. Shepperd; and as to Webb, though he says that the provisions of the will in respect to those two daughters, conform with the intentions of the decedent as declared to him in conversation, yet, according to his own account, there is no such conformity; for he deposes, that the decedent told him that what he intended to give Mrs. Shepperd, was to be in money to be put at interest for the support of herself and children as long as she lived, and at her death the principal to be divided among her children; but the will makes no present provision for Mrs. Shepperd, but gives her the money in remainder after her mother's death. There is too, a variance between the deposition of Webb taken for the circuit court, and that taken for the county court; in the one, he says he supposes his conversation with the decedent was before his will was made; in the other, that he cannot recollect when it occurred: a circumstance which shews the bias under which he was deposing: it was material to the interests of his sister Mrs. Vass, claiming under the will, that it might appear that the conversation occurred after the will was made. There are many very suspicious circumstances in the transaction. The singular provision in the beginning of the paper, imposing forfeiture on any legatee who should contest it, evinces such an anticipation of a contest as the testator could hardly have entertained, but natural enough to a penman interested and conscious of unfairness. The decedent was no wise in extremis; he had ample time and opportunity to get the aid of disinterested neighbours; yet, we are to believe, he chose to confide the writing of the will to a daughter and favoured legatee. This daughter to whom the care of the paper was confided, held it back for some time after her father's death, as was manifest from the evidence of Cabaniss: this again shews her consciousness of something wrong. The decedent was warned by a sudden and dangerous illness, of the 45 prudence of keeping a *will by him, and had this paper prepared (as its date shews) as early as December 1816: why then was it not executed till the summer of 1817? The attesting witnesses he selected, were not his friends, neighbours or intimates; and he communicated his testamentary dispositions or intentions, to none of his neighbours, but only to residents of North Carolina, whom he was seldom in company with. He told one person in 1820, and another in 1824, that he had no will. And, according to the evidence of Anderson, (though the other witness Shearan remembers no such conversation, remarkable as it was) he told his wife, at the time of executing the paper, that he would wait till brother Cook came down, and then have his intended alteration made; which raises a suspicion, that the testator did not know that the paper he was executing, was one written by his daughter; for if he had trusted her to write his will, he surely would not have hesitated to trust her to write the alteration. The strongest case that can be made out from the evidence, is, that the decedent's knowledge of the contents of this paper, is proved by one witness, namely, Ford: and the decedent's knowledge of its contents being a fact certainly material to the due execution of it, either as a will of real or as a will of personal estate, the case of Burwell v. Corbin decides, that there must be two witnesses to that fact, to establish it as a will of real estate, according to the requisitions of the statute of wills; and Redford's adm'r v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 316, decides, that two witnesses to the same all important fact are also requisite to prove the paper as a will of personal estate.

Johnson and Leigh, for defendant in error. 1. The evidence of the declarations of Sarah E. Vass, was properly rejected. She was not, in any sense, a party to the controversy: it does not appear, that she claimed under the will, or that it was her wish, or her interest, to have it established: there is nothing to warrant the assumption, that she is a favoured legatee; and 46 so far from it appearing that *she will get more as legatee under the will, than she would get as heir and distributee in case of the intestacy of her father, it seems, on the contrary, that the decedent's widow is the only person who can be benefited by establishing the will. It does not follow, that because a legacy is bequeathed to a daughter by her father's will, she is therefore a party interested to establish it: that must depend, always, on the value of the legacy compared with her share of the whole estate in case of intestacy. But, if the evidence which the court rejected, ought to have been heard, this court may consider the rejected evidence as a part of the case, and decide upon the effect of it as if it had been received. The only object of it was to prove a revocation. But admitting that this testator directed this will to be destroyed, and believed it had been done, that was not destroying the will, or causing it to be done in his presence, within the words or policy of the statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 3, p. 376. A destruction intended or ordered, without being actually done, in any manner or degree, can only amount to a parol revocation, which the statute discounts and renders void: there must be some act done, some act of destruction or towards destruction, done animo revocandi, to constitute a revocation by destroying. Roberts on Wills, ch. 2, part 12. That writer advances an opinion of his own (for he cites no authority for it) that where an intended destruction of a will has been prevented by fraud or contrivance, affirmative parol proof of the animus revocandi, should be received, and effect given to the intention so established; that "even if such intention so endeavoured to be defeated, were manifested by no act of the testator, it would be consonant to the general maxim of courts of equity, to give effect to the intention, and to treat as perfected that which would have been perfected but for the fraud." It would be difficult to reconcile this doctrine with the words or the policy of the provision of the statute touching revocations of written wills: but supposing it just, and that a court of equity might inquire into such a fraud, put 47 *in issue by pleadings there, it is no inquiry for a court of probat. However, the evidence rejected in this case, would, if heard, be of little or no weight. The witness Laws testifies, that the testator told him, in 1820, that he had had a will, and that he had destroyed it; so that if he did direct this will to be destroyed, and believed it was done, such direction and belief must have preceded the conversation with Laws; and yet it is clearly proved, that he declared, in 1823, that he had a will, and approved its provisions, and gave such an account of them, as manifests that the will he then had and approved, was the very will now in question.

II. This paper is well proved as a will of real as well as of personal estate. The evidence of Shearan who was examined by commissioners in the country, is not so explicit as that of Anderson who was examined in open court; but viewing the evidence of the two witnesses in connexion each with the other, the inference is irresistible, that Shearan as well as Anderson attested the will in the presence of the testator, that is, both at the same time, and in the room with him; and that Shearan meant to be so understood. Burwell v. Corbin came up upon a special verdict, and the court was strictly confined to the case as found, and could intend or infer nothing; but this case comes before the court as a court of probat, whose province it is to deduce the just inferences of fact from the evidence: a distinction taken by this court itself, in Smith v. Jones, 6 Rand. 33. Besides, though the statute requires that the witnesses shall all attest in the testator's presence, it prescribes no particular mode of proof of the fact of attestation in the presence, and leaves that fact to be proved, like any other fact, according to the common law rules of evidence and modes of proof. Hence it is, that if all the attesting witnesses to a will be dead, their hand writing may be proved to establish it: hence too, if all the attesting witnesses deny their attestation, the fact of their attestation, and of due attestation in the testator's presence, may be proved

48 by other evidence *direct or circumstantial: and, upon the same principle, if one witness testify, that he and the other attesting witnesses duly attested in the testator's presence, his single testimony proves the full execution of the will. Longford v. Eyre, 1 P. Wms. 741; Roberts on Wills, ch. I. part XVI.; 3 Stark. Law of Ev. p. 1688, note 1, and 1692, 3, where all the cases are collected. If then, this was the will of a man not blind, the proof of full execution would be complete. Our statute of wills requires, that all wills of lands, if not wholly written by the testator himself, shall "be attested by two or more credible witnesses subscribing their names in his presence." Tate's Dig. Wills, p. 519. But, as the statute does not prescribe the mode of proof of the fact of attestation in the presence, so neither does it define what shall constitute presence, or make any discrimination between the presence of testators who can read and those who are wholly illiterate, or of those who can see and those who are blind. In the case of the blind man, to say that an attestation of his will made, like the attestation in this case, immediately after his signing it, at his request, in the same room with him, is not such an attestation in his presence, as fulfils the requisitions of the statute, were in effect to deny the capacity of a blind man to make a will of lands, since he cannot possibly be any otherwise present at the attestation. But it is agreed, that a blind man is capable of making a will of lands; that is, that there may be an attestation in his presence. The requisitions of the statute, then, have been complied with here, in the only way in which it is possible to comply with them. But it is insisted, that in the case of a blind man's will, there ought to be some direct proof by witnesses, that the very will executed by him and attested, had been read to him before the execution; that this is a supplement to the attestation of the witnesses in the testator's presence required by the statute, essential to guard him against fraud and imposition; and that, though the case of Longchamp v. Fish has decided, that the will need not be read to the blind testator in the presence of

49 the attesting *witnesses, that case is no authority to dispense with proof by some witness or other, of the actual reading of the will to the testator. But the principle of that case, is, that an attestation of a blind man's will in his presence, that is, in the same place with him, is a literal compliance with the statute; but some stronger evidence than the mere attestation shall be required; some sufficient proof to rebut any imputation of fraud; to shew, that the blind testator was not imposed upon. No particular kind of proof is indicated. The question is, whether the instrument is really the will of the blind man, who executed and published it as such? whether the assent of his mind was given to its provisions? The rules of evidence prescribed by the civil law, are of no authority: no statute prescribes any particular mode of proof touching any such question: every kind of proof admitted by the common law, which is proper upon any other question of fact, is equally proper in regard to this; the proof may be by one witness as well as by many, by circumstantial as well as direct evidence. If it be proved, that the blind man declared that he had a will, and gave such an account of the testamentary dispositions thereby made, as to ascertain clearly that the paper in question is the will he said he had; this is enough to prove that he approved the provisions of this will; to rebut any imputation of fraud; to shew, that he has not been imposed upon, and made to execute a paper different from that which he had declared and intended for his will. And this is proved here, if the witness Ford is worthy of credit; and there is abundant testimony to his character for integrity and veracity. It is objected to his evidence, in one and the same breath, that the minuteness and exactness with which he details the specific bequests of this will, as having been recounted to him by the testator in conversation, exposes him to the suspicion of having perused the will itself, shortly before he gave his deposition, and squared his evidence with its contents—and that his evidence is defective in not ascribing any remark to the testator concerning the general and most important provision *of the will, namely, the disposition of the residuum of this estate.

But the very defect imputed to the evidence, ought to exempt the witness from the suspicion as to the source from which he derived it. His evidence is corroborated by that of other witnesses: but his evidence alone is sufficient to establish the will. Lewis v. Lewis, 6 Serg. & Rawle, 489.

CARR, J. This is a very interesting controversy, as to presents, for the first time, to this court, the case of a blind man's will offered for probat, and involves the question of the due execution of such a will under our statute. It was much to be wished, that the case had been heard before a full court: but as the judges present are not unanimous, the points will be considered as open, in any case which may hereafter occur.

Our statute enacts, that "every person aged twenty-one years or upwards, being of sound mind, and not a married woman, shall have power, by last will in writing, to devise his estate &c. so as such will be signed by the testator &c. and if not wholly written by himself &c. be attested by two or more credible witnesses subscribing their names in his presence." The ceremonies required by this law, were not intended to restrain or abridge the power of testators, but to guard and protect them in the exercise of that power; and in that spirit (as I think) should the law be administered. The requisitions of the statute must be satisfied, or the will is not valid; but beyond this, the court seldom looks, unless there be fraud. That will vitiate a will however strict the compliance with the statute; but that must be proved; and, in the absence of proof, the court will not imagine that fraud may possibly have been practised, and act upon that imagination. Such a course would convert the law which was meant as a shield, into a sword, and destroy twenty good and fair wills for one that was fraudulent. Nor ought courts, in their decisions on wills, to be at all influenced by the reflection, that the law

51 has made a just distribution for "such as die intestate: that law never meant to interfere with the right of every man to dispose, at his will and pleasure, of the property which it had been the labour of a life to acquire; a right dear to him, and held sacred wherever civilization has made progress, or law bears the semblance of science. Every one admits that a blind man may make a will; he is clearly within the statute; and yet it has provided no particular guards to protect him from imposition. A will signed by him, and attested by two witnesses in his presence, satisfies the statute. What is presence, the statute nowhere defines; and this is often a question of dispute in ordinary cases. In the case of a blind man, it certainly cannot mean, that the witnesses shall attest in his sight. The reason of the statute in requiring that the witnesses shall attest in the presence of the testator, is, not to assure them that he signed the will or knows its contents, but to protect him from having a forged will substituted for that he had signed. This danger is not obviated by the fullest proof that a blind man had heard a will read the day before, nor even by reading in the presence of the witnesses, for the will may have been changed in the first case, or read falsely in the last: yet all agree, that the reading the will in the presence of the attesting witnesses, in the case of a blind man, is sufficient; and the case of Longchamp v. Fish decides, that reading in the presence of the attesting witnesses is not necessary and that proof of a prior reading in the presence of the testator is sufficient. In the case of a man who can see, the signing his will in the presence of witnesses, or acknowledging it to them to be his will, as signed, although he be illiterate, is proof that he was acquainted with its contents: but, in the case of a blind man, although the forms of the statute be complied with, the jury, or the court of probat, (which, we have said, occupies the place of a jury,) will, "to rebut any imputation of fraud" (as justice Heath expresses it in Longchamp v. Fish) "require stronger evidence than the mere attestation of signature;" evidence to satisfy it,

52 that the instrument is really *and bona fide his will, which it could not be, unless he knew the contents. But this is no requisition of the statute, nor is the court or jury confined to any particular mode of proof; any evidence which convinces their minds of the fact, is enough. For this purpose, reading the will over in the presence of witnesses, is agreed to be sufficient; but is this the only proof allowable? There is no such rule in the common law: and justice Heath, in the case just cited, very sensibly remarks, great inconvenience would arise from any rule, requiring the wills of blind men to be read over in the presence of attesting witnesses; nor would the mere reading it alone to them, be a certain guard against fraud, since it might be read falsely: and Chamber, J., adds, that testators are generally averse to have their intended dispositions of property made known in their families before their deaths; and blind men who stand so much in need of attention from their relatives, would, probably, be peculiarly averse to it. If there be no rule on this subject, and we are to be satisfied, as in other cases, by any circumstances and facts, which give us reasonable ground to conclude, that the testator knew the contents of the will; put the case of a blind man, proved to be shrewd, sensible, a punctual, precise man of business, in full possession of his mind; a man who had made his property, and was particularly anxious and careful in the safe and prudent disposition of it among his children; suppose such a man, while in good health, should send for two of his friends, tell them he wished them to attest his will, direct his daughter to bring it out, duly sign, and have it attested; and some six years after, this man should, in conversation with an old friend, detail with exactness most of the material provisions in that will, saying at the same time that it was his will: I ask, is there a mind which can resist the conclusion, that this man had dictated such a will to the scribe, and was well acquainted with its contents? And ought we, when this will is offered for probat, to reject it, because there is no proof that it was

53 read over to the testator, and because, *in detailing the contents, there being ten clauses of bequest and devise, he spoke of nine, and did not mention the tenth? The case I have supposed is the case before the court. The will contains, 1. a bequest to his daughter Bcyd; 2. to his son James; 3. to his daughter Sarah; 4. to his daughter Ann; 5. to his daughter Apphia; 6. to his son Philip; 7. to his grand daughter Mary Shepperd; 8. the devise to his wife for life; 9. at her death, the land he lived on to be sold, and one fourth of the money put to interest; that interest for the use of his daughter Shepperd, during her life, and at her death, the principal to be divided among her children: the 10th and last devise is, that the western land be sold, and the money, with the three fourths of the sale of the home place, and the residue of his estate, he divided between his two sons and three single daughters. Of these ten clauses, the testator in his conversations with Ford, in 1823, the will being executed in 1817, gave a distinct account of the first nine, but said nothing about the tenth, or if he did, the witness had forgotten it. If he had so forgotten, it would not be remarkable: it is much more remarkable, that he has remembered so much and so accurately as he has. This, indeed, was objected by the counsel, as going strongly to his credit; but, if he needed support, it is amply given him by eight witnesses, some of whom have known him thirty years, and all say he has the highest character for honesty, truth and correctness. We cannot, therefore, refuse him our belief; and giving it, how can we doubt that Vasa knew the contents of this will? But this is not all. Before he made his will, he told Webb, that he never meant to leave his son-in-law Shepperd any of his property, but would have money put out at interest, of which his daughter during her life might have the profits; and for his daughter Boyd, the property was to remain with her and her husband during their lives, and then to return: and the reason he gave for this, was, that she had no children, and would probably have none, and he did not wish his property to go to 54 Boyd's family. These, we know, are *the provisions which he afterwards had inserted in the will. Again, in 1823, he told Cook he had a will; he was not satisfied with it; he intended to get it altered; but, if he did not, it should stand: he told him also several of the provisions of this will, namely, those with respect to his grand daughter, and his two married daughters; and he gave him his reasons for not giving either of his sons-in-law property; that Boyd had no children, and would have none probably, and that he did not think him capable of managing property; and as to Shepperd, that, if he gave him property, he was such a drunkard he would soon spend it, or drink it up. His language to Goode also, in 1823, was to the same effect. This evidence proves, beyond a question, to my mind, that the paper offered for probat, contains the deliberate and settled will of the testator in the disposition of his property; more especially, his fixed determination never to give his sons-in-law any of his property; and they are the only persons resisting the probat.

It was objected in the argument, that, the witness Shearan, does not prove that he attested in the presence of the testator; and the case of Burwell v. Corbin was mentioned: but that was a case differing from this. There the court was acting on a special verdict, where every thing must be directly found, and nothing inferred: here, the court of probat acts as a jury, and may draw from the evidence, every inference and conclusion which a jury could. Now there is no doubt on my mind, that the reasonable if not necessary inference from the evidence, is, that both witnesses attested the will at the same time, and both in the presence of the testator. No one can read Shearan's evidence, without concluding that the whole transaction took place at one time, in one room; and this even without the aid of the other witness, who swears directly, that both signed their attestation in the presence of the testator. Could I, as a jurymen, possibly resist this evidence? Certainly not; and holding the same station as part of the court of probat, I find it equally conclusive.

55 *With respect to the evidence rejected, it does not seem to me worth while to consider whether it ought to have been received or not. For if received, it could have been relied on solely as proof of revocation. We know, that no directions given by a testator to another, to destroy his will, amounts to a revocation. The statute provides that no will "shall be revocable but by the testator destroying, cancelling or obliterating the same, or causing it to be done in his presence" &c. Mere parol directions given to a person to destroy the will, could never satisfy these requisitions of the statute; and to suffer them, would be to incur the very danger the statute meant to avoid. I think the sentence of the circuit court should be affirmed.

GREEN, J., concurred.

CABELL, J. Blind men are embraced by the general words of the statute of wills, giving the power to make a will of lands. A blind man may, therefore, make such a will. But the legislature has deemed it important to guard all persons against the substitution of surreptitious or fabricated wills. With this view, the statute has declared, that no will of lands, if not wholly written by the testator or testatrix, shall be valid, unless it be "attested by two or more witnesses subscribing their names in his or her presence." The policy of this provision extends to blind persons, not less than to others. In promoting this policy, the courts have been strict in their construction of the term "presence." In reference to those who have their eyesight, an attestation, to be in the "presence," must be in the same room with the testator, or where he can, if he will, see the witnesses sign their names. Thus, if the witnesses subscribe their names in a different room, but in a part of that room where he cannot see them, without a change of his own position, the paper cannot be established as a will of lands; and the construction would be the same, even if it should 56 appear that the testator was in perfect health, in the *full possession of all his faculties, mental and corporeal, and within three feet of the spot where the witnesses subscribed their names; and even although there should be the most positive and credible testimony that every thing was fairly done. This is required, in order that the testator may know, that the will which the witnesses attest, is the very will which he himself has signed. The term presence, in the statute, is as applicable to those who are blind, as it is to those who are exempt from that misfortune. But, as we cannot impart the power of vision to those who are blind, the term presence, when applied to them, must have an interpretation different from that which is given to it, when applied to those who can see. It must not, however, be divested of all its force. It must still be so construed as to promote the policy of the statute; the suppression of surreptitious wills. This will be effected by requiring, in the case of a blind man, proof that the testator knew the contents of the will which he signed, and which the witnesses attested. I do not say, that it must necessarily appear that the will was read to him. That is one mode of proving that he knew its contents. But any other testimony that satisfies the mind of the same fact, will be sufficient.

The will, in this case, was not written by the testator, who was a blind man, but it was signed by him, and attested by subscribing witnesses. There is certainly no positive proof that it was read to him. What is the proof that he knew its contents? The most that can be said on this point, is, that it is proved that the testator declared that he had made a will, and that he had made certain dispositions of slaves to his children and grand children; that what he gave to Mrs. Boyd (one of his daughters) was to return to his estate at her death; that he had made a comfortable provision for his wife, and that at her death, the land on which he then lived was to be sold; that one fourth of the money arising from the sale was to be put out at interest, for the benefit of his daughter Mrs. Shepperd 57 during her *life, and at her death, to be divided among her children. And, when we look at the will offered for probat, we find in it certain provisions conforming with, or resembling the above declarations of the testator. But the will contains other provisions of much more importance than those alluded to. It contains the disposition of the remaining three fourths of the money arising from the sale of the land on which he lived; it directs the sale of his western lands, and the disposition of the money arising therefrom, and also of "all the remainder" of his estate; and it appoints J. W. Cook executor. As to all these important parts of the will, there is not a title of testimony that the testator had any knowledge of them whatever. What assurance have we, that these important dispositions were directed by the testator, or that he wished or intended them to constitute a part of his will? It is not sufficient to say, that no fraud appears to have been committed or intended. That argument would prove too much: it would make good a will signed by a person not blind, if attested by witnesses not in his presence: it would make good the will of a blind man, if signed by him, and attested by witnesses, although there be no proof that he was acquainted with any part of its contents. But this is a degree of confidence to which the law will not permit either of them to surrender himself, however willing he may be to become the victim.

I am not disposed to defeat wills by resorting to technical objections. But I can never assent to establish any paper as the will of a dead man, without proof that it is his will; or, in other words, without proof that the paper exhibited contains the dispositions which he intended to make, and none other.—I am therefore of opinion, that the sentence of the circuit court ought to be reversed and that of the county court affirmed; but the majority of the judges approve the sentence of the circuit court, which is therefore to be affirmed.

*Taliaferro v. Foote.

(Absent TUCKER, P., and BROOKE, *J.)

Equity Practice—Lost Deeds—Bill—Averments.—Where a plaintiff resorts to a court of equity for relief, on the ground that a deed on which his claim depends has been lost or destroyed, the claim being such that if he had the deed he would have complete remedy by action upon it at law: the bill must distinctly aver the loss or destruction of the deed, and it must be shewn that it could not be found upon due search; otherwise the court of equity, has no jurisdiction of the case.

*He was nearly related to the appellant.

Same—Same—Same—Affidavit.—And such a bill must be accompanied with an affidavit of the loss or destruction of the deed; the want of such affidavit is good cause of demurrer.

This was an appeal from a decree of the court of chancery of Fredericksburg, in a suit brought by Richard Foote, against James Taliaferro. The bill contained a great deal of matter, which Foote deemed pertinent to his object, and concerning which much was said in the argument, but which this court thought wholly irrelevant; and Taliaferro's answer related, for the most part, to the irrelevant allegations of the bill.

The bill set forth, that William Thornton Alexander deceased, in his lifetime, by deed executed in October 1802, conveyed about forty slaves inter alia to John Taliaferro, his wife's brother, upon trust, that he should hold the trust subject, and pay to Alexander, during his life, a stipulated sum yearly for the profits thereof, and with respect to the slaves, should convey them and their increase, at Alexander's death, to Lucy Alexander his wife and her heirs. That the same W. T. Alexander, by another deed executed in December 1804, conveyed about twenty-two other slaves inter alia to the same trustee, upon trust, that he should pay the profits of the whole trust subject, to Mrs. Alexander during her life, and in case she should die before her husband, then to him during his life, and, after the death of both, convey the 59 slaves and their increase, to *such person or persons as Mrs. Alexander should by last will and testament appoint, and in default of appointment, to such persons as would have been entitled thereto if she had never married Alexander. That the same W. T. Alexander and Lucy his wife and Taliaferro the trustee, joined in a deed executed in April 1808, conveying to the defendant James Taliaferro, who was also a brother of Mrs. Alexander, the reversion in fee of all the slaves settled upon her by the two first mentioned deeds, reserving to her a life estate therein; (this deed contained a general warranty of title to Taliaferro). That W. T. Alexander died in August 1816, his wife Lucy surviving him; and that she executed a deed and agreement with James Taliaferro in September 1816, whereby she released to him her life estate in all the slaves and their increase, except thirty-seven, whereof she retained the life estate to herself. That, shortly after the execution of the deed of September 1816, the plaintiff married Mrs. Alexander, and hereby acquired the possession of the thirty-seven slaves reserved to her for life by that deed. That then an agreement was made between Foote now the owner of his wife's life estate in these thirty-seven slaves, and James Taliaferro the owner of the reversion, whereby Taliaferro agreed to release to Foote his reversion in twelve of them, and Foote to release to Taliaferro the life estate in the residue; in pursuance of which agreement, Taliaferro executed a deed to Foote, conveying the twelve slaves to him in absolute property, with a general warranty of title. That this deed was put into the hands of John Taliaferro, who promised to have it recorded in the county court of King George, in which county the deed was executed; it never was recorded or deposited there, and if it was not still in John Taliaferro's possession, the plaintiffs knew not where it was to be found; but the bill did not state that the paper was lost, or that any inquiry or search had been made for it. That not long after this transaction, Mrs. Foote died. That recently, in a suit in chancery prosecuted by the creditors of William T.

60 *Alexander, against the parties claiming under his two deeds of October 1802 and December 1804, those deeds had been declared void as to his creditors, and the subject held liable to his debts. That an execution sued out by some of the creditors, had been levied, at the particular instance of the defendant Taliaferro, on the twelve slaves and their increase held by the plaintiff Foote, which had been conveyed to him by the defendant Taliaferro in absolute property with general warranty, and those slaves had been all sold under the execution, for about 1800 dollars. And the prayer of the bill was in the alternative—either a decree against Taliaferro, for the value of twelve slaves, upon the strength of his alleged warranty of the title thereof; or, at the least, a decree for such proportion of the value thereof, as the value of the twenty-five slaves of which Foote released the life estate to Taliaferro, bore to the value of the twelve slaves which Taliaferro conveyed and warranted to Foote. (The bill represented the two deeds of April 1808 and September 1816, as perfectly voluntary on Mrs. Alexander's part, and flowing from her bounty to her brother; but it did not impute any fraud to him in those transactions, or seek to impugn the validity of the deeds upon any ground: it seemed, that the plaintiff set forth the deeds of October 1802, December 1804, April 1808, and September 1816, by way of inducement to the allegations touching the agreement made between him and the defendant, and the defendant's conveyance of the twelve slaves to him, to corroborate his assertion that this conveyance contained a general warranty of title, and to shew the reasonableness of the relief he prayed).

James Taliaferro, in his answer, detailed at great length, the history of the transactions between him and his sister Mrs. Alexander, afterwards Mrs. Foote; and exhibited some other contracts between them, besides the deeds of April 1808 and September 1816 mentioned in the bill, connected with and explanatory of those conveyances. He asserted, that the conveyances of April 1808 and September

61 *1816, instead of being voluntary on the part of his sister, were founded on valuable and adequate consideration paid and performed by him; which was the reason why the deed of April 1808 contained a general warranty of the title to him. And as to the contract between him and Foote, which was the foundation of the claim set up in the bill, he denied, that his deed to Foote of the twelve slaves, contained any warranty of title; it was a simple conveyance of his interest; the contract consisted in mutual releases; a release by him to Foote, of his reversion in those slaves, and a release by Foote to him of his life estate in the residue of the thirty-seven slaves. He acknowledged, that he had procured the execution sued out by W. T. Alexander's creditors, to be levied on the slaves held by Foote; and justified it, on the ground, that the slaves held by him had been purchased for valuable consideration, and conveyed to him with general warranty, so that the slaves held by Foote ought to have been subjected to the creditors of Alexander, before those held by him; and that he had reason to apprehend that Foote intended to remove the slaves he held beyond the reach of process.

The depositions of Aaron Grigsby and John Taliaferro, who were both present when the contract was executed between the plaintiff and defendant, confirmed the account given in the answer, of its nature, purpose and terms.

The deponent Taliaferro was the person to whom (as the bill alleged) this instrument was confided, that he might have it recorded; yet the plaintiff made no inquiry of him concerning the disposition he had made of it. No affidavit that it was lost or destroyed, was annexed to the bill; nor was there any evidence, that it was in fact lost or destroyed, or otherwise not within the power of the plaintiff.

The chancellor decreed that Taliaferro should pay Foote the value of the twelve slaves, as ascertained by the sale of them under the execution levied on them, whereby he was evicted of the title and possession.

Taliaferro appealed to this court.

62 *The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellant and Harrison and Stanard for the appellee, upon its general merits, in the discussion of which, the several contracts between Taliaferro and Mrs. Alexander, and the character and effect of them, were minutely scanned, and the question as to the probable terms of the contract between Taliaferro and Foote, and consequently the effect of that contract, examined. But Johnson took an objection to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to relieve in such a case, which was held fatal.

CARR, J., delivered the opinion of the court, That the case made by the bill was not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

A good deal is said in the bill, about the deed of 1802, the deed of 1804, the deed of 1808 and of 1816—but these make no part of the case on which relief is asked; nothing is charged with respect to them, or put in issue. If the bill had charged what has been advanced in the argument here, that the execution of the deed of 1808 was procured by Taliaferro from his sister Mrs. Alexander, by fraud, deception, or imposition, that would have given jurisdiction; but, as the case stands, that deed evidences a sale by her of a reversion, for a valuable consideration, with warranty. The bill should have stated such facts, in such a way, as would give the court jurisdiction. But the case on which the plaintiff asks relief is, in substance, this: that he became the purchaser of a parcel of slaves from the defendant, the title of which afterwards failed, and that the defendant is liable on his warranty of title, to make good to the plaintiffs the damages he has sustained. Prima facie, this is surely a case for a court of law. The bill alleges, that the defendant gave him a deed or bill of sale of the slaves with warranty; but it does not allege, that this deed is lost or destroyed. It alleges, indeed, that it was confided to John Taliaferro, who promised to have it recorded; that it was not recorded or deposited in the clerk's office; and,

63 *if it was not in John Taliaferro's possession, the plaintiff did not know where it was to be found: but John Taliaferro was not made a party; no inquiry was made of him; no step taken to ascertain the loss, or to set up the instrument, if lost. And no affidavit that the instrument was lost, accompanied the bill; which is indispensable, where a party comes into equity to set up a lost deed. In the case of the East India Company v. Boddam, 9 Ves. 465, lord Eldon says, the course upon a lost bond, was to file the bill stating the loss, and "accompanying it with an affidavit, that it was lost, not as evidence of the loss, but as a security for the propriety of jurisdiction:" and it is laid down in all the books which treat on the subject, that the want of this affidavit is cause of demurrer. This bill then makes no case for a court of equity.

But if it did, the case is not supported. The bill states, that the defendant gave a deed with general warranty. The defendant answering this charge directly, "denies that he ever made the conveyance for slaves to the plaintiff, in the manner stated in the bill; the conveyance was for the claim of this defendant to the reversion, without warranty." And this assertion derives aid from the depositions of John Taliaferro and Grigsby: but it needs no such aid, being a direct and positive denial of the statement in the bill. We must take it, then, that this was a sale of the defendant's claim merely, and a deed conveying that without warranty. It was said, that every sale implied a warranty of title; and this is true, where it rests simply on the sale; but where there is a sale of a party's interest merely, and the deed is given without warranty, will not that rebut the implication? At any rate, when the warranty is contended to be implied by the sale only, there can be no propriety in coming into equity to set up a deed which contains no warranty: the resort should clearly have been to a court of law.

Decree reversed with costs, and bill dismissed.

64 *Henderson's Ex'ors and Devisees v. Peachy.
May, 1831.

(Absent TUCKER, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Wills—Construction—Limitation of Contingent Remainders in Moieties—Case at Bar.—Testator devises real and personal estate, "to his two daughters, viz. the one moiety thereof to M. and the other moiety thereof to J. for their lives; remainder to their children, who shall be living at the time of the decease of either of his said daughters; which remainder to the children, to be per capita and not per stirpes; so that upon the death of either daughter, her moiety shall go in remainder, not to her children, but to them and the children of the surviving daughter, in fee."

Held, this was not a limitation of the whole remainder of the whole estate, to take effect on the death of the daughter first dying, and to vest in children of both then in esse, liable to open and let in children of the survivor after born; but, as it was a devise of the estate to the two daughters in several moieties for life, so the limitation was of the remainder in several moieties also; a limitation of the remainder of each moiety, expectant on each life estate, upon the death of each daughter, to children of both living at the death of each; so that, upon the death of the daughter first dying, the remainder of her moiety only should vest in children of both then in esse, and upon the death of the survivor, the remainder of her moiety should vest in children of both then in esse; a base fee in the real estate, and the undisposed of remnant of interest in the personal, descending and passing to the two daughters, the testators heirs at law and distributees, and awaiting the contingencies on which the contingent remainder of the real, and executory bequest of the personal, were limited.

John Blair* late of the city of Williamsburg, who died in 1800, by his last will and testament, devised and bequeathed as follows—"I give, devise and bequeath my plantation in Albemarle county, commonly called the Mountain Plain, together with the slaves and stock of every sort kept thereon, to my two dear daughters, that is to say, the one moiety thereof to 65 Mary the wife of Robert Andrews, *the other moiety thereof to Jane the wife of James Henderson, for, and during their natural lives; remainder to their children who shall be living at the time of the decease of either of my said daughters or devisees for life, and the heirs of such children; which remainder to the children to be per capita and not per stirpes; so that upon the death of either of my said daughters, her moiety shall go in remainder, not to her children, but to them and the children of my surviving daughter in fee simple. As by this disposition to the children, the land, in case of many shares, may come to be divided in such small shares, that it would be better for all parties to sell the same, and divide the money among them, I hereby authorize that to be done during the minority of some of the parties, if from circumstances it should be thought advisable."

The testator's daughter Jane Henderson died in 1811, leaving one child, a son named Thomas, who died in 1814, an infant, without issue, and intestate, his father James Henderson and his aunt Mary Andrews him surviving. James Henderson, after the death of his son Thomas, claimed, as heir and distributee of his son, one moiety of the estate, real and personal, and the remainder of the other moiety expectant on the life of Mary Andrews. He died in 1818, having by his last will and testament, devised and bequeathed all his interest in the estate, real and personal, to his three children by a second wife, James, Walter and Elizabeth Henderson, with a limitation over, in case of all of them dying in infancy, unmarried and leaving no children, to others of his kindred. William and Alexander Brown were his executors. Mary Andrews died in 1820, having first made her last will and testament, bequeathing to Thomas Griffin Peachy whatever was due to her on account of the profits of the estate, accrued since the death of her nephew Thomas Henderson, and devising and bequeathing all the residue of her interest in the estate, real and personal, to John Blair Peachy.

66 *J. B. Peachy and T. G. Peachy exhibited their bill in the superiour court of chancery of Staunton against the executors and devisees of James Henderson (who after the death of Mrs. Andrews, took and held possession of the whole estate, real and personal); wherein T. G. Peachy prayed an account of the profits accrued between the death of Thomas Henderson and that of Mrs. Andrews, and J. B. Peachy claimed that he was entitled to one moiety, at the least, of the estate real and personal, and prayed a decree for partition and division of the land and of the slaves and other personal estate, and an account of profits accrued since Mrs. Andrews's death.

The executors and devisees of James Henderson, in their answers, insisted that they were entitled, respectively, to the whole of the estate, real and personal.

The court of chancery held, that this was not a limitation of the whole remainder of the whole estate, to take effect on the death of the daughter first dying, and to vest in the children of both then in esse, liable to open and let in any after born children of the survivor; but, as it was a devise of the estate to the two daughters in several moieties for life, so the limitation was of the remainder in several moieties also; a limitation of the remainder of each moiety, expectant on each life estate, upon the event of the death of each daughter to the children of both who should be living at the death of each; so that, upon the death of the daughter first dying, the remainder of her moiety only, should vest in the children of both then in esse, and upon the death of the surviving daughter, the remainder of her moiety should vest in the children of both then in esse; a base fee in the real estate, and a remnant of interest in the personal, not being disposed of, descending and passing to the two daughters, who were the testator's heirs at law and distributees, and awaiting the contingencies on which the contingent remainder of the real, and executory bequest of the personal, were limited. And the court pronounced an interlocutory decree, declaring that the plaintiff J. B.

67 Peachy was entitled *to one moiety of the real estate in question, and to one fourth part of the slaves and other personal estate; appointing commissioners accordingly, to set apart and allot the same to him; and directing accounts of the slaves

*The testator was an eminent lawyer and judge. At the first organization of the high court of chancery of Virginia, that court consisted of three judges: Edmund Pendleton, George Wythe, and this gentleman, Mr. Blair, were the three chancellors. After the adoption of the present constitution of the U. States, Mr. Blair was appointed by president Washington, an associate justice of the supreme court of the U. States; which office he resigned a few years before his death. He was a man of learning, and most exemplary virtue. He died at a very advanced age. His will was written by himself the year before his death.—Note in Original Edition.

and their increase, and of the profits of the whole subject accrued since Mrs. Andrews's death. From which decree Henderson's executors and devisees appealed to this court.

Standard for the appellants, contended, that upon the just construction of the will, it was a devise and bequest of the estate to the two daughters, in equal moieties, for life, with a remainder, limited to take effect upon the death of the daughter first dying, to the children of both daughters then living, so as that, upon that event, the children of both then living, should take the intire remainder of the whole estate; that is to say, the remainder of the moiety of the daughter first dying in immediate possession, and a vested remainder in the moiety of the surviving daughter expectant on her life; subject, however, to open in case the surviving daughter should have any children afterwards born, and to let them in for an equal share of the whole subject. That, consequently, upon the death of Mrs. Henderson, the whole remainder of the whole estate vested in her son Thomas, one moiety immediately in possession, the other in expectancy after his aunt Mrs. Andrews's death. And that, as there were no children afterwards born to Mrs. Andrews, to participate with him in the estate; and as he derived his whole interest by purchase under the will of his grand father, not by descent from his mother as to any part; therefore, upon the his death, though he died in infancy, whole estate, real and personal, descended and devolved to his father James Henderson, his sole heir at law and distributee.

He said, there was no other construction, which would at once ensure the whole remainder of the estate expectant on the life estates of the testator's daughters, to his grand children by both daughters, and 68 give to all and each of them *equal shares per capita; which was the manifest purpose of the will. There was only one limitation over as to the whole remainder, and that limitation was to take effect upon the happening of one event. The event upon which the estate was limited over, was "the death of either" daughter; a phrase of well understood and definite signification, meaning the death of the one or the other: therefore, the death of the one first dying, was the event on which the remainder was to take effect. And the remainder was limited to "their children" (that is, the children of both) "who should be living at the death of either" (including all the children of both, who should be living at the death of one and at the death of the other) "so that, upon the death of either" (upon the death of one or upon the death of the other) "her moiety should go in remainder, not to her children, but to them and the children of the surviving daughter;" meaning clearly, the children which both should have at the death of the one first dying, and those which the survivor should have at her death. That the testator intended exact equality among all his grand children by both daughters, whenever born, and apprehended they might be numerous, was plainly indicated, by the direction that they should take per capita and not per stirpes, and by the authority given to sell the land, and divide the money, in case it should come to be divided into many small shares.

He insisted, that the construction he proposed would effect the intent, and the whole intent, of the testator: and that any other construction would disappoint it; so far, certainly, as to defeat the purpose of exact equality among all the grand children by both daughters, which the testator so plainly wished and so carefully provided for. The testator could not possibly have intended, that the remainder should take effect as to the several moieties, at several times and upon several events, and devolve to different sets of grand children; that the remainder of the moiety given to Mrs.

Henderson for life, should take effect
69 at her death, and vest *in the children of both daughters then living, and that the remainder of the moiety given to Mrs. Andrews, for life, should take effect at her death, and vest in the children of both then living. He said, the consequences of such a construction, were enough to condemn it: for, suppose Mrs. Henderson to have died first, leaving one child, and after her death Mrs. Andrews to have had many children, and then died; Mrs. Henderson's child would have taken his mother's moiety, and then participated equally with the children left by Mrs. Andrews in her moiety, while these could claim no participation with him in his mother's moiety—or, suppose Mrs. Henderson to have died childless, Mrs. Andrews surviving her and having one child living at the time of her death; and then suppose Mrs. Andrews to have had many children born after her sister's death, and then died; the child born before that event, would have taken Mrs. Henderson's intire moiety absolutely, and then come in for an equal share of his mother's moiety with his brothers born after that event, while these would be excluded from participation with him in their aunt's moiety. Consequences like these would be utterly irreconcilable with the obvious intent and the whole scheme of the will; and the construction that would lead to them, could not be adopted, without supposing that the testator studiously selected the most ambiguous words to express his meaning.

And as the construction he contended for, upon which the intire remainder of the whole estate vested, upon the death of Mrs. Henderson, in the only grand child of the testator then living, subject to open to let in any grand child that might be afterwards born of Mrs. Andrews, would best effectuate the intent of the testator, so it was perfectly conformable with the rules of law, that the estate so vesting in one, should devest as to the proportions of others afterwards becoming capable. He referred to Butler's Fearn, 312-315, and the cases there cited, Matthews v. Temple, Comb. 467; 1 Ld. Ray. 311; Oates v. Jackson, 2 Stra. 1172; Doe v. Perryn, 3 T. R. 484; Doe v. Martin, 4 T. R. 39.

70 *Johnson and Leigh for the appellee, premised, that it was no uncommon case, that the provisions of a will calculated to operate on future events, the exact state of which, as they afterwards turn out, the testator did not foresee, and therefore did not distinctly provide for, should produce, in their application to the actual events, effects not foreseen, and so not intended, by the testator. In this case, there was no possible construction, upon which the testator's intent, as expounded by the appellants' counsel, might not have been eventually disappointed. If, as he contended, the death of the daughter first dying, was the event upon which the intire remainder of the whole estate was limited over, then, in case Mrs. Henderson had died childless, her surviving sister being at the time also childless, the intire remainder of the whole estate would have been defeated and gone.

The first took up the question as to the real estate; as to which, the first proposition they advanced was, that upon the death of the testator, the two daughters took, by the will, each, a several life estate in a moiety, and by descent in parcenary, the fee simple of the whole, but a base fee, subject to contingent remainders limited to their children. They said, there was no doubt, that the will devised a moiety of the land to each of the daughters, for her life, in such manner as that the life estate of each in her moiety, was, in a legal view, several and distinct from that of the other. The testator apparently looked to an actual division between them; and, certainly, either might at any time have demanded and obtained one; but an actual division of the subject, was by no means necessary to sever their titles; for, by force of the will alone, so far as concerns the points in question, each took a several vested estate for life in a moiety. The remainder in fee expectant on these several life estates, being devised to the children of both daughters who should be living at the death of either, was a contingent not a vested remainder; a remainder limited to persons not ascertained by the limitation itself, nor ascertainable till the happening of a future

71 event or events, when "there might or might not be persons in being answering the description of the remaindermen, so that it was uncertain whether the remainder would ever vest at all, or if it should vest, in whom. This limitation too (though the distinction, in this case, might be unimportant) was a contingent remainder, not an executory devise; for it was an inflexible rule that such a limitation should never take effect as an executory devise, if it might possibly take effect as a contingent remainder; as this certainly might; the remainder being limited on particular freehold estates capable of supporting such a remainder, and limited on such a contingency that it must vest, if at all, instantly on the termination of the particular estates. Then, the limitation of the remainder in fee expectant on the preceding life estates, being a contingent remainder, not certain as to the persons in whom it should vest, nor certain to vest at all; and the fee simple and inheritance not being disposed of by the will, in the mean time; the fee descended to the testator's heirs at law, his two daughters, and remained in them, awaiting the appointed contingency that should divest it in favour of the remaindermen.

In this state the title remained till Mrs. Henderson's death. Her surviving sister had no child; and she left but one. What did he then take, by force of testator's will? A vested estate in possession in his mother's moiety, and a vested remainder in his aunt's moiety expectant on her life estate? or, a vested estate in his mother's moiety, with a mere possibility of ultimately getting the whole of his aunt's moiety, depending on the contingency of his surviving her, and being the only grand child of the testator that should survive her? They contended, that as the will devised several life estates in several moieties to each daughter, so it devised the remainder of each moiety, severally and respectively, to their children; that the remainder, as well as the particular estate, passed in several moieties. The testator's language (after the devise of the life estate, in moieties expressly, to his two daughters)

72 was, "remainder to their *children who should be living at the decease of either" of the daughters. These words might, perhaps, in a strict sense, import alternative contingencies. But the word either, as here used, meant each, which indeed was one of the senses of it, in very common use; and the word remainder was explained by the context to means the several remainders of the respective moieties. For, they said, the word remainder was a word of relation: its antecedent here, was a several life estate, in each moiety, previously given to each daughter: the remainder was to take effect after each life estate, as it should be determined by the death of each daughter; and, as the life estate on which the remainder depended were several, so was the remainder expectant upon each of those life estates, a several remainder. And that this was the just construction, seemed plain from the subsequent words, professedly explanatory, whereby it was provided, that upon the death of either of the daughters, her moiety (only) should go in remainder, not to her children, but to them and the children of the surviving daughter. The death of either daughter was the event upon which her moiety was to go over in remainder, and the event by which the remaindermen to take that moiety, were to be ascertained; and the death of the other daughter, was the event, by which her moiety was to go over in remainder, and the remaindermen as to it were to be ascertained. And whatever might be the consequences of such a construction, they contended it was the just construction and true effect of the will, that the remainder was to take effect as to the several moieties respectively, at several times and upon several events, and devolve, perchance, to several sets of remaindermen.

It was argued by the appellants' counsel, that the consequences of this construction sufficed to condemn it: but the consequences of his construction would be equally, if not more, abhorrent from any intention that could possibly be attributed to the testator. If the death of the daughter first dying, was the event upon which it was intended

73 that *the contingent character of the intire remainder of the whole estate should cease, and by which the remaindermen should be ascertained, who should take the fee simple in possession of the moiety of the daughter first dying, and a vested remainder in fee in the other moiety expectant on the life estate of the survivor; then the grand children in being at the death of the daughter first dying, would take absolutely. Their estate so vested, would not open to let in any after born children of the surviving daughter, for an equal share of the subject. The after born children could never claim an estate limited in remainder upon a particular estate which determined, and upon a contingency which happened, before they were in being and capable to take; as to them, the contingent remainder would be gone, for the plain reason, that they were incapable to take, both when the estate determined, and when the event happened, on which the remainder depended, and was to take effect. The passage cited from Fearn, concerning shifting uses, and the cases there referred to, only shewed, that "where a contingent remainder is limited to the use of several, who do not all become capable at the same time; notwithstanding it vests in the person first becoming capable, yet it shall devest as to the proportions of the persons afterwards becoming capable before the determination of the preceding estate." Now, upon the hypothesis of the appellants' counsel, the preceding estate before the determination of which Mrs. Andrews's children must have become capable to take, in order to be entitled to come in, was the life estate of Mrs. Henderson, since it was her life estate upon the determination of which the contingent remainder was to vest. Thus, his own argument and authority concluded directly against the opening of the estate once completely vested, upon the death of the daughter first dying, in the grand children then living, to let in the children of the surviving daughter that might be afterwards born. And then, the consequence of the construction proposed for the appellants, would be, that all grand children of the testator, who should

74 be born after the death *of whichever of his daughters should first die, were wholly unprovided for. And again, if one of the daughters had died leaving a child, the other having none at the time, and that child had died before the surviving daughter, and then she had died leaving many children born after the death of her sister; in such case, the remainder of the whole estate having vested in the child of the daughter first dying in absolute fee, the estate would, on the death of that child, pass to his heirs his (father, or half brothers and sisters on the part of the father, if any, since he would have derived the estate, not by descent from his mother but by purchase under the will of his grand father) and the children of the daughter last dying, the sole remaining objects of the testator's bounty, would be excluded from any share of it.

They understood the will then, as a devise of the plantation &c. to the two daughters, in several moieties, for life; remainder, as to each moiety respectively, expectant on each life estate, to the children of both daughters who should be living at the death of each of them; so that upon the death of each, her moiety was to go in remainder, not to her children only, but to them and the children of the other (meaning still such as should be living at the death of each, respectively) in fee simple, per capita and not per stirpes. And so understanding it, the effect of the limitation was, that on the death of Mrs. Henderson leaving one child, her sister surviving and being childless at the time, Mrs. Henderson's child, Thomas, took a vested estate in possession of that moiety whereof his mother had the life estate. The remainder of the other moiety, expectant on Mrs. Andrews's life estate therein, still continued a contingent remainder, that might or might not take effect: if she had died childless, and her nephew Thomas had survived her, he would have taken this moiety also: if she had had children born after the death of her sister, and then died leaving both her own children and her nephew Thomas surviving her, her children and her nephew would have taken this moiety in equal shares, 75 per capita: if she had had *children born after her sister's death, and her nephew Thomas had died before her, and her own children had survived, they would have taken this moiety: and, in the case which actually happened, of Mrs. Andrews surviving her nephew Thomas, and then dying childless, the contingent remainder in this moiety was disappointed by the event, and gone. The reversion in fee of this moiety, as well as of the other—the base fee subject to the contingent remainder—not having been disposed of by the testator's will, had passed by descent from him to his two daughters, in equal moieties; and upon the death of Mrs. Henderson her share of this base fee of Mrs. Andrews's moiety, descended directly from her to her son Thomas. This base fee eventually became pure and absolute.

During the lives of Mrs. Andrews and Thomas Henderson, after his mother's death, the state of the title stood thus: Thomas had a vested fee simple in possession in his mother's moiety, which he derived by purchase under his grand father's will. Mrs. Andrews held the life estate in the other moiety; of which the fee simple, that is, the base fee subject to the contingent remainder limited by the testator's will, was vested in her and her nephew Thomas, he claiming this interest by descent from his mother.

Upon the death of Thomas Henderson, that moiety which had vested him in fee upon the determination of his mother's life estate therein, by force of the limitation in his grand father's will, and so was derived by purchase directly from his grandfather, descended to his own father, who was his heir at law as to it, and passed by his will to the appellants, his devisees. But that portion of the fee simple of the moiety wherein Mrs. Andrews still held the life estate, which had vested in Thomas Henderson at his mother's death, having been derived by descent from his mother, and he dying an infant, and leaving a maternal aunt surviving him, descended to that aunt, Mrs. Andrews, to the exclusion of his father, according to the exception in the statute of descents, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 12, p. 356. So that *Mrs. Andrews now held not only her life estate in this moiety, but the fee simple also, subject still to the contingent remainder limited by her father's will, which might possibly still take effect in favour of any children she might have and leave.

When Mrs. Andrews died, there was no child living of either daughter of the testator; there was no person in being answering the description contained in his limitation of the contingent remainder expectant on her life estate in her moiety; no person capable to take this remainder. As to this moiety, the contingent remainder failed, because the contingency did not happen. Her fee in this moiety, therefore, which before her death was a base conditional fee, became upon her death, eo instante, a pure and absolute fee; which, consequently, passed by her will to her devisee thereof, the appellee.

Then, as to the personal subject, they said, the intention of the testator was, doubtless, to make the same disposition of the personal as of the real estate; but, in the events that had occurred, the law made a different disposition of the personal from that which it made of the real. The construction and effect of the will was the same as to both subjects, with this difference, that the executory limitation was a contingent remainder as to the real, but as to the personal, an executory devise or bequest; a difference, in many cases, by no means verbal, but immaterial here. The course and manner in which the title of the personal estate passed from the testator to his two daughters, followed exactly the real. Upon the death of the testator, Mrs. Andrews and Mrs. Henderson, took, each respectively, a several life estate in a several moiety of the personal subject; remainder, as to each moiety respectively, to the children of both, who should be living at the death of each; and they also took, as co-distributees of their father (and beneficiary owners of the interest, though it vested in his personal representatives), that possible residuary interest undisposed of by his will, which might eventually 77 result *from the failure of the executory bequest to take effect, as to both or either of the moieties. Upon the death of Mrs. Henderson, her son Thomas took, by virtue of the executory bequest in the will, an absolute vested estate in her moiety (which, upon his death, devolved, by the statute of distributions, to his father James Henderson) and a possibility, under the executory bequest of the other moiety, of taking that also at Mrs. Andrews's death, depending on the contingency of his surviving her, and being the only grand child of the testator who should survive her. Mrs. Andrews still holding her life estate in this remaining moiety, she and James Henderson (representing his deceased wife, being her sole distributee, and entitled to administration of her estate), became now tenants in common, each entitled to one half of the undisposed of possible interest in her moiety, which should result from the failure of the executory limitation to take effect as to it. In the event, the executory limitation did fail as to this moiety, by the death of Mrs. Andrews, without leaving any child of herself or her sister surviving her, to take under the limitation. And then James Henderson's right to one half of this moiety, which before her death was a mere possibility, became absolute in his representatives, and her right to the other half of it, became likewise absolute in her representatives. Thus it was, that Henderson's representatives, claiming by distribution from his son, one moiety of the personal estate in question, and by distribution from his wife, one moiety of the other moiety, became entitled to three fourths of the personal subject in question; and Mrs. Andrews's legatee, the appellee, had the right to the remaining fourth.

They concluded, that the decree of the court of chancery was perfectly correct, in respect both to the real and personal subject.

PER CURIAM. The decree is approved, and affirmed in omnibus.

Appeal from Circuit Court—Right to inspect Minutes to Correct Mistake in Entry of Judgment.—Upon an appeal from a judgment of a circuit court, this court cannot inspect the minutes of the proceedings taken by the clerk, for the purpose of correcting a mistake in the entry of the judgment on the order book; aliter, in the case of a judgment of a county court.

Joint Bonds—Action on—Set-Off.—A. and B. execute a joint bond to C. part of the consideration of which is the price of a parcel of corn sold by C. to A. deliverable at a day subsequent to the date of the bond; the corn is not delivered according to contract; in debt on the bond by C. against A.

*He sat in none of the cases reported in the sequel of this volume, except the cases of Burwell's exors v. Anderson's adm'r &c. and Doswell v. Buchanan's exors. post. His absence was owing to bad health.

Bonds—Action at Law—Set-Off.—In Fisher v. Burdett, 21 W. Va. 629. It is said: "Before the adoption of said act of 1831, the courts of Virginia held, that the defendant could not vacate a bond at law because he was imposed upon in a settlement of accounts which preceded its execution, or because the bond was founded on a false or fraudulent statement of facts—Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 338; or because the bond had been obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations made by the plaintiff—Wyche v. Macklin, 2 Rand. 429; or when the action was on a contract either by deed or by parol the defendant could not at law show, that the consideration had failed in part—Tomlinson v. Mason, 6 Rand. 169; Webster v. Couch, Id. 519; 1 Rob. Pr. (old) 227-8; Christian v. Miller, 3 Leigh 78." The principal case is also cited in B. & O. R. Co. v. Jameson, 13 W. Va. 844; note in 1 Va. Law Reg. 542. See monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

Set-Off.—In Kinzie v. Riely (Va.), 43 S. E. Rep. 773. It is said: "Section 3298 of the Code provides that, although the plaintiff's claim be jointly against several persons, a debt due to only a part of the defendants may be set-off against the plaintiff's demand, if it appear that the persons against whom such claim is made stand in the relation of principal and surety and the persons entitled to the set-off is principal. The provisions of that section apply only where the set-off is a debt or liquidated demand. 4 Minor Inst. (3d Ed.) 787; 5 Rob. Prac. 964; Webster v. Couch, 6 Rand. 519; *Christian v. and B. the defendants cannot set-off the value or price of the corn.

Contracts to Deliver Goods—Failure to Deliver—Rights of Purchaser.—Where one purchases goods deliverable at a future day, and presently binds himself by deed to pay the purchase money, or pays it in cash: the purchaser, in case the goods be not delivered, cannot disaffirm the contract, and claim the stipulated price paid, or contracted to be paid, but can only recover damages against the vendor for breach of his contract.

This was an action of debt, brought in the circuit court of Amherst, by Boyd Miller assignee of Thomas Coleman against Christian and wife and Carter, upon a bond for 489 dollars, executed by Mrs. Christian while sole, and Carter. The defendants' plea was payment, on which an issue was made up. There was a trial, and a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. But, in the record sent to this court, it appeared that there were only eleven men impaneled and sworn upon the jury.

At the trial the defendants relied upon a set-off (notice thereof having been given, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 87, p. 510), to establish which they examined witnesses, who testified, that Mrs. Christian (the principal obligor in the bond) had, a short time before the date thereof, 79 purchased a parcel of corn of Coleman the *obligee, to be by him delivered to her at a future day, which was subsequent to the date of the bond; that the corn was never delivered to her by Coleman, according to the contract; and that the price which she contracted to pay for this corn, was a part of the sum of which the bond was given. Whereupon, on the motion of the plaintiff's counsel, the court instructed the jury, that if it should find from the evidence, that the price of the corn was part of the consideration of the bond, it was not to be allowed as a set-off in this action. To this opinion the defendants filed a bill of exceptions, and appealed from the judgment to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellants and by Stanard for the appellee.

Johnson said, the proceedings must certainly be reversed, for the defect in the number of the jury. Stanard suggested, that the record might be corrected in this particular, by the minutes taken by the clerk, by which it would probably be found that the number of the jury was complete. Johnson replied, that the minutes could not be referred to; that there was a distinction between the proceedings of a county court and those of a circuit court; in the former, the minutes were drawn up and signed by the presiding justice, and were the original record of the judgments, but in the circuit court, the minutes were not part of the record, but only memoranda taken by the clerk, to enable him to make the entries in the order book, and these entries were signed by the judge, and were the original record. Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 Hen. & Munf. 477, 8, and Vaughan & al. v. Freeland & al., Ibid. in notis.

But, both the counsel being desirous that the court should decide the point presented by the bill of exceptions, so as to put an end to the controversy, that point was examined.

Johnson said, the opinion of the circuit court upon it, was apparently founded on (what he thought) a mistaken application of the principle, that the consideration of a sealed contract could not be inquired 80 into, in an action at law upon *the instrument. That principle was only just and applicable, where an attempt was made to go into the consideration, for the purpose of defeating the obligation of the instrument; but it was not applicable when the inquiry into the consideration, was intended to ascertain some collateral point in issue, perfectly consistent with the obligation. Here the defence was set-off; which admitted the obligation of the bond, and the debt thereby created, but alleged satisfaction of it.

Stanard said, 1. that this was an attempt to evade the principle, that the consideration of a bond could not be inquired into, in an action of debt upon it; it was an attempt to set up a failure of the consideration as a defence to the action; but failure of consideration, even want of consideration, was no defence. 2. That it was an attempt to set off a debt due to Mrs. Christian severally, against a demand against her and Carter jointly; they were not mutual debts. And 3. that it was an attempt to set off unliquidated damages against a certain demand; damages for the failure of Coleman to deliver corn at a future appointed day, and to be measured, of course, by the value of the corn at the day appointed for the delivery.

Johnson replied to the objection against the proposed set-off because the debts were not mutual. That, if Mrs. Christian had brought a suit for the debt due to her severally, this debt due from her and Carter jointly, could not have been set-off against her demand, since that would have been, in effect, to make her pay the whole debt for which she and another were jointly bound: but here, she was sued on the bond of herself and another, and if she took upon herself to pay the whole debt, by the application of her own money or funds to the satisfaction of it, there could be no injustice to the plaintiff, or to her co-obligor. And as to the objection, that this was an attempt to set off unliquidated damages, he said, the contract for the delivery of the corn, for the price of which Mrs. Christian 81 had given the bond, having been broken by Coleman, she had *a right, if she thought proper, to disaffirm that contract intirely, and to recover back the price; which was a sum certain.

CARR, J. It appears by the record, that there were but eleven jurors sworn. It was suggested by the appellee's counsel, that this might be an error of the clerk in transferring the proceedings from his minute book to the order book. Whatever power this fact might give the court below to correct the entry in the order book, I presume it gives to this court no power on that subject. For this error, therefore, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause sent back.

But there was another point argued, that presented by the bill of exceptions to the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury; and as that point will again arise in the trial there, it may not be amiss to give our ideas upon it. It was, indeed, the only point which the appeal was intended to bring up. The attempt was to set off in this action, the price of a parcel of corn, not delivered according to contract by Coleman the obligee, which formed a part of the consideration of the bond on which the action was brought; in other words, (as it seems to me) to deduct the price of the corn from the bond, that part of the consideration having failed. This, I think, was inadmissible, upon the principle that one cannot at law, inquire into the consideration of a bond, in a case like this. Suppose the whole consideration had been corn, could the defendants have defeated the action by shewing a non-delivery? Here were two contracts. Mrs. Coleman gave her bond to pay so much money. The obligee bound himself to deliver her so much corn. Each had an action. But her's was for unliquidated damages, and they can never be set off against a liquidated demand. Besides, the claims were not mutual; not due in the same right. In a suit by Mrs. Christian for non-delivery of corn, the bond could not have been set off. The law is settled on this subject, both by english and american decisions; it is not 82 *necessary to refer to them. I think the instruction given to the jury was right.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred. TUCKER, P. The reversal of the judgment is inevitable. The issue was tried by eleven instead of twelve jurors; which is a fatal error. It was suggested, indeed, that the minutes of the court's proceedings might shew, that there were twelve persons sworn to try the issue, the name of one of whom was omitted by mistake in drawing up the orders. But though the complete records in the county courts are amendable by the minutes, since these last are the act of the court, whereas the full record is the act of the clerk in his office, yet in the circuit courts the minutes are mere memoranda of the clerk, while the orders have the sanction of the court's authority. They are directed to be drawn up at large in the interval of the court; to be read over at its next sitting, and corrected where correction is necessary; and this for preventing errors in the proceedings. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 69, § 46, p. 237. It would be subversive of the spirit of this provision, to consider the orders thus examined and approved, as subject to be controlled by the loose memoranda of the ministerial officer; and so this court has decided.

With respect to the point appearing in the exceptions, on which the opinion of the court is desired, I have no doubt, that the set-off was properly rejected, though, perhaps, for reasons different from that which seems to have prevailed with the court below. 1st. The action was a joint action against two, and the set-off attempted was the individual demand of one of the defendants against the obligee. It is vain and useless to speculate now upon the reasonableness of permitting or refusing such a set-off: it has been too frequently settled by the practice of the courts, that such a set-off is not allowable, for the court now to act upon a different principle. Ritchie

& Wales v. Moore, 5 Munf. 388; 83 *Porter v. Nekervis, 4 Rand. 459. It is of very little importance, whether a defendant shall be permitted to make his discount or be driven to his cross action: but it is of vital importance, that the practice of the courts should not be in a state of continual fluctuation. If it were necessary to do more than to entrench ourselves behind the numerous authorities on the subject, perhaps, it might not be difficult to shew, that the courts could not have extended the doctrine of set-off farther than they have done, without subjecting themselves to the just imputation of judicial legislation. It might, moreover, be possible to shew, that justice and convenience conspired to impose a limit upon the power of introducing a variety of litigations into the same action. But I content myself with resting upon the authorities just cited, as conclusive of the point. 2ndly, The discount offered in this case, would have conflicted with an established rule. A demand for unliquidated damages cannot be set off against an ascertained demand, nor can cross demands for unliquidated damages be set off against each other. Howle v. Strickland, 1 Cowp. 56; Weigall v. Waters, 6 T. R. 488. What then, is the nature of the defendant's demand in this case? It arises out of a breach of a contract to deliver a quantity of corn. She has paid no money and there is none therefore for her to recover back. Her only remedy, in case the plaintiff gets a judgment on her bond, is to sue Coleman for damages for failing to deliver the corn, in which she would recover not the contract price, but the value of the article at the time it should have been delivered, with interest. Bull v. Douglass, 4 Munf. 303; Merryman v. Criddle, Id. 542; Douglass & al. v. M'Allister, 3 Cranch, 298; Gainsford v. Carroll, 2 Barn. & Cress. 624; 9 Com. Law Rep. 204. This, then, is strictly a demand for unliquidated damages, and therefore not a proper set-off. I am not inattentive to the principle, that if the vendor of an article to be delivered at a future day under a parol contract, fails to fulfil his engagement, the buyer may disaffirm the contract, and if he has paid

84 his money *may recover it back on a general count of indebitatus assumpsit. For, in such case the breach by one party, and the disaffirmance by the other, put an end to the contract. It is no longer an open and subsisting contract (upon which general indebitatus assumpsit will not lie) but the express contract is at an end, and the implied obligation to refund the price springs up from the transaction. But this doctrine, I take it, can have no application, where the contract to pay is evidenced by deed. In such case, the buyer can neither disaffirm the contract, nor plead that the consideration has failed. Thus, if one give his bond for 500 dollars to another (100 barrels of flour to be delivered at new year's day, being the actual consideration, though not expressed so to be) the obligor cannot disaffirm the contract upon the failure of the obligee to deliver the flour. His only remedy at law is, to submit to a judgment on the bond, and commence his action for damages. The measure of the damages, in case the price be not paid, would be the difference between the contract price and the market price at new year, when the flour should have been delivered. Gainsford v. Carroll. But when the price has been paid, or the vendor has a judgment for it, the measure of damages is the whole value of the article at the time fixed for the delivery. Such is precisely the case here. The defendant bought corn of Coleman, and gave her bond for the price. She cannot vacate her bond by alleging the failure to deliver the corn, but she must resort to her cross action, to recover damages for the non-delivery. This, then, is strictly a right to unliquidated, and indeed very uncertain damages; depending upon the fluctuating value of corn in our market. In every aspect of the case, therefore, I think the set-off was properly rejected.

85 *Crawford v. Thurmond and Others.

October. 1831.

Injunction—Against Execution—Remedy at Law.*—A. recovers a judgment against B. and C. who had prosecuted the suit to judgment, as A's agent, sues out a fi. fa. upon it, and indorses on the execution, that it is partly for his C's own benefit: before this execution is delivered to the sheriff, B. the debtor, makes satisfaction to A. of the full amount of the debt, and A. gives him a receipt in full and discharge: HELD, though B. the debtor, might have made a motion to quash the execution, and thus had remedy at law, yet a court of equity has jurisdiction to give him relief by way of injunction to inhibit further proceedings on the execution.

Philip Thurmond and John Richeson exhibited a bill against Nelson Crawford and Daniel Shrader, in the county court of Amherst, in chancery, setting forth; that Shrader, a resident of Tennessee, recovered a judgment at law, in the same county court, against Thurmond and Richeson, for 993 dollars with interest and costs: that, before the execution upon this judgment was delivered to the sheriff, Shrader having come to Virginia to collect the debt, a contract was made between him and Thurmond, whereby the latter agreed to sell Shrader three slaves and a horse, and to pay him 30 dollars, and Shrader agreed to receive this property and money, in full satisfaction of his judgment; and the property being soon after delivered and the money paid, Shrader gave his receipt

*Execution—Injunction against—Relief at Law—In the principal case before the execution was delivered to the sheriff the debtor made full satisfaction to the creditor, and took his receipt in full for the debt: and it was held that though the debtor might have made a motion to quash the execution, and thus have had a remedy at law, yet equity may give relief by way of injunction to inhibit further proceedings on the execution.

In Lewis v. Spencer, 7 W. Va. 691, citing the principal case it is held, that a court of equity has jurisdiction to enjoin a sheriff from selling personal property for the payment of taxes, upon which he has levied, where the bill alleges that the said taxes have been fully paid.

The principal case is also cited with approval in Hay v. Alexandria, etc., R. Co., 11 Fed. Cas. 886; Penn v. Ingles, 82 Va. 72.

In the following cases the principal case is distinguished on the ground that there was a complete and adequate remedy at law: Morrison v. Speer, 10 Gratt. 230; Beckley v. Palmer, 11 Gratt. 684; Coleman v. Anderson, 30 Gratt. 428, 429; Hall v. Taylor, 18 W. Va. 555. See monographic notes on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518; "Executions" appended to Palne, Surv., etc., v. Tutwiler, 27 Gratt. 440.

for the same, in full discharge of the judgment and execution thereupon; which contract, and receipt for the property and money, were evidenced by instruments under seal: that after this, the defendant Crawford, having previously taken out an execution upon Shrader's judgment, and made an indorsement in these words,— "This execution, except 480 dollars, is for the benefit of Nelson Crawford. (Signed) N. Crawford agent for D. Shrader,"—delivered the execution so indorsed to the sheriff, who proceeded to levy it on Richeson's property, which he had advertised for sale to satisfy the execution. The bill 86 prayed an injunction to inhibit *the sale, and all future proceedings upon the judgment; and the injunction was accordingly awarded.

Crawford, in his answer, said, that the bond of Thurmond and Richeson, on which the judgment was recovered, had been placed by Shrader in his hands as an agent to collect the debt; and that while the bond was in suit, he had advanced and paid to one Frazer, who was duly authorized by Shrader to receive the money for him, 550 dollars, which he was to reimburse to himself out of the proceeds of the bond when collected; and Shrader was apprised of this advance, and agreed, that Crawford should retain out of the proceeds of the bond, the money so by him advanced with interest: that thus, the judgment on the bond, when recovered, was, by Shrader's agreement, a judgment for the benefit of Crawford, to the extent of his advances for Shrader: and that Thurmond was well informed of the transaction between Shrader and Crawford, and of the right of the latter to retain the 550 dollars with interest, out of the debt due upon the judgment when collected, at the time he made the contract with Shrader mentioned in the bill, and was tempted by an exorbitantly high price for his slaves, to combine with Shrader to defraud and disappoint Crawford of the portion of the debt due on the judgment, to which he was justly entitled; and Shrader immediately after receiving the property he had purchased of Thurmond, absconded, and carried the property with him, from Virginia.

Shrader did not put in an answer; and the bill was taken for confessed as to him.

The controversy, upon the merits, turned intirely, on questions of fact, 1. as to the fairness of Thurmond's conduct in procuring a discharge of the judgment from Shrader; and 2. as to the justice of Crawford's claim, even as between him and Shrader, to the money he alleged he had advanced and paid to Frazer for Shrader, and (by consequence) as to the equitable 87 right of Crawford to the benefit *of any part of the judgment. And upon these points, there was a good deal of evidence filed by both parties.

Crawford moved the county court to dissolve the injunction; which motion being overruled, he carried the cause by appeal to the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg, which approved the opinion of the county court, but retained the cause, and gave both parties commissions to take additional evidence; and upon the final hearing, perpetuated the injunction, with costs. From this decree Crawford appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellees, argued the cause, chiefly, upon the merits, which depended on the questions of fact before mentioned, and the evidence relating to them. But Johnson took an objection to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to relieve the appellees upon their own shewing in their bill; for, he said, supposing the facts of the case truly stated in the bill, the appellees had a complete and summary remedy at law, by motion to the county court to quash the execution. And this objection presented the only point of law in the case.

CARR, J. After discussing the cause upon the evidence, and determining it upon the merits for the appellees, said—It was objected, that the appellees, instead of filing this bill, might have moved the county court to quash the execution; and that having this complete remedy at law, equity ought not to entertain them. It is true, that every court has a right to watch over its process, and where it has been irregularly or fraudulently executed, to quash it, as being the best and speediest mode of doing justice. But this was not a question of fraud or irregularity, in the execution of process; no officer of the court had acted improperly. The execution was taken out by Crawford, who had acted as the agent of the plaintiff Shrader, and was indorsed by Crawford for his own benefit, except as to 480 dollars; and at a date subsequent to this indorsement, Thurmond had 88 *obtained a complete discharge of the execution from Shrader: a state of things which presented several questions complicated of law and fact; as 1. the genuineness of Shrader's receipt and discharge to Thurmond; 2. its effect in law; 3. the fairness of that transaction; 4. the effect of Crawford's indorsement, involving the question whether his agency was not destroyed by the presence and acting of the principal; 5. the equity of Crawford's pretensions in fact and in law. Now I do not say, that the county court, sitting as a court of law, could not upon motion, in a summary way, try these questions: but I do say, that in that mode, it would not have afforded as safe or as convenient a tribunal for the trial of them, as a court of equity upon regular pleadings and proofs. And this consideration, it will be recollected, forms one of the grounds in equity for assuming jurisdiction. But there is another, perhaps a stronger ground. The indorsement of the execution for Crawford's benefit, gave him nothing but an equitable right, which could have no weight in a court of law, belonged exclusively to equity, and must finally have brought the cause there for decision. This consideration, it will be seen, had a good deal of weight with a majority of the court, in Ambler v. Warwick, 1 Leigh, 195. Taking all these things into view, I do not feel disposed to disturb the decree.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

89 Burnett and Others v. Harwell and Others, &c.*

October, 1881.

Executors and Administrators—Bond—Liability of Sureties.—Under the former provisions of the statute concerning executors' bonds, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 21, the sureties of an ex'or are not responsible for the proceeds of land sold by him under a power in the testator's will.

Same—Same—Right of Assignee of Legatee to Bring Action on.—Under the provisions of the same statute, an action cannot be maintained on an executor's bond, at the relation of an assignee of a legatee of a decree for a legacy: such action can only be maintained at the relation of the person who has the legal right to the debt.

Same—Same—Action on—Allegations.—In such an action, the declaration must aver that assets sufficient to pay the debt came to the ex'or's hands, or the amount of assets that came to his hands, and the devastavit thereof; and if the declaration contain no such averment, it is bad on general demurrer: per TUCKER, P.

Debt, in the circuit court of Mecklenburg by Harwell and others, justices of the county court of Mecklenburg, at the relation of Bruce & Sydnor, against Burnett and five others his sureties, on a bond given by Burnett to the justices of the county court, upon his qualification as executor of John Davis, in February 1809, in the penalty of 100,000 dollars, with condition in the form prescribed for an executor's bond, by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 21, p. 380.

The declaration, after alleging the execution of the bond, and setting out the condition in hæc verba, assigned as the breach thereof, that Burnett, the executor, had not well and truly administered the goods, chattels and credits of his testator's estate, that came to his hands to be administered, and had not well and truly paid and delivered all the legacies in and by the testator's will bequeathed, as far as the said goods &c. extended, according to the value thereof, but had failed to pay and deliver the legacies, and had wasted the goods &c. in this, that he had not paid Susanna Davis the amount of a legacy by the testator's will bequeathed to her, for which she brought a suit against Burnett the executor, and others her co-legatees, in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, and recovered a decree against the executor for 6555 dollars with interest &c. for and

90 on account of the legacy bequeathed to her by the *testator's will, and the costs of suit; and then, by deed of assignment duly executed, (whereof profer was made) she assigned her decree and legacy to Bruce & Sydnor, the relators; and Bruce & Sydnor sued out sundry writs of fieri facias upon the decree, against Burnett the executor, which were returned satisfied only as to 1936 dollars, and nulla bona as to the residue; and so Burnett, the executor, had failed to pay and satisfy the decree aforesaid, except the 1936 dollars, and had not well and truly administered the goods &c. of the testator, but had wasted the same; by reason whereof right and action accrued to the plaintiffs, the justices, to demand and receive the penalty of the bond from the defendants, the executor and his sureties &c.

The defendants put in a general demurrer to the declaration, and also pleaded conditions performed, on which an issue was made up.

The court overruled the demurrer; and, upon the trial of the issue, the jury found for the plaintiffs 4140 dollars with interest &c. in damages; the court gave them judgment accordingly; and the defendants appealed to this court.

At the trial of the issue, the plaintiffs gave in evidence the record of the proceedings and decree, in the suit of S. Davis against Burnett the executor and others, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond; by which it appeared, that the amount decreed to her against the executor, consisted, for far the greater part, of a share bequeathed to her by the testator's will, of the proceeds of real estate thereby devised to be sold by the executor, and accordingly sold by him. Whereupon, the defendants' counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that the executor's sureties were no wise bound by the bond, for the proceeds of the real estate sold by their principal, and not accounted for; which instruction the court refused to give; and the defendants filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion.

Johnson for the appellants—1. The demurrer to the declaration ought to have been sustained. Bruce & Sydnor

91 *were not proper relators. The statute provides, that an executor's bond "may be put in suit, and prosecuted from time to time, by and at the costs of any party injured by a breach thereof;" but the party injured to whom the action is given, must be a party having a legal right to the damages sustained by the breach. The action lay at the relation of S. Davis, but not at the relation of Bruce & Sydnor, to whom she assigned her decree against the executor; the decree not being, at law, an assignable subject, and the assignment, therefore, passing only an equitable right. Tolson v. Elwes, 1 Leigh, 436; Meze v. Howver, Id. 442; Garland v. Jacobs, 2 Leigh, 651. There was no manner of privity between the assignees and the obligors in the bond. The right of the assignees had been ascertained by no judicial proceeding; and no action lies on an executor's bond, till the right of the party claiming has been judicially established. Braxton v. Winslow, 1 Wash. 31. Besides, the declaration does not allege, that assets sufficient to satisfy the legacy, and the decree for it, came to the executor's hands, or what amount of assets came to his hands, to be administered; neither is there any distinct averment, that the amount of the decree was not paid to the assignor. 2. The opinion given by the circuit court at the trial, was clearly erroneous. The sureties of the executor are bound by their bond, for the due administration of the personal assets only. Jones v. Hobson, 2 Rand. 483.

Wickham for the appellees, did not abandon the last point, as to the liability of the sureties for the proceeds of real estate sold by the executor; but he submitted it without any remark. As to the points made upon the demurrer, he said,—The statute gives the action on the bond to any party injured by the breach; and the assignees of the decree in this case, were parties injured. They were entitled to receive the money, and to give a discharge of the debt; and after the assignment, the assignor had no right to receive the debt. Payment to the assignees would have 92 *saved the obligors from liability on their bond: payment to the assignor, after notice of the assignment, would have left them liable to the assignees. The objection is, that the assignment gave them not a legal but only an equitable right to the money; but the assignor herself had only an equitable right; namely, a right to a legacy. If, for this reason, the action cannot be maintained at the relation of the assignees, so neither can it be maintained at the relation of the assignor; and then the executor's bond is no security for a legatee. The other defects imputed to the declaration are merely formal; substantial objections only are to be regarded upon a general demurrer. The declaration avers, in substance, that the executor wasted the assets in not paying the amount of the decree.

CARR, J. The circuit court unquestionably erred in refusing to instruct the jury, that the sureties of the executor were not bound to make good the proceeds of land sold by their principal. This court, after the fullest investigation, has settled the law on that subject, in Jones v. Hobson. There was another point argued at the bar; whether Bruce & Sydnor could as assignees of Mrs. Davis, a legatee, sustain an action, in the character of relators, on the bond of the executor? I have felt some doubt as to this; but, from the reason and analogies of the law, am led to conclude, that they cannot. We have decided in Tolson v. Elwes, that where A. obtains a judgment, and the execution is indorsed for the benefit of B. he cannot make a motion in his own name against the sheriff, for a default, in the service and return of the writ. We have also decided in Meze v. Howver, that where an execution in the name of A. is indorsed for the benefit of B. if the sheriff levy it, and take a forthcoming bond payable to B. such bond is naught and will be quashed. These cases were decided on the particular words of the law; but the general proposition was also taken, that in no proceeding to carry a judgment or execution into effect, can the name of 93 the transferee be *substituted for that of the plaintiff on the record. The law requires bond and security of executors for the safety of creditors and legatees alone; but neither of these can sue upon the bond, till they have established their demand against the executor by judgment or decree. To enforce this judgment or decree, the bond may be put in suit; but can it be at the relation of any but the plaintiff on the record? I think not. The words of the law are broad; "the bond may be put in suit and prosecuted, by and at the costs of any party injured by the breach thereof;" still, as the bond is given for the benefit of creditors and legatees alone, they seem to be the parties meant by the law. A creditor by bond or other assignable paper, may it is true, by assigning it, place his assignee in his shoes; but a legacy, decree or judgment, is not assignable at law. I do not think, therefore, that the legatee in this case, could by her assignment, enable Bruce & Sydnor to sustain this action on the bond, as relators.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. The first error assigned in this case by the appellants is, that Bruce & Sydnor, the relators, who claim as assignees of a decree in favour of S. Davis, one of the legatees of John Davis deceased, were not proper relators; that the suit upon the executor's bond for the amount of the decree, should have been at the relation of the legatee, and not of her assignees. I am of opinion, that this objection is a valid one. The language of the statute is indeed very broad; that "the bond may be put in suit by any party injured by the breach thereof." But even this broad provision may be satisfied by conceding to those who have legal claims, a right to put them in suit at law, and to those who have equitable claims, a right to sue in equity. Or, it may be satisfied by conceding, that persons standing in the relation of Bruce & Sydnor to the case, may sue even at law, in the

94 name of the justices, upon the relation of their assignor, *and for their own use. If, however, this may seem too nice and technical, I am willing to place the matter upon the more liberal ground of the real meaning of the statute, and the mischiefs and embarrassments, which would proceed from the adoption of a different construction. The statute then, prescribes that any party injured by a breach of the bond may put it in suit. The question still recurs, who is to be considered a party injured? and how is the fact to be ascertained, that the suitor comes within that description? Now, it is agreed, on all hands, that no suit can be maintained upon the bond until the party suing has first established his claim against the estate, if he is a creditor, by the judgment of some court of justice, or if he is a legatee, by the decree of a court of chancery, or the judgment of a court of law upon the express assumpsit of the executor. It is believed, that the records of our courts furnish no instance of an attempt to sue on the bond, until the party has established his demand by a previous judicial proceeding. Indeed it cannot be. The action for a devastavit never could be maintained, until there was a previous judgment against the executor establishing the demand, and the action on the bond could only have been sustained, until within a few years past, after a judgment for a devastavit. And even now, the law expressly requires a previous judgment for the demand, and a return of nulla bona, before a suit can be sustained upon the bond. I think, therefore, we may safely affirm, that the party injured must have established his right to sue, and the fact of his falling within the description of the statute, by some previous judicial proceeding, before he can be entitled to be a relator in an action upon an executor's bond. It may be said, that the demand in this case has been established by a judicial proceeding, and the requisitions of the statute thereby satisfied. But how has the connexion of Bruce & Sydnor with that demand, been established? Had S. Davis been the relator, and the action been indorsed for their use, every thing would have been right. She would have had a

95 legal title *to recover, founded upon the actual decree in her favour of a court of record of the highest authority; and the rights of her equitable assignees would have been secured by the indorsement. The defendant upon the service of the process (which is a demand in law) would have seen that that demand was the demand of an ascertained creditor, and might have satisfied it forthwith. But, as the suit is now brought, various principles of the law are set at naught. Persons having equitable interests are found asserting those interests in a legal tribunal, instead of filing their bill in equity upon the foot of the former decree, and seeking to enforce its provisions against principal and sureties, in the mode so familiar to the profession in that court. Invasions of the jurisdiction of courts of law by the courts of equity, about which we are so sensitive, are not more mischievous than many invasions of the jurisdiction of equity would be. This among others would be attended with great inconvenience. If the assignees, Bruce & Sydnor, had sued in equity, S. Davis, their assignor, would have been a necessary party. The question of assignment or no assignment, could there have been definitively settled, in the cause between Bruce & Sydnor, S. Davis, and the executor. But in the action at law, though the defendants should have pleaded no assignment from S. D. to the relators, no verdict could have been given, which could have protected them against a future claim on her part, if she should be able to negative the authenticity of the assignment, or to shew some subsisting equity or discount against her assignees. Let me add too, that the want of privity between themselves and the defendants, leads, I think, to another consequence, inconsistent with legal principles. In the theory of the law, the writ itself is a demand of the debt from the defendant. Upon the service of the writ, if he knows the demand to be just, he may discharge it forthwith. It is proper, then, that he who sues him should be known as a creditor; but this cannot be where the relator in the cause is an equitable assignee, unknown to himself, and not recognized

96 by a court of law. *I am of opinion, therefore, that this defect in the action is fatal. The next error assigned is, that there is no averment in the declaration, that assets to the value of the debt ever came to the hands of the executor. I think this also a sound objection to the declaration. The question here, it will be observed, does not arise after a verdict. We are considering it upon the general demurrer filed in the court below to the declaration. The statute of jeofails is, therefore, out of the question, except the clause which declares that, upon general demurrer, the court shall only regard such errors as are specially assigned, "unless something so essential to the action or defence as that judgment according to law and the very right of the cause cannot be given, be omitted." That there is no averment in the declaration, that assets to the value of the debt, or indeed any assets, came to the hands of the executor, appears from the most rigorous examination. It remains then only to inquire, whether this averment be so essential to the action, as that judgment could not be given according to law and the very right of the cause? I think it was. The matters which go to make up the right of action, in cases of this description, are threefold; 1. an ascertained demand against the estate; 2. assets in the hands of the executor; and 3. the return of the sheriff, that no such assets can be had to satisfy the execution. It cannot be denied, that upon the trial, these three things must be shewn in order to establish a breach of the condition of the bond. The necessity of proof of assets is obvious, from the consideration, that if no assets were received, there could be no breach by devastavit; and the necessity of establishing by proof the amount of assets, is also clear, because it has been repeatedly decided, that the jury must find either sufficient assets or the amount of assets. Sturdivant v. Raines, 1 Leigh, 481; Gardner's adm'r v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106. This, then, is obviously one of the most essential ingredients in the action. It may safely be called, indeed, the very gist of the action. And if it be the important inquiry before the jury on the trial of the plea of plene administravit, or conditions performed, it is not less important in the case of a demurrer. For it must be remembered, that upon overruling the demurrer of the defendant to the plaintiff's declaration, peremptory judgment is pronounced against him for the plaintiff's demand. If, therefore, the declaration omit what is essential to constitute a right of action, it is impossible to give such judgment without palpable injustice. For, though the demurrer admits what is set forth in the declaration, it does not admit what is not; and hence it is that (sweeping as are the provisions of our statute of jeofails) they reach no case of a demurrer for matter of substance. Much, indeed, may be cured by a verdict; but no errors, except those of mere form, are protected from the effect of a demurrer. A further consideration may illustrate the essential character of an averment of assets, in order to enable the court to pronounce judgment. Even a verdict for the plaintiff for his demand will not justify a judgment of the court, unless that verdict expressly finds a sufficiency of assets, or the amount of the assets, so as to enable the court to graduate thereby its own judgment. How, then, can the court give judgment according to law and the very right of the case, when, so far from knowing the amount or sufficiency of the assets, it does not even know from the plaintiff's own declaration, that the defendant ever received any assets at all? I cannot perceive. I therefore conclude, that on this point also, there is error in the judgment of the court below.

The third objection relied upon, arises on the bill of exceptions; the court refusing to instruct the jury, that the securities of the executor were not bound for the proceeds of the land sold under John Davis's will. This decision is in conflict with the case of Jones v. Hobson, and is therefore erroneous.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered on the demurrer, for the defendants.

*Carthrae v. Brown.

October 1831.

Pleading—Covenant—Failure to Crave Oyer—Effect Where Covenant Set Out in Bill of Exceptions.—Upon an appeal from a judgment in covenant, the covenant not being set out in the pleadings upon oyer, and the question being whether the declaration shewed good cause of action; the court can only look at the covenant as pleaded in the declaration; and though the instrument be set out in a bill of exceptions taken at the trial, the court can pay no regard to it in deciding on the sufficiency of the declaration.

Covenants—Several—Action on.*—C. covenants with B. and J. that he will pay them $300, to wit, to each of them one moiety thereof, and also the sum of $400, upon a certain condition: HELD this is a covenant to B. and J. severally, to pay each a moiety of each sum; so that J. being dead, B. cannot maintain an action to recover the whole.

This was an action for breach of covenant, brought by Brown against Carthrae in the county court of Rockingham. Brown's declaration stated his case thus: "that the defendant Carthrae, on the 8th December 1804, and during the life of one Jarman since deceased, by his certain written obligation sealed with his seal (of which profert was made), covenanted to and with the plaintiff Brown and the said Jarman, that he Carthrae would pay the plaintiff and the said Jarman, the sum of 300 dollars, to wit, to each of them one moiety thereof, on or before the 25th December then next ensuing, and also the sum of 400 dollars at and upon the day when a certain turnpike road in the obligation after mentioned, should be completed and delivered, but with this condition, that if the plaintiff and Jarman should fail to complete the turnpike road across the south mountain agreeably to contract, they thereby bound themselves to refund all moneys received of the defendant Carthrae, with legal interest, but should the said road be completed agreeably to contract, then the obligation whereby the defendant bound himself to pay the moneys aforesaid, should be valid and binding on the defendant. And the plaintiff averred, that he and the said Jarman in his lifetime, and the plaintiff since the death of the said Jarman, did complete and deliver the said turnpike road agreeably to contract, to wit, on &c. Yet the defendant did not, and *would not, on or before the 25th December next ensuing the said 8th December 1804, pay to the plaintiff or the said Jarman in his lifetime, or to the plaintiff since the said Jarman's death, the said sum of 300 dollars, or any part thereof,—and did not and would not, at and upon the day when the said turnpike road was completed and delivered as aforesaid, pay to the plaintiff or the said Jarman in his lifetime, or to the plaintiff since the said Jarman's death, the said sum of 400 dollars,—according to the form and effect of his said covenant &c. and so the plaintiff in fact said, that the defendant had not kept the said covenant so made" &c.

Carthrae pleaded in bar, that the plaintiff Brown and Jarman in Jarman's lifetime, and Brown since Jarman's death, failed to complete the turnpike road according to contract. And upon this plea an issue was made up.

Oyer was not taken of the covenant, on which the action was brought, nor was it otherwise made part of the record by the pleadings; but, exceptions having been taken to an opinion of the court at the trial (on a point not necessary to be here stated), the covenant was set out in the bill of exceptions, and in that way only appeared in the record.

Upon the trial, the jury found a verdict for Brown, for both the sums demanded, 300 dollars and 400 dollars, with interest, subject to some credits which they also found the defendant entitled to for payments made by him. The county court gave judgment accordingly. Carthrae appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment; and then he applied by petition to this court for a superseas, which was allowed.

Johnson for the plaintiff in error, objected, That the covenant, as it was set forth in the declaration, was a covenant of Carthrae to pay moieties of both the sums of money therein mentioned, certainly moieties of the first sum of 300 dollars, to Brown and Jarman, each severally, not to both jointly; and, consequently, Brown could not maintain this action, as surviving covantee, to recover the whole of the 100 *money. Eccleston v. Clipsham, 1 Wms. Saund. 153-5, notes 1 and 2. Yet he had recovered a verdict and judgment for the whole of both sums.

Leigh, contra, endeavoured to maintain, that the covenant as alleged in the declaration, was a covenant to pay both sums to the covenantees jointly. It was stated, that Carthrae covenanted to pay Brown and Jarman the sum of 300 dollars, to wit, to each of them one moiety thereof: the first part of the allegation representing them as joint covenantees, and the addition under the scilicet, being intended to represent their interests not as several but only as equal. This part of the covenant is laid in the declaration as a covenant to both to pay a sum of money to each; which is not distinguishable in principle from a covenant to two to perform a duty to one of them, which would certainly give the covenantees a joint action. As to the 400 dollars, that was stated as having been covenanted to be paid to them jointly. And this construction of the allegation of the covenant, ought the rather to prevail, seeing that it appeared in the sequel of the declaration, that both sums of money were to be paid to Brown and Jarman for a duty to be performed by them jointly, and that they covenanted jointly to refund the money, in case they failed to perform the joint duty. It was easy to see how, both being concerned in a joint undertaking, each might be interested that the other as well as himself should receive his compensation; their contract with each other might have given them a common interest, each in the compensation to be paid the other. And he referred to the covenant itself, set out in the bill of exceptions, and argued from the frame of the instrument, that it was a covenant to the parties jointly.

BROOKE, J. As the bond is not made part of the record by the pleadings, it is not to be so treated, though it is noticed in the bill of exceptions, but the declaration alone is to be looked to, for the terms of the covenant on which the suit is brought.

101 *It is a well settled principle. that covenants are to be considered as either joint or several, according to the rights and interests of the parties; and this on the soundest reason; for though a covenant with several persons be joint and several in its terms, yet if the legal interest and cause of action be joint, the action must be brought by all; and, on the other hand, if the interest and cause of action be several, the action must be brought by one only, though the covenant be in its terms joint. Anderson v. Martindale, 1 East, 497; 1 Wms. Saund. 153. This rule of construction of covenants, though apparently technical, effects the great purposes of justice, and avoids great inconvenience, and the costs of multiplied suits. So, where there is but one duty covenanted to be performed to two or more, they have a joint interest and but one action, otherwise, the defendant would be vexed with two or more suits for one thing, and the court would not know for whom judgment should be pronounced. On the other hand, where the rights are distinct, and plainly separate, the action must be several: for if a joint action be brought, there must be a joint judgment; and one might recover a judgment for the rights of another, and by survivorship at the common law, claim the whole interest instead of his due proportion. It may happen also, that where there is but one duty to be performed to one of two individuals, yet both may be interested in the performance of it; in such case, the contract is joint, and both must sue: as where A. owes B. £100. and C. owes A. a like sum, and covenants with A. and B. to pay it to B. here A. though he is to receive nothing, is interested in the payment to B. and the action must be joint. Indeed, where a party covenants with two to pay money to one only, the law presumes an interest in the other, although he is to receive nothing; because he is joined in the contract, and there can be no other assignable motive for it; and there, the action must be joint, as in Anderson v. Martindale. The interest presumed in such case, must be a joint interest, as two could not have a several interest, in the per-

102 formance *of a single duty to one of them. But where the covenant is with two jointly to pay to them £50 each, or to deliver a horse to each; in that case, though the language of the covenant is joint, yet the interest is several; for there are two duties to be performed, instead of a single duty, which two duties may be severed; and, as the interest of each is distinct and separate, and the one has no interest in the performance of the duty to the other, by any inference from the covenant being joint, it is to be considered several and not joint: it is unlike the case in which the covenant is with two, and the duty to be performed to one only. So, where the covenant is joint and several, in its terms, yet if it appears that the interest and cause of action are joint, the action must be joint: as if one covenants to do an act for the benefit of two, and binds himself to them and each of them for performance, the action must be joint, though these last words are words of severalty. Slingsby's case, 5 Co. 19, a., 2 Bac. Abr. Covenant, D. p. 68. For, as there is a single duty only, a single action only will lie, or there would be a double recovery.

These principles govern the case before us. The declaration alleges, that the defendant "covenanted with Brown and Jarman to pay them 300 dollars" (had it stopped there, it would have been a joint covenant; but it proceeds) "to wit, to each of them one moiety thereof." These are obviously words of severalty: two distinct duties are to be performed, in which each has a distinct and several interest. The words that follow—"also the sum of 400 dollars"—do not alter the character of the preceding covenant, but on the contrary take its character from it, as in Northumberland v. Errington, 5 T. R. 522. Neither do the words "to each of them a moiety thereof," give to that part of the preceding covenant, a several as well as joint character merely: they extinguish its joint character, not by adding a new principle to the contract, but by explaining that which the previous words seemed to give it.

Those words "to each of them a moiety thereof," do not make *the covenant joint and several, but several only. 103 It is a covenant to pay several sums to each of them, and not to perform a single duty to both of them; a covenant to pay several sums to each of two persons, respectively, 150 dollars to one and 150 dollars to the other. Each has a distinct interest in one of the sums, and no interest in the other. Nor does the joint contract of Brown and Jarman for the labour or duty to be performed on their part, affect the covenant of Carthrae to pay for that labour. Though their contract for the labour was joint, they might intend to be paid for it severally.

Upon this ground, without noticing the point presented by the bill of exceptions, both judgments are to be reversed.

Callava, e. d. Bryant and Wife and Others v. Pope.

Wills—Construction—Estates Tail.—On this ques-*

P. during life or widowhood, for her and his son M. P.'s support; and if his wife should be then pregnant, and with a boy, he should have same benefit of the property with the son M. P. and at the wife's death or marriage, both land and slaves should be sold, and the proceeds equally divided between the two sons; if with a girl, she should share equal benefit of the property with the son M. P. while in the mother's hands, but, at her death or marriage, should have only an equal share of the slaves; and if the son M. P. should die without lawful issue, then the whole estate to go to his brother or sister, and if he should have neither to testator's wife's brothers and sisters: the testator's wife was not enseint, so that he left only one child, the son M. P.

Held, that if the land, in consequence of the direction to sell, were considered as money, the son took the remainder expectant on his mother's estate for life or widowhood in absolute property, and the ulterior executory limitation was void; and considering it as real, he took an estate tail in the remainder, with a contingent remainder limited on his estate tail, upon the failure of his issue.

This was an ejectment for 250 acres of land, brought in the circuit court of Southampton, by B. Bryant and Dicey his wife, H. Smith and Lucy his wife, E.

104 Turner and *Martha his wife, Margaret Simmons and Thomas Underwood, against Joseph Pope. Upon the trial, the jury found a special verdict, by which it appeared that the case was thus:

James Porter, late of Southampton, died in 1801, and by his last will and testament, made the following disposition of this property: "As for my worldly goods, I give and devise as follows—I leave to my beloved wife Delilah Porter, the whole of my land and negroes, during her natural life or widowhood, for her and my son Miles Porter's support, and for giving him a good education; and if my said wife should now be with child with a boy child, it is my desire that that child should share the same benefit of said land and negroes as my son before mentioned, and at her death or marriage, the said land and negroes and their increase to be sold, and the money equally divided between them two children; and if it be a girl child, for it to share the same benefit of the aforesaid land and negroes whilst in the hands of its mother, as though it were a boy, but at her death or marriage for it only to have an equal share of the negroes—And it is my desire, that enough of my other estate should be sold to pay all my just debts; and the balance, be it of what kind soever, to rest and remain with my wife for the purpose the other was devised for, and at her death or marriage for it to be sold and the money equally divided between them my offspring remaining—And if my son Miles Porter shall die without lawful issue, it is my desire that the whole of my estate should go to his brother or sister, and if he has neither for it to go to my wife's brothers and sisters, to be divided amongst them as they may think proper." And the testator appointed John Underwood the elder his executor, who took upon him the execution of the will.

The testator's wife was not enseint (as he supposed when he made his will) and he left no other child but his son Miles Porter, who died an infant, unmarried and without issue. The testator's widow Delilah Porter survived the son, and died before this suit was brought.

105 *At the death of the testator, his wife Delilah had eight brothers and sisters living; namely, Dicey the wife of Bryant, and Lucy the wife of Smith, Martha the wife of Turner, Margaret Simmons and Thomas Underwood (who were the lessors of the plaintiff) and Willie, Jacob and John Underwood, which last three died before the testator's son Miles Porter; Willie died intestate, leaving one or more children yet living; Jacob died intestate, leaving one child, since dead in infancy and without issue; John left a will, by which he devised all his estate to Eliz. Turner.

After the death of the testator's son Miles Porter (whether before or after the death of the widow was not found) his executor John Underwood the elder, sold the land in the will mentioned to Pope, the defendant, and, by deed dated the 14th April 1817, reciting, that the sale was made in conformity with and in execution of his testator's will, for the consideration of 1500 dollars, conveyed the same to him.

This was the same land for which the ejectment was brought.

Lastly, the testator's son Miles at his death left paternal uncles and aunts him surviving, who were his heirs at law; and the defendant Pope had purchased of them, and held, all their interest, right and title in the premises.

Upon this state of the case found by the verdict, the circuit court held that the law was for the defendant, and gave him judgment accordingly; from which the lessors of the plaintiff, Bryant and wife and others, appealed to this court.

Johnson for the appellants.

Stanard and Leigh for the appellees.

CARR, J. I think the judgment right. The provisions made by the will for the expected child seem to me to have no influence on the construction of the will, in the actual state of things; but if they had, it would not vary the conclusion

106 *to which I have come. My understanding of the will is, that the wife took an estate for life or widowhood in the whole property. Whether at her death or marriage, the direction to sell, was absolute, or conditional depending on the birth of an after child, I do not think it material to consider, as it cannot affect the limitation under which the plaintiffs claim. Under the words "if my son Miles should die without lawful issue, it is my desire that the whole of my estate should go to my wife's brothers and sisters" &c. it is clear to me, that Miles took (if you consider the subject to be money) the absolute property; but if not money then he took the land (the subject of this suit) in fee tail; it being the plain intention of the testator to provide for the issue of Miles indefinitely. Whether Miles took an estate tail express or by necessary implication, make no difference; as is shewn in Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh, 368, which case, as also that of Griffith v. Thompson, Id. 321, settle the law on this subject, as it had been often settled before in this court. I think it better to refer to these cases, and to say that they rule the present, than to enter again into the discussion of the reasons and authorities which belong to the subject.

BROOKE and CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. The principal question in this case turns upon the construction of James Porter's will, and involves some interesting principle in relation to contingent limitations, which have been firmly settled by a series of adjudications now too numerous to be disturbed. The effort of the appellants' counsel, therefore, has rather been to keep the present case clear of the influence of those adjudications, than to attempt to call in question, what the interests of society so emphatically require to be regarded as no longer questionable. It must be admitted on all hands, that the principle stare decisis, is of peculiar importance in whatever relates to the title to property, and to real property in particular. Among other things, a continual 107 fluctuation in *the decisions of the courts on the construction of wills, is calculated to produce the most serious evils. No testator can with certainty dispose of his estate, no counsel can advise, no conveyancer can transfer, no purchaser can with safety acquire, if the language which is on one day construed to convey but a limited interest, shall on the next be held to pass the greatest estate that can be enjoyed in real property; or if what is at one time considered as a vested and certain interest, should at another, be regarded as contingent and uncertain. The purchaser, under the first decision, supposing he was acquiring a substantial estate, finds, when the next is promulgated, that he is but the holder of an interest which may never vest. By this judicial inconsistency, as by legerdemain, his gold is turned to dust; and if such a course of things could long prevail, property would lose its exchangeable value, because no one could certainly know what he was acquiring. However little, therefore, any rule or set of rules may square with our own peculiar notions of propriety or expediency, or without opinions of the design of the contracting party, we must sacrifice those notions and opinions to the established course of decision and construction. In this case for instance, the interpretation of the phrase "if he die without issue," comes for the hundredth time before the court. There can be no doubt, I think, that we should adhere to the meaning heretofore attached to it, though we have a strong evidence in a legislative declaration, that these terms are used by most testators, in a sense very different from the artificial meaning attributed to them by the courts. I shall not stop to inquire, whether this is really the case, though I think it probable that many a testator would renounce what is called the natural signification, if its consequences were explained to him, and adopt the technical exposition of the courts, as best calculated to effect his principal object and intention. Be this as it may, I do not think we can depart from the great landmark which has been erected on this subject, and I shall accordingly make it my guide on the present occasion.

108 *What then is the provision of this will? The testator devises his land and negroes to his wife, during life or widowhood, for her own and her son's support and for his education. Presuming her to be pregnant, he directs that if the after born child be a boy he shall partake of the advantages given to his son Miles, who was in esse: and he afterwards provides, that at the death or marriage of the wife the land and negroes should be sold and the money equally divided between the two sons; and that if Miles (the son in esse) should die without issue, the whole should go to his brother or sister, and if he should have neither, then to his wife's brothers and sisters to be divided among them, as they might think proper.

Before we consider the effect of these last two clauses, it may be well to consider what would be the effect of the will, and how the property would have passed, without them. In that event, there would only have been a life estate given to the wife for her own and her son's support, with a reversion in fee descending upon him, which would have immediately vested. If, however, after the testator's death another child had been born, the reversionary interest in fee would have devolved as to one moiety, and that moiety in fee would have instantly vested in such posthumous child. Had either of these children then died leaving children, such children would have inherited the estate of their father; or if either had died without children, the other would have been his heir.

The testator, however, aware, perhaps, that the land was not worth dividing in kind, superadds the provision, that, if his wife should now be with child, and that a boy child, that child should be supported and educated as the other, and that, at the death or marriage of the wife, the land and negroes should be sold, and the money divided between those two children.

Here then is a provision which materially affected the character of the interest of the son Miles. On his father's death he became immediately invested with 109 a reversion in *fee in lands (for I am still considering the case without regard to the ulterior limitation). This reversion was, indeed, subject to be devolved as to one moiety, in favour of the posthumous child, independent of the direction to sell; but by virtue of this direction, Miles, at his father's death held the fee in the land itself, subject however to be defeated, not as to a moiety only, but as to the whole, by the birth of a son; upon whose birth neither would have any real estate, but only a right to one moiety each of the proceeds of the sale directed by the will.

In this aspect of the case, then, and still keeping out of view the ulterior limitation, each would have had a vested interest in a personal subject, that is the money for which the land might have sold. (See Selby and wife v. Morgan, 6 Munf. 156.) And if either had died without children, the other and the mother would have taken his share; or if either died leaving children, the children would have taken their parent's portion; or rather, in both these cases, the interest would have passed to the personal representatives, and have been distributed accordingly. But, in the event of the whole interest devolving upon either, he would have had a right to waive the conversion of the land into money, and to have demanded the land. It is not amiss to remark, that as the happening of this event of the birth of a second son, must have concurred within nine or ten months, this contingency could not long have suspended the ultimate character of the estate. And, as no child was ever born; as the event never occurred, upon which Miles's reversionary interest in the land was to be converted into a mere interest in a personal subject; it is obvious, that his interest always was real estate, and has been transmitted to his heirs as such, or has passed to those in remainder, if the limitation over is effectual; which is the next point we have to consider.

In doing this, we shall consider the limitation over, as if no provision had ever been made for the sale of the estate; for, in this view, I do not see that that provision 110 will make *any difference, and in point of fact it never was brought into life by the happening of the contingency. Putting that provision out of the question, the case in effect is thus: the testator devises his land to his wife for life or widowhood, and then provides that if his heir at law dies without issue the estate shall go over first to a posthumous son or daughter, if there be one, and if there be none, then to his wife's brothers and sisters. The operation of this limitation would, in one respect, differ in the two cases. In the case of the brother or sister, the limitation over could only be of a moiety, since he or she would already have had the other moiety; but if there was no brother or sister, the limitation over to the wife's brothers and sisters was of the whole land, since the whole would have been vested in Miles.

The case presented seems to me to be precisely that which has often been decided. It is the case of a devise over to another in case the heir at law dies without issue. This has been construed to give the heir at law an estate in tail. Walter v. Drew, cited 1 Leigh, 401. But, in that case, as the devise was over to another, the reversion in fee was in another person than the heir; whereas in the case at bar, the estate tail would be in the heir with a reversion in fee (dependent upon it) also in him. I do not perceive that this would make a difference. For a man may make a limitation to his own heirs special, which will be good, and the heir will take such estate as purchaser, and will take also the reversion thereupon by descent. Butler's Fearn, 51, 2. If this be so, then the limitation in question vested an estate tail in Miles Porter, which was converted into a fee, and thus cut off effectually all the subsequent limitations. But if these words are not considered as creating an estate tail, but as only subjecting Miles's fee to be defeated by the event of his dying without issue, then the limitation is void, because it is upon an indefinite failure of issue. It is, however, my own opinion, that, following the decisions which require all constructions of words of entail to be made as the law aforesaid was, except in the 111 *cases which fall within the influence of the principle settled in Smith v. Chapman, 1 Hen. & Munf. 240, the words of Miles Porter should die without lawful issue must be construed in this will, as giving him an estate tail, and leaving the reversion in fee to descend upon him. If so, the entail is converted into a fee and bars the remainders over.

A great effort was made to take this case out of the influence of the long train of adjudications on this subject, and to extract from the will something to tie down the words dying without issue, to a definite period, within the time prescribed by the rules of law. The very able view which has been taken of the case by the appellants' counsel, has convinced me, however, much more, that nothing is to be despair of under his auspices, than that there is any thing whatever to tie up the indefinite failure of issue. The consequences and supposed difficulties and absurdities which grow out of the construction contended for, have been strongly presented. They are such, however, as must very frequently occur in the wills of uninstructed and unassisted testators. But, on the other hand, there are considerations which are, and have for centuries been, recognized as having great weight in the construction of wills. A respect for that intent of the testator, which is supposed to have in view a provision for the issue, and a desire to avoid the introduction of what are called perpetuities, lay at the foundation of these rules. In the application of them, what is called the particular intent is often violated to satisfy the general intent, and the ordinary sense of terms yields to that which seems artificial; but it is by no means certain, that if the consequences of thus giving to the language of a testator, what is called the natural meaning, were duly explained to him, he would not shrink from the interpretation, and fly to the technical signification. Thus, in the present case, suppose the appellants' counsel to succeed in proving, that the words die without issue are tied up so as to render the limitation over valid: what is the state in which the testator has left his only son's interest in his small estate?

112 1st, He has *given to his wife the whole of the land during her life for her own and her son's support. Until her death or marriage, she is the mistress of it; and she might live until her son reached an advanced age. The reversion dependent upon this life estate, remote as may be the period of its vesting, he is not content to leave without a clog. It is, indeed, a reversion in fee, but it is defeasible by his dying without issue in the lifetime of his mother; a contingency that might not be determined for half a century. And for whose benefit is this fragment of his estate in the hands of an only child, to be defeated by this contingency? Not his own kin, but his wife's brothers and sisters. And what is the effect upon his interest? to destroy its exchangeable or saleable value, at the least; the only value that a reversion often has to the owner. For, as his fee simple is a defeasible one upon the contingency of his dying without issue in his mother's lifetime, no purchaser could be found to venture in so hazardous a lottery. Had the question been asked of the testator, whether he was willing so to clog the reversionary interest of his son, as that he could not use it, and this for the purpose of securing it to his wife's relations, I can not persuade myself that he would have answered affirmatively. He would, unhesitatingly, have preferred the construction, which would have left in his only child an efficient power over the estate, to that which would have fettered him by restrictions, for the benefit of strangers to his own blood. It is obvious too, that the construction contended for, would have other effects which the testator never could have contemplated. Had a posthumous son been born, he would have held his portion unclogged with a limitation over, and might therefore have sold or disposed of it; and, if Miles had died and his portion devolved on his brother, the brother would have held even that, unfettered by any further limitation over; while Miles himself, the child endeared to his father by having received his caresses, is less favoured than one whose existence was merely in contemplation, and who in point of fact never had 113 existence. *By my rule of construction, both are on an equal footing, for the interest of both is absolute.

I am, therefore, decidedly of opinion, that the limitations over to the brothers and sisters of the wife are void, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

‡Foreign Attachments—Rights of Garnishee.—A creditor proceeding by foreign attachment can stand case of a foreign attachment in chancery, to attach a debt alleged to be due from a home defendant to the absent defendant, to satisfy a debt due from the absentee to the plaintiff, the garnishee may set up any equitable defence, which shews that in equity he owes no debt to the absent defendant.

In 1815, Joseph Towles, then of the county of Madison, Virginia, was the owner in fee of a tract of about 400 acres of land in that county, which he was desirous of selling; and Andrew Glassell, of the same county, was (or claimed to be) the owner in fee of a tract of 2000 acres of land lying on the waters of Deer creek, in the county of Henderson, Kentucky, which he claimed under a patent granted to James Mercer, dated the 14th December 1787, and which he was desirous of selling; and Towles and Glassell entered into a treaty for the sale and purchase of these their lands, respectively, by each to and of the other. During this treaty, Glassell shewed Towles the grant to Mercer under which he claimed the Kentucky lands, and the title papers whereby he deduced the title from Mercer to himself, and a plat which, he said, 114 was a plat of his *Kentucky lands made by his son Robert: this plat exhibited a parallelogram, without line trees, courses or distances, divided by a line through the middle, into two tracts of 1000 acres square, lying on both sides of Deer creek; and represented the lower tract as having upon it, a mill seat and some low land, upon the creek running through the tract, one large and three smaller springs, and two licks. The plat so shewn by Glassell to Towles, was made in 1814, and its history was this: Glassell in that year, sent his son Robert to Kentucky, to get an accurate account of his lands there: Robert Glassell went to Ruby, a public surveyor in that country, and shewed him a copy of the courses, distances and descriptions of two adjoining 1000 acre surveys, each of a square figure, lying on Deer creek, and requested him to shew him the lands: Ruby professing to be well acquainted with the lands, shewed him the beginning corner tree of George Lewis's two 1000 acre surveys, through which the creek ran, which (he deposed) he knew, at the time, was the land that Lewis had transferred to Andrew Glassell, and which Robert Glassell said was his father's land; and he shewed him also a mill seat, a large spring, and a scite for a distillery, which were in fact on the lower of the two tracts; and then Robert Glassell and Ruby made out a plat of the two tracts, indicating the form, the course of the creek running through them, and the mill seat, the large and small springs, and the licks on the lower tract, but without courses, distances or line trees, which Glassell said he had, and could make the plat complete when he got home. Robert Glassell brought this plat home, and delivered it to his father Andrew. But this was not a plat of the lands which Glassell in fact owned or claimed, though he believed it was, and intended no misrepresentation, or deception upon Towles, when he shewed it to him as a fair description of his Kentucky lands.

The treaty resulted in a contract between the parties, evidenced by the following articles signed and sealed by them, dated the 15th August 1815—"Memorandum 115 of an *agreement entered into between J. Towles of &c. on the one part, and A. Glassell of &c. on the other. The said J. Towles agreeth to sell all his land whereon he now liveth, being 400 acres more or less, to the said A. Glassell for fifteen and a half dollars per acre, agreeably to the survey hereafter to be made; the land to be delivered up in October 1816, at which time the money is to be paid down, if there is any left after the agreements hereafter mentioned are complied with. The said J. Towles agreeth to take one of two tracts of land, each containing 1000 acres more or less, lying on Deer creek one of the waters of Green river in the state of Kentucky, and owned at present by the said A. Glassell, for whatever it may be valued at, at eighteen months credit; the valuers to be Paul Leathers who lives near the said land, and any two men he may choose. The land in Kentucky to be surveyed by an authorized legal surveyor, and the land in Madison to be surveyed by the county surveyor, at the expense of A. Glassell. If the said J. Towles should draw any money before he gives possession of his land, he is to allow lawful interest until such possession is given. The said J. Towles agreeth to take such bank notes as pass currently in Virginia—Witness our hands and seals &c." Afterwards, in September following, additional articles were agreed to, indorsed on the other, and signed and sealed by the parties, in these words: "In addition to the within agreement, it is agreed by the said A. Glassell, that the said J. Towles shall have the said 1000 acres of land mentioned within, at fifteen shillings per acre, provided he shall see cause to take it at that price before valued. Should he not see cause to take it at that price, and in case the said A. Glassell should not be satisfied with the valuation of the said land, he is to have till the 1st February next, to determine whether or not he will abide by the valuation within concluded on. In case the said A. Glassell should not abide by the valuation, and determine on keeping the land in Kentucky he the said A. Glassell 116 sell is to have three years *to pay the amount in money that the Kentucky land would have paid. Agreed this 28th September 1815."

In 1816, Towles sent his son Henry Towles to Kentucky, as his agent to take a view of Glassell's lands there, to select one of the tracts, and to have it surveyed and valued: and by this agent, Glassell sent a letter to Paul Leathers, (the person named in the articles of August 1815, who lived in the neighbourhood of the Kentucky lands), requesting Leathers to shew the agent the lands, and to attend for Glassell to the surveying and valuation thereof, according to his contract with Towles, and especially upon no better footing than his absent debtor, whose moneys, goods, or effects he seeks to subject: and his claim to satisfaction therefrom is subordinate to the rights and equities of the garnishee. Williamson v. Gayle, 7 Gratt. 154, citing Glassell v. Thomas, 3 Leigh 113. The principal case is also cited in Hobbs v. Interchange, 1 W. Va. 67. to shew young Towles the large spring and mill seat on the lower tract (those, namely, laid down in the plat made in 1814, which had been shewn to Towles before the contract was concluded). Young Towles repaired to Kentucky, with this letter from Glassell to Leathers, but without carrying with him the title papers by which Glassell claimed the land. The letter being delivered to Leathers, he with Ruby the surveyor (the same who had shewn the lands to Robert Glassell in 1814) shewed Towles the same lands laid down and described in the plat of 1814, and the spring and mill seat on the lower tract indicated on that plat, and a convenient scite for a distillery; upon which young Towles selected the lower tract for his father; and then Leathers, together with Ruby the surveyor chosen by Towles, and Ashby chosen by Leathers and Ruby, valued the tract at two and a quarter dollars the acre; and Ruby made a survey of it, whereby it was found to contain 1155 acres; the price of which at the valuation, amounted to 2598 dollars 75 cents.

Henry Towles, the agent, returning to Virginia, with Ruby's new plat of survey of the lower tract thus selected by him, and the valuation so made of it, Glassell in execution of the articles on his part, by deed dated the 26th September 1816, in consideration of 2598 dollars 75 cents (the price ascertained by the valuation), conveyed this tract of 1155 acres to Towles, describing it by reference to Ruby's recent survey, and by the line trees, lines, courses and 117 distances *in that plat mentioned, and as being one half of a 2000 acre survey of land, number 1291, granted to James Mercer, by patent dated the 14th December 1787,—with general warranty, and covenants of good title, and good and lawful right to convey. And Towles, on his part, conveyed his land in Madison to Glassell. Thus, the articles were fully executed.

Towles, shortly afterwards, sold the Kentucky land conveyed to him by Glassell, to Robert Thomas, for the same price which he had given for it, and by deed, dated the 7th November 1816, conveyed the same to Thomas, with general warranty, and covenants of good title, and good and lawful right to convey, describing the land by reference to Glassell's deed thereof to him, and by the metes and bounds and other description in that deed contained; and Thomas paid him the purchase money 2598 dollars 75 cents. Soon after this sale, Towles removed from Virginia to Kentucky.

Thomas, in October 1819, made a lease of the land conveyed to him by Towles, to one Walker, for ten years, reserving to himself the right to improve the mill seat and the distillery. Walker going to Kentucky to take possession of the premises under the lease, found that the land was claimed by and in the possession of a son of George Lewis. And then, it was discovered, that the land laid down in the plat of 1814, which Robert Glassell brought from Kentucky, as a plat of his father's lands, and which A. Glassell had shewn to Towles as such, and the lower tract thereof which Henry Towles selected and had surveyed by Ruby in 1816, and which was conveyed by Glassell to Towles, and by Towles to Thomas, according to the latter survey, never was Glassell's property; that this land had been granted to George Lewis, according to survey number 617, by patent dated the 13th January 1792; but that adjoining to this tract, was another tract of 2000 acres, lying not on Deer creek, but on a branch thereof, which had been granted to James Mercer, according to survey number 1291, by patent dated the 14th December 1787, and 118 that this 2000 acre tract was the land which Glassell really claimed under Mercer's patent.

Upon this discovery of defect of title, Thomas exhibited his bill against Glassell and Towles (now a non-resident) in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, wherein—after stating that Towles, in the year 1815, was the owner of the tract of 400 acres in Madison, which, being desirous of removing with his family to the western country, he was offering for sale; and that Glassell, about the same time, being anxious to sell some land lying in Kentucky, to which he supposed he had the fee, simple title, and to vest the proceeds in land in Madison or the adjacent counties, in order to effect his wishes, proposed trading with Towles; that Glassell informed Towles, that he was the owner of two tracts of land lying upon Deer creek in Kentucky, containing 1000 acres each, conveniently situated, well watered, heavily timbered, of a fertile soil, having upon it a valuable mill seat, and a scite for a distillery, which could be watered from a large and never failing spring; that Glassell exhibited to Towles the plat of 1814, which his son Robert had brought in, as a true description of his Kentucky land, and particularly recommended it, on account of its being so well watered, and having the mill seat, and scite for a distillery; and that Towles, well aware of the advantages resulting from those considerations in a new country, and yielding to their influence, concluded a contract with Glassell, by which he sold Glassell his Madison land at fifteen and a half dollars per acre, and agreed to receive in part payment for it one of Glassell's Kentucky tracts of land at valuation—he proceeded to set forth the articles between Glassell and Towles of August and September 1815—the mission by Towles of his son Henry in 1816, to view the Kentucky lands, and select one of the two tracts; the selection he made of the lower tract; the survey and valuation thereof; the conveyance thereof with general warranty by Glassell to Towles, according to Ruby's survey of 1816; the sale and conveyance of the same tract by Towles
119 to Thomas, *with warranty; the fact, recently discovered, that Glassell never had any title whatever to the land by him conveyed; and Towles's departure from Virginia and present residence in Kentucky. He also represented, that his main, indeed, his only inducement to purchase the land of Towles, was the mill seat and the scite for a distillery upon it. And upon this state of the case, he insisted that he was entitled to receive, directly from Glassell, the amount of the purchase money he had paid to Towles, with interest. And he prayed a decree against Glassell for the same, and such general relief as should seem equitable in the case.

Glassell, in his answer, said, that Towles first proposed the sale of his Madison land to him, but the price Towles asked was so high, that he declined the purchase, unless Towles would take 1000 acres of his Kentucky land at valuation, in part payment; and his main leading inducement to purchase Towles's land, as Towles well knew, was that it enabled him to sell half of his Kentucky land. That he really owned a tract of 2000 acres of land, which he claimed under a patent granted to James Mercer, and shewed Towles his title papers; and this was the land of which he intended to sell, and Towles to buy, one half. That he did, indeed, shew Towles the plat of 1814, but he told him it had been made by his son, and it did not purport to be an official survey. That the mistake on which that plat was founded, was unknown to him at the time; he had not the least reason to suspect it, nor, as the plat specified no line trees, courses or distances, had he any means of detecting it. That Towles's own agent fell into the same mistake, and confirmed him in it, by bringing him an official survey, not of his own, but of Lewis's land; and he misled thereby, and still not suspecting the mistake, made the conveyance to Towles, describing the subject, indeed, by the metes and bounds specified in that survey, but also by reference to Mercer's patent by its date, and to the precise number of his survey, which shewed what was the land intended by the parties. That he made no particular recommendation 120 of *the land to Towles; nor was Towles at all influenced in making the contract, by its qualities, since he was to take it at a fair valuation. That he, Glassell, still held the land he claimed under Mercer's patent, and had good title to it; and this land lay on the waters of Deer creek adjoining the other, and was as valuable, in all respects, as that which he had conveyed by mistake. That Thomas could justly claim of him only what Towles, if he had held and been evicted, could justly claim of him; that Towles could only have claimed, either that the whole contract should be rescinded, so that the Madison land should be restored to him, and the purchase money thereof refunded to Glassell; or, that the mistake in Glassell's conveyance should be corrected, and a quantity of the Kentucky land which Glassell really owned, equal in value to that he had conveyed through mistake, should be now conveyed to him. That he Glassell was ready to assent to either alternative. And that he had offered Thomas all that Towles, or by consequence Thomas, could justly claim of him; namely, to convey to Thomas, an equal number of acres of the land he really owned, in lieu of that he had conveyed to Towles through mistake, and that at valuation; and to pay him in money, whatever difference there might be in the value of the two pieces of land, if indeed there was any, to be estimated by valuers as at the time of the contract, with interest from the date of the conveyance to Towles.

The absent defendant Towles did not put in an answer, and the bill as to him was taken pro confesso: but he was examined as a witness, by consent, and he deposed, that in the treaty between him and Glassell in 1815, Glassell agreed to purchase his Madison land, upon condition that he would take 1000 acres of Glassell's Kentucky land lying on Deer creek, a plat of which was shewn to him; and he believed Glassell would not have purchased his Madison land, unless he had agreed to take the Kentucky land; at least, he said he would not: that he did not wish to take the Kentucky land, but rather than not sell his own land, he 121 *agreed to take Glassell's at valuation, being (as he understood) one half a 2000 acre tract patented in the name of George Lewis: that the plat of the Kentucky lands shewn him by Glassell, was one which, he said, had been made by his son (it was the plat of 1814): that as he did not intend to remove to the Kentucky land, he did not care how low it should be valued, since the lower the valuation, the more money he would be entitled to receive of Glassell; nor would he have cared how high it was valued, provided he could have sold it for the same price; he wished it valued low, being in need of money; yet, after seeing the plat, he instructed his son, when he sent him to make the selection, to be particular in examining the land for water, and not to take any land without water; in short, to take the land that was best watered, which appeared from that plat to be the lower tract: that he believed Glassell had sold and conveyed that land to him in perfect good faith, honestly believing it was his own: and that he believed Thomas would not have bought the land of him, but for the mill seat, the scite for a distillery, and the springs upon the tract.

As to the 2000 acre tract granted to James Mercer by the patent in December 1787, Glassell deduced the title thereto from the grantee to himself, thus: Mercer conveyed that tract to George Lewis, by deed dated the 25th September 1793; Lewis conveyed it to William Glassell, by deed dated the 5th October 1796; and William conveyed it to Andrew Glassell, by deed dated the 3rd May 1798. The patent to Mercer, and his deed to Lewis, were exhibited; but Lewis's deed to William Glassell, and William's deed to Andrew, were not filed in the cause, though Thomas said such deeds had been shewn to him, but alleged, that the deed from William to Andrew Glassell had not been duly recorded; and his counsel argued, from the contents of Mercer's deed to Lewis, and from some proofs in the cause, as well as from the absence of the deeds from Lewis to William Glassell, and from William to Andrew, that his title to this land was by no means clear.

122 *There were many depositions taken and filed by both parties, as to the value of the land actually conveyed by Glassell to Towles and by Towles to Thomas, and of the mill seat, scite for a distillery and springs upon that tract, and as to the value of the adjoining 2000 acre tract, which Glassell owned or claimed under Mercer's patent, and the advantages of the like kind afforded by the running water upon it; and the opinions of the witnesses were various and contradictory: but in the opinion of the judges of this court, the evidence proved, that the one parcel of land was as valuable as the other, and as well or better watered.

The court of chancery was of opinion, that Glassell really intended to sell, and Towles really intended to buy, the identical tract of land, designated on the plat of 1814 exhibited during the treaty, through which Deer creek flowed, and on which were the natural objects of low land, mill seat, springs and licks, according to the description on the plat, and that the same identical land was conveyed, and intended to be conveyed, by Glassell to Towles by the deed of September 1816; that, as it now appeared, that Glassell never had any title to this tract of land, his covenants of good title and good right to convey, in that deed contained, were broken at the moment of the execution of the deed; that, therefore, these covenants did not pass to Thomas by force of Towles's deed to him of November 1816, so as to enable Thomas to maintain an action at law against Glassell for the breach of those covenants; but that, as Towles had in like manner broken his covenant of good title contained in his deed to Thomas, at the moment of the execution of that deed, and as Towles was an absent defendant, the court had jurisdiction to give Thomas relief, under the statute concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, p. 474,—that, though it appeared, that both Glassell and Towles did really believe, that Glassell had title to the land he sold and conveyed to Towles, under the patent to Mercer, yet that was no valid objection to the demand of Towles against Glas-

123 sell for damages for the breach *of his covenants, since the error originated with Glassell and was by him communicated to Towles; but that the measure and amount of damages could be best and most properly ascertained by a court of law and jury: therefore, the court directed issues to be tried at the bar of the circuit court of Spotsylvania, to ascertain the damages sustained by Thomas, by reason of Towles's breach of his covenants of good title and good right to convey, contained in his deed to Thomas of November 1816, and the damages sustained by Towles by reason of Glassell's breach of his covenants to the like effect, contained in his deed to Towles of September 1816.

The issues were accordingly tried in the circuit court, and the jury found upon the issue between Thomas and Towles, that Thomas had sustained damages to the amount of 3806 dollars, with interest on 2598 dollars 75 cents, part thereof, from the 30th May 1823 till paid; and, upon the issue between Towles and Glassell, that Towles had sustained damages 3639 dollars, with interest on 2598 dollars 75 cents, part thereof, from the 30th May 1823 till paid.

The circuit court having certified this verdict to the court of chancery, the chancellor decreed, That Thomas should recover of the absent defendant Towles, the damages assessed for him against Towles, by the verdict; and that Glassell, in part satisfaction thereof, should pay Thomas the amount of the damages assessed by the verdict for Towles against Glassell; and that Glassell should pay the plaintiff his costs: with a direction, that the effect of the decree should be suspended, till the plaintiff should enter into bond with sufficient surety, in the clerk's office, in a penalty equal to double the amount decreed to him against the absent defendant Towles, for abiding such future order or decree as might be made for refunding the amount decreed with interest to Towles, upon his appearing and answering the bill, according to the rules of the court and the statute concerning absent defendants. (1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 2, p. 475.)

124 From this decree Glassell appealed to this court; where the cause was argued by Stanard for the appellant, and Johnson and Leigh for the appellee.

CARR, J. Taking this as a foreign attachment, by which the plaintiff seeks to condemn in the hands of Glassell, a debt which he owes the absent defendant Towles, to satisfy a debt which Towles owes Thomas, the first inquiry seems naturally to be, whether Glassell owes Towles such a debt as will justify the decree sought? It was agreed on all hands, that the rights and interests of Towles and Glassell must be settled precisely as if they were the only parties before the court, Thomas's claim being only to such debt or duty as Glassell might be found to owe to Towles. The deed from Glassell to Towles contains covenants of warranty, good title, and lawful right to convey, and Towles's deed to Thomas the same. Suppose Thomas had recovered at law on the covenant of title, his purchase money and interest of Towles, and Towles had recovered a judgment for the same, against Glassell, could Glassell have had relief from that judgment, in a court of equity, in any form? It is in clear proof, that the mistake with respect to the land, was intirely innocent. Glassell had 2000 acres of land lying along side of Lewis's, to which his title is undoubted, and which in point of soil, water and seats for a mill and distillery, was (if we may credit the evidence) superiour to that conveyed: this was the Mercer tract. He shewed his title papers, at the time of the contract; and both the parties knew, that it was the Mercer land (part of it, at least) that he meant to sell; but, unluckily, Lewis's land was mistaken for it. It is not so strange, that persons living in Virginia, and wholly ignorant of the land, should have fallen into this error, as that the neighbours

125 and the *surveyor of the county himself, should have led them into it. It is well settled law, that although there be no fraud, or default on either side, yet the mutual error of the parties, if that error be in a matter which is the cause of the con-

*The state of the case has been made so very minute and full in order to make it intelligible, and two of the judges have discussed it so elaborately, that it is thought best not to report the equally elaborate argument at the bar, which might extend the report of the case, necessarily too prolix, to a length disproportioned to its importance.—Note in Original Edition.

tract, that is, in the substance of the thing contracted for, is a good ground for rescinding even an executed contract. Graham v. Hendren, 5 Munf. 185; Chamberlaine v. Marsh's adm'r, 6 Id. 283, 7; Tucker v. Cocke, 2 Rand. 66; Thompson v. Jackson, 3 Id. 504, 7; Lamb v. Smith, 6 Id. 552. Under this rule, I have no doubt, that, if Towles had obtained a judgment at law on the covenant in the deed, Glassell might have filed a bill injoining that judgment, bringing the whole subject before the court, and praying that Towles might, if he elected to do so, take his choice of 1000 acres of the Mercer land at valuation, or that, in case of his refusal, the contract might be rescinded and the parties placed in statu quo. When I speak of the contract, I mean the whole contract, embracing the Madison as well as the Kentucky land. It was strenuously contended, and ably too, that there were two several and distinct contracts; and that, therefore, the mistake in the Kentucky land, ought not to disturb the sale of the Madison land, about which there was no error. But to me it is quite clear, that it was all but one contract. The very terms of the agreement, the admissions of the parties to it, and the proof of the witnesses establish this. By the agreement Towles sells his land to Glassell for 15 dollars 50 cents per acre, and agrees to take 1000 acres of Kentucky land at valuation, and at the delivery of his land to Glassell, the money to be paid down, if there is any left after deducting the valuation of the Kentucky land: this incorporates and makes them one intire contract. Again, the plaintiff in his own bill states, that Glassell having land in Kentucky which he wished to sell and invest the proceeds in Madison land, in order to effect his wishes, proposed trading with Towles for his land; and that Towles, yielding to the influence of the considerations pressed upon him by Glassell, concluded

126 *a contract with him, by which he sold him his Madison land at 15 dollars 50 cents per acre, and agreed to receive in part payment for it, one of Glassell's tracts at valuation. The answer of Glassell, after stating that the proposal to sell came from Towles, and that the price he asked for his land was so high, that he declined the purchase unless Towles would take 1000 acres of his Kentucky land at valuation, adds, that his main leading inducement for the purchase of Towles's land, as Towles well knew, was the selling his Kentucky land. Towles, in his deposition, so far from denying this, confirms it; he says, that Glassell agreed to purchase his land of him, upon condition that he would take 1000 acres of Kentucky land; that he did not wish to take the Kentucky land, but rather than not sell, he agreed to take it at valuation; and that he does not believe Glassell would have bought his land, if he had not agreed to take the Kentucky land. It is most clear to me, that in the purchase of the Madison land, the making payment in the Kentucky land, so far as it would go, was as much a part of the contract, as the payment of the balance in money was: and any man acquainted with the ordinary transactions of life, must know, that with Glassell

it would probably be a most important consideration. How often do we see a price given for property, when it is to be paid for in barter, labour or other facilities, which the buyer would not have an idea of giving if it were to be paid in money?

The mistake which occurred, was as much the work of Towles as of Glassell; for though the plat taken by Robert Glassell, described the land of Lewis, instead of the Mercer tract, yet this was a mere transcript from the surveyor's book, not founded on actual survey, with no courses and distances, and was not intended to govern, and did not govern, the parties, in the consummation of the contract. This is clear, from that part of the agreement, which provides that the land in Kentucky shall be surveyed by an authorized legal surveyor at the expense of Glassell. Under this provision, it was the business of 127 Towles to see to the *survey, and have it correctly made: he sent his son to attend to this, and if he had taken along with him the description of the land from the patent to Mercer, the mistake into which the plat of 1814 was leading them, would have been discovered; the true land would have been surveyed; and, as no particular tract was specially wished for by Towles, the contract would have been correctly executed. But, instead of this cautious course, young Towles went, without any title papers, to the surveyor Ruby; and he surveyed the Lewis instead of the Mercer tract. Both parties then may be considered equally instrumental in producing this innocent mistake. Would it not, in such a case, be exceedingly harsh to say that the whole loss should fall upon Glassell? that he should be obliged to hold the Madison land, and pay 6200 dollars for it, all in money, when he had contracted to pay nearly half of it in land, and would have bought on no other condition? and this too, when the very land, which he meant to give in part payment, was there, lying by the side of the land conveyed, and equal if not better than that land in every respect; and when from the moment the mistake was discovered, Glassell was willing and offered to convey an equal quantity of this land, at valuation, and to pay with interest whatever it might fall short of the amount to which the Lewis land was valued. I cannot think that such a decree would be consistent with the settled course of decisions, or the true spirit of equity.

It was contended, that though the parties were in a court of equity, yet that the plaintiff had come here upon his legal rights (which the absence of Towles enabled him to do); and that in such cases, equity must proceed according to strict legal rule; that if Towles were in a court of law, suing Glassell upon his covenants, no equitable defence, no correction of the mistake, or rescinding of the contract, could be heard, and, therefore, that Glassell can make no such defence in this foreign attachment. To this position I can, by no means assent. I admit, that the legal claim, in such cases, must be governed by legal rules; but 128 if there *is an equitable defence, of which, after judgment at law, the defendant might avail himself in equity, of that defence he may take advantage in the foreign attachment, otherwise he would lose it intirely. Upon the whole case, I think the court below erred exceedingly, in considering Glassell the debtor of Towles, and decreeing against him the sum of 3639 dollars, or any sum in money.

CABELL, J. I have given very great consideration to this case, and have found unusual difficulty in forming an opinion upon it. My mind is not, even now, free from doubts. But I fell constrained to yield my doubts, to the positive and unanimous convictions of the other judges. I concur in the decree which has been prepared.

BROOKE, J. I concur in the decree, without doubt or difficulty.

TUCKER, P. I have no doubt in this case, that the mistake on the part of Glassell was intirely an innocent one. No fraud, or intention to deceive, can fairly be imputed to him. The parties in the cause have not imputed it, and their counsel have disavowed it. He had no motive for it. Anxious to sell his own land, it is inconceivable why he should have pointed out the land of another as the subject of the contract, unless he designed to consummate a gross fraud by conveying inferior land of his own at the price of that other. But this he has not done. The error, indeed, was the obvious error of his son, arising, we cannot tell how, but committed on a visit to Kentucky anterior to the treaty between the parties. It was an error too into which Towles fell, through his agent, and in which, strange to tell, Leathers and the surveyor also participated. In them it can only be accounted for by a want of the title papers, which the younger Towles omitted to take with him. Be this as it may, it was a common error in all concerned; and as the surveyor, and Leathers a near neighbour to the 129 land, have *fallen into it, it cannot be considered as a gross or blameable error in any of the contending parties.

The principle of equity applicable to such a transaction, is as plain and familiar as it is just and equitable. Where there is an error in the substance of the thing contracted for, so that the purchaser cannot get what he substantially bargained for, or the seller would be compelled to part with what he had no idea of selling, the contract ought to be vacated even if it had been executed. To say that one party shall be compelled to take what he had no idea of purchasing, or that the other shall be forced to part with what he had no idea of selling, would not be justice; it would be tyranny; it would be to make a contract rather than enforce one. Such a power is disavowed by the courts of justice; and, accordingly, the books abound with cases in which contracts have been rescinded, or their specific execution refused, because of an essential mistake in the thing contracted for. Graham v. Hendren, 5 Munf. 185; Chamberlaine v. Marsh, 6 Id. 283; Calverley v. Williams, 1 Ves. jr. 210, and the general principles on this subject stated 2 Rand. 66. But this rule to be just must like all others be mutual. The privilege extended to one party cannot be denied to the other; for equality of rights is of the essence of justice. The rule must work both ways and for both parties, where there has been no fault or culpable negligence in either.

Such is the case here. An innocent mistake has been committed. Towles contracted to buy one half of a specified tract of land. It was described by a plat, and though there was not a marked boundary upon it, yet the position of Deer creek upon it ascertains its identity beyond all controversy. It is true he was to buy half of the Mercer grant which Glassell owned. But the plat of Lewis's land was shewn him as the true Mercer grant which Glassell owned; and as the land was the important matter whencesoever derived, the substance of his engagement was to take one half of that identical tract which had Deer creek upon *it, and turns out to be Lewis's land. It is true also, that the defendant Towles was very particular about the tract he should get; and it was very truly said by Mr. Leigh, that the Lewis land was in fact what he expected to get, and we cannot make him take any other against his will.

What then are his rights growing out of this transaction? According to the authorities, he may say to Glassell, I will take the Lewis land or none at all; you must procure me that, or I will not execute the contract. Or, he may waive the right of rescission, and take what Glassell acknowledges he had agreed to give—the Mercer tract. Thus he has an election between these two courses; either to rescind, or to take what it is in Glassell's power to convey.

How is it with Glassell? He has committed an innocent mistake. He has erroneously conceived the plat made in 1814 to be the plat of his own land. We will suppose, for the sake of argument, that he has even conveyed it. He may invoke the aid of the principle above stated, and say to Towles—This contract has been entered into under a mutual misunderstanding, I will either convey to you what I innocently understood I was selling, or I will rescind the contract.

Towles, would have a right to select which he pleased of these alternatives. But he would have no right to rescind one half the contract, and enforce the other. I know of no middle ground between a rescission in toto and a specific execution in toto. I know of no power in this court, to half-ratify, and half-annul, this or any other contract. If the contract is intire; if the reciprocal transfers of the Madison and Kentucky land, are indissolubly linked in the agreement of the parties; I can see no justice in compelling Glassell to keep the Madison land and the Kentucky land too. If they be so linked, and Towles refuses to take the latter, he must take back the former, and refund what he had received.

Accordingly, Mr. Leigh having discerned, that this contest would mainly turn upon the character of the contract *in this regard, he has strenuously urged upon the court, to bear in mind that this was not the case of an exchange of Madison and Kentucky land, but of independent, though mutual sales, and that, therefore, the failure of the contract respecting the Kentucky land, could not affect the Madison tract, the contract for the sale of which was independent of it. To sustain this position, he referred among other things, to the right which Glassell reserved to himself, of retaining the Kentucky land upon a certain event. In reference to this argument in support of his opinion, I shall only say, that at most the provision could only have given a right to disunite things which otherwise were linked together, and, moreover, that it never was introduced into the contract, until six weeks after the execution of the original articles: add to which, Glassell never exercised the power of disuniting the two subjects of the contract of August 1815. But, though I think Mr. Leigh's position is not sustained, yet it struck me so forcibly, that I have thought it all important to examine it with care, as constituting the very gist of this matter. And, upon the most deliberate reflection, I am intirely satisfied, that the mutual engagements between the parties, respecting the Madison and Kentucky lands, constitute one dependent contract, the parts of which are indissolubly connected and linked together, and not two separate and distinct sales, which stood so independent of each other, that one might be annulled without in any wise affecting the validity of the other.

That such is the case, the object of the parties, the nature of the contract, its very language, and the distinct admissions of Thomas and of Towles, conspire to prove. The object of each party was to dispose of his land. Towles wished to dispose of his Madison land, altogether for money if he could, but was willing to take western land in part, rather than fail. Glassell's object was to convert his Kentucky property into Virginia property. The bill tells us, he was anxious to sell his Kentucky land, and to vest the proceeds in lands in Madison; and, in order to effect 132 his *wishes, he proposed trading with Towles; that Towles yielded to the influence of Glassell's persuasions, concluded a contract with Glassell, by which he sold him the Madison land at 15 dollars 50 cents per acre, and agreed to receive, in part payment for it, a tract of Kentucky land at valuation. Towles tells us, that Glassell agreed to purchase his Madison land, upon condition that he would take 1000 acres of Kentucky land; that he did not wish to take it, but rather than not sell, he agreed to take it at a valuation; and that he did not believe Glassell would have purchased the Madison land, unless he had agreed to take the Kentucky land; at least, he said he would not. Here, then, the Kentucky land is to be taken by Towles in payment for that in Madison, and Glassell would only agree to take the Madison land, on condition that Towles would take 1000 acres of Kentucky land in payment. If, then, Towles is entitled to rescind the contract for the Kentucky land, because he cannot get the Lewis land, which was his object, Glassell is equally entitled to a rescission, if he cannot make payment in Kentucky land, which was his object.

The agreement in writing is as explicit as these representations of the parties. Towles agrees to sell to Glassell the Madison land at 15 dollars 50 cents per acre, to be paid in October 1816, when possession was to be given, "if there is any left after the agreements hereafter mentioned are complied with." This agreement was, that Towles was to take 1000 acres of land on the waters of Green river &c. at a valuation, at eighteen months credit. That it was to be taken in payment is obvious, because from what went before, it appears the balance to be paid in cash was to depend upon the amount to be deducted on account of this payment in land. Now, it is not conceivable, either upon any principle of law or the ordinary sense of mankind in relation to affairs, that two things can be more inseparably connected, than the sale of a tract of land and the stipulation as to the mode of payment. Nothing is more common than that men are willing to 133 purchase land, *provided they are permitted to pay for it in property; and, moreover, instances must have occurred like this of Glassell's, where a man has been willing to give a high price for Virginia lands, upon the other party agreeing to take payment in Kentucky lands. In such a contract, the disposition of the Kentucky land, is as much the substantive part of the contract with the owner, as the acquisition of any particular tract can be with the purchaser. To compel him to pay money when he contracted to pay in land, would be as unreasonable and unjust, and as substantially making a new contract for the parties, as to compel the buyer to take a tract he did not agree to purchase. And the two things are inseparably connected, for the one is the consideration of the other.

If this view of the case be correct, then I think it will follow, inevitably, that Towles may have a rescission of the whole contract, but cannot refuse to receive the Kentucky land, and insist upon Glassell's retaining the Madison land. In short, the rights of the parties stand thus: Towles may demand a rescission, or the Kentucky land at his pleasure; but, if he says he will not take the Kentucky land, Glassell will then have a right to resist any other terms than an intire rescission. He is, in no aspect, the debtor of Towles. He may well say, I owe you nothing: I engaged to pay you land which I am ready to pay, I did not promise to pay money and I will not pay it. This election on the part of Towles, is essentially necessary to ascertain the character of his demand against Glassell, as I shall presently shew. But I will first observe, that the right of election may be vitally important to him. Exposed as he may be to Thomas's demand, it is, perhaps, not so embarrassing, as that of Glassell might be, in case of rescission. For, in that event, he must refund what he has received in cash from Glassell for the Madison estate. It is true, in this case, he would get back the land, as the representative of the money refunded; but so also would it be on his refunding to Thomas.

134 *If this right of election then be vitally important to Towles, I think it may be safely affirmed, that he alone can exert it, so far as the rescinding of the contract would go. Far as the principle of substitution has been pushed (and with great benefit, by the way) I do not think it could extend to vest in Thomas the right of deciding for him, that the whole contract should be rescinded. Having bought from him, indeed, his purchase from Glassell, I have no doubt he might assume to himself, on the principle of substitution, one branch of the alternative, and demand, that as the Lewis land cannot be conveyed to him, the Mercer tract shall. But he cannot go farther than even Towles—insist on Glassell retaining the Madison land, and paying up the value of the Lewis tract in money, when he was only bound to pay in land. This would be to rescind, in part only, this contract which I have shewn to be one and indivisible.

The view of the case which I have taken, if it be correct, at once settles the whole matter of the attachment remedy, on the ground of Glassell being the debtor to Towles for the value of the Lewis tract. There may, indeed, be sufficient ground of jurisdiction in the fact, that Glassell holds both the Madison and the Mercer tracts, in one of which Towles certainly has an interest; but there is, in my mind, no foundation for regarding him as subject to a money demand, and decreeing against him accordingly.

In the view which I have hitherto taken, I have had no eye to the execution of the deed from Glassell to Towles. It is upon the covenants in that deed, that the plaintiff's claim has been principally rested. Towles has been supposed to have had an immediate right of action upon the covenant of seizin, of which right of action the plaintiff may avail himself, either upon the ground of the attachment law, or of a supposed equitable assignment of that covenant. These views of the rights of Thomas have led to a protracted discussion, in which the construction of the attachment law has been involved. I shall not follow the steps of counsel herein. Ad-

135 mitting that Towles had a right of action, which was *liable to attachment, yet I cannot doubt, that it was competent for Glassell, the garnishee, to defend himself by shewing that whether chargeable or not in a court of law, by the covenants in the deed, he had a good equitable defence, in the fact that the very covenant on which his adversary rested his demand, if, indeed, it was an assurance of the Lewis tract, was founded in a mistake, against which it is the province of a court of equity to relieve, by arresting the demand and compelling Towles, either to accept a conveyance of the Mercer tract, or to rescind the contract in toto. The same answer presents itself, to the idea of the supposed equitable assignment to Thomas, implied by the transfer of the land to him; for the assignee could not resist the equity which would have prevailed against his vendor.

The covenant in the deed from Glassell to Towles, however, having constituted so large a subject of discussion, it may not be improper to examine the deed in which it is found. It seems to have been considered, on one part at least, as a deed for the Lewis tract, and the covenants and warranty as of course protecting the title to that land. I am by no means satisfied, that it is not either void for uncertainty, or a conveyance of the Mercer tract. The deed describes the land thereby conveyed, by reference to Ruby's recent survey, and by the line trees, lines, courses and distances in that plat mentioned, and also as being one half of a 2000 acre survey number 1291, lying on Deer creek, patented to James Mercer on the 14th December 1787. No notice is taken of Deer creek running through the tract. I readily concede, that the lower tract in the plat of 1814, the same tract laid down in Ruby's recent survey, was what the parties intended to convey: but it is equally clear, that they thought it was within the Mercer patent, when in fact it was Lewis's. But a court of law could only look to the deed; and, in a court of law, if ejectment were brought for one half of the Mercer tract, the description of boundaries agreeing in no wise with the real boundaries of that land, would probably be rejected as surplusage. In 136 every deed, *there are various matters of description, some more vital and characteristic than others. As if a man should sell the house he purchased from A. B. situate in F. street, whereas it is really situate in H. street; the fact that the house purchased by him of A. B. was situate in H. street would control the description of the deed as to its being in F. street, and the title would pass. So here, the Mercer tract of 2000 acres lying on Deer creek (for it lies very near to the main stream of the creek, and a branch of that passes through it) patented to James Mercer on the 14th December 1787, is a known, ascertained, well identified tract. Of this tract, so described, 1155 acres are conveyed. Had the deed stopped here, there can be no question that it would have been a sufficient description of the tract to have passed a title to an undivided moiety. Nor do I think the subsequent description would probably be regarded. It would be rejected as surplusage, or proved to be erroneous, by shewing that the boundaries did not coincide with the boundaries of the patent land. Could the court of law permit the party to shew that it was a different tract of land, held under a different patent, that was intended to be conveyed? I doubt it. If, however, this evidence were permitted, then there would be two inconsistent, incongruous and conflicting descriptions, which would probably avoid the deed for uncertainty. In either event, the warranty and covenant of title would be ineffectual to secure the Lewis tract. For, if the deed conveyed the Mercer tract, the warranty applied to that: if it was void for uncertainty, the warranty and covenants were void also.

The aspect in which I have regarded this case, renders unnecessary a consideration of much that has been urged on both sides. The objections to requiring Towles to take the Mercer tract, which have been raised for him, but not by him, are all of them answered by the single remark, that he has his option to do either of two things; to take that tract, or rescind the contract. That he bought to sell again, and that the Mercer tract may not be saleable; 137 that Thomas *insists, as he perhaps is entitled to do, upon a rescission which will call upon Towles to refund the purchase money received, and that Glassell's title to the Mercer tract, is not yet clearly made out; these are considerations, indeed, to be weighed by Towles, in making his option, but, surely, they cannot add to his rights, or detract from Glassell's. The inconvenience to him, cannot lead us to rescind the contract, so far as it is prejudicial to him, and to enforce it, where it may subserve his interests, though ruinous to his adversary.

Some inconvenience is inevitable, where a mistake so vital, and so long undiscovered, has tangled up a transaction. The conveyance to Thomas is the principle source of difficulty. Were he willing to take the Mercer tract at a fair valuation, according to the state of things in 1816, every difficulty would be removed; for the court sees none in the objections that were made to the title of Glassell to the Mercer tract.

The decree pronounced by the court, declared, that there was error in the decree of the court of chancery: that that court ought not to have considered Towles as the creditor of Glassell, and Thomas as entitled to attach in the hands of Glassell, the supposed debt due from him to Towles, the absent defendant: that, an innocent mistake having arisen in the transaction, not more chargeable upon Glassell than upon Towles, the defendant Towles had a right to waive the contract, or to accept the performance of it, as understood by Glassell; and, as Thomas was a purchaser from Towles, of the land which he had purchased from Glassell, Thomas was entitled to select one half of the Mercer tract of 2000 acres, granted to James Mercer by the patent of the 14th December 1787, and to have a conveyance thereof from Glassell, with general warranty and the usual covenants of title; and also to have a decree against Glassell for such sum as the tract so selected might, upon a proper proceeding instituted for that purpose, have 138 been ascertained to be *inferiour in value (if at all) to the Lewis tract on the 31st October 1816, with interest thereon from that date till paid; and upon rendering such decree, no costs should be awarded to either party: and that, in case of the refusal of Thomas to accept such a decree, within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, his bill should have been dismissed with costs, but without prejudice to any suit he might choose to prosecute against Towles. Therefore, the decree was reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded to the court of chancery to be proceeded in according to the principles here declared.

After this decree was announced, the counsel for the appellee reminded the court, that Glassell had not exhibited all the title papers, by which he deduced the title to the Mercer tract from the grantee to himself; and they suggested, that it might turn out, upon further inquiry, that he had really no better title to the Mercer tract than he had to the Lewis tract, in which case, surely, he would owe the absent defendant Towles a debt upon the breach of his covenants, that might well be attached in his hands, to satisfy the debt due from Towles to Thomas; and that provision ought to be made in the decree for this state of things, in case it should occur.

Sed per curiam. No alteration in the decree is necessary. The question of the validity of Glassell's title to the Mercer tract, was not made in the cause. The record presents no reasonable doubt of its validity, even if it had been so made. The vendee contracted for the deed of Glassell with the usual covenants of title; and, although this court will not compel a vendee who has even thus contracted, to take a bad title, or one of questionable character, yet that fact must be properly established, before it can serve as the foundation of a decree. But, in truth, in this case, the court compels neither Towles nor Thomas to take the Mercer tract. Though, in considering the rights and remedies *of 139 Thomas, the rights and remedies of Towles were necessarily a subject of inquiry; yet the court has rendered no decree as between Towles and Glassell, except that, if Thomas chooses to take the Mercer tract, he may do so on the terms prescribed; and that, indeed, incidentally, would put an end to the controversy between Towles and Glassell. The court has only pronounced, that Glassell is liable to a rescission of the intire contract, or to a decree for conveyance of the Mercer tract, and to nothing more; that Thomas in right of Towles, may demand the latter, though Towles only can insist upon the former. Thomas, therefore, may refuse to take the Mercer tract, on account of his doubts about the title, or for any other cause; but if he does refuse, he has no title to any other redress in this suit, and his bill must then be dismissed. It is, however, obvious, that if the deed be made to him, and the title proves defective, a right of action upon the warranty and covenants of title, will at once accrue to him, and in that action the validity of title may fairly be put in issue and decided. It has not been so put in issue in this cause; and the court, therefore, cannot found its decree upon any supposed defect.

140 *Winn v. Bob and Others, Paupers.

[23 Am. Dec. 258.]

Nuncupative Wills—Essentials to Validity.—It is essential to the validity of a nuncupative will, that it should appear, that the deceased, at the time he spoke the alleged testamentary words, had a present intention to make his will, and spoke the words with such intention, and should distinctly indicate that intention by calling upon persons present to take notice or bear testimony that such is his will, or by saying or doing something tantamount in substance, indicating plainly that the words spoken were designed to be testamentary.

Nuncupative Wills—Essentials to Validity.—On this question, the principal case is quoted from in foot-note to Page v. Page. 2 Rob. 424.

Wills—Right of Slaves to Have Will Proved.—Quære.—Whether slaves claiming to be emancipated by will, can properly be allowed to prosecute. In forma pauperis, a suit to have the will proved and recorded in a court of probat. under the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code. ch. 124. § 4, 5.

Nuncupative Wills—Emancipation of Slaves.—Quære.—Whether slaves can be emancipated by nuncupative will, under the provisions of the statute. Id. ch. 111. § 58? And it seems they cannot; per TUCKER, P., and BROOKE, J.

The appellees, Bob and ten others, who had been the slaves of John Andrew Schwartz late of Nottoway county deceased, in his lifetime, preferred their petition to the county court of Nottoway, setting forth, that they had been emancipated by their late owner, by will duly made to that purpose, but no executor was named in the will, and it had not been proved and recorded, nor had any one as yet taken administration of the decedent's estate; and that they were still held in slavery by the testator's next of kin and distributees, or some of them; and praying permission to sue in forma pauperis, to have the will proved and recorded, and thus to recover their freedom, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, 5, p. 481. The county court gave them the permission, and assigned them counsel. And then their counsel offered for probat, a paper containing, as they alleged, the written or the nuncupative will of the decedent, in the following words:

"In the name of God, Amen. I J. A. Schwartz of the county of Nottoway, being in my perfect senses, do make and declare this my last will and testament. 1. My will and desire is, that all my real estate shall be disposed of at public auction, and the proceeds of the same appropriated to the payment of my debts. 2. My will and desire is, that my servants, Bob, Frank, Polly and her children, be emancipated, and entitled to all the privileges of free persons of colour forever, also Bob's wife Letty and her children. 3. It is my will and desire, that one half of the remaining part of my estate be given to Juliana Malvina Winn"——

A. B. Winn, husband of one of the distributees of the deceased, appeared in court and contested the probat.

The county court, upon a full hearing, was of opinion that the paper did not contain the will of the decedent, and refused to record it. The counsel for the paupers took an appeal for them to the circuit court.

At the hearing in the circuit court, the evidence was stated at large and made part of the record. There were four witnesses, whose testimony was not materially variant, and was in substance, this: About three hours before the decedent's death, which happened at his own house, one of the witnesses, Dr. Worsham, his attending physician, suggested to him the propriety of making his will; he said, he could not think it then necessary, as he was so much better; upon which Dr. W. desisted from farther conversation on the subject, until

•Nuncupative Wills—Emancipation of Slaves.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Phoebe v. Boggess, 1 Gratt. 120. See monographic note on "Wills."

Mrs. Winn, the sister of the deceased, came into the room, to whom Dr. W. mentioned what had passed, and she earnestly desired him to renew the subject, saying she had often heard her brother say he intended to make a will, and to liberate some of his slaves. At her instance, Dr. W. repeated the suggestion to the decedent, who again said he thought it unnecessary, but if it was his sister's wish or if it was thought best, he had no objection. There were present in the room, besides Mrs. Winn and Dr. Worsham, the other three witnesses, Pollard, Eanes and Morgan, and the appellees Bob, Frank and Polly. Dr. W. handed Morgan, pen, ink and paper, telling him that Mr. Schwartz wished his will written: Morgan seated himself at a table, in a distant part of the room, some twelve feet from the sick man's bed. Then Dr. W. returned to the bed side, and Schwartz commenced by saying "he wished his real estate to be disposed of, and the proceeds *appropriated to the payment of his just debts." Dr. W. went to

Morgan, and reported this disposition to him, and he committed it to paper. Dr. W. again returned to Schwartz, and he then asked his servant Bob, whether he wished to be freed; Bob said he was very willing to serve him, but he had rather be freed than have another master: Schwartz said "he should be freed." Schwartz then asked Frank, whether he wished to be freed; a conversation ensued similar to that with Bob, which ended in Schwartz's saying "he should be freed." Polly then said to her master "what are you going to do for poor me?" Schwartz said, "Polly and her children should be freed." Bob then asked, "as he had freed him, would he not also free his wife," Letty? Schwartz said, "Letty and her children should be freed." These dispositions being thus declared by Schwartz, Dr. W. went to Morgan, and reported them to him, and he reduced them to writing. Schwartz then said, "he desired that one half of the remainder of his property should be given to his niece Juliana Malvina Winn" (which was in like manner communicated to Morgan, and by him written) "and the other half to his niece Virginia;" upon which Mrs. Winn asked him, if he did not intend to leave her sister Mary something? and his answer was understood to be, that Mary was to share equally with Virginia; but this was said so indistinctly, that it was not communicated to Morgan and written down, and being connected with the gift to Virginia, neither was that, though distinctly uttered, written down. At the time the dispositions which were written down, were uttered by Schwartz, he was perfectly in his senses: as he spoke the last indistinct words, he was taken with a strangling, and it was soon perceived he was dying. He did not desire that Morgan, or any one else, should write his will; he was not expressly told, that Morgan was to write it; it was doubtful, whether he knew that Morgan was engaged in writing it; it was probable he did not know it; it was doubtful, whether he could have seen, and probable he did not see, Morgan *writing at the table, from the bed where he was lying. He did not call upon any person present, to take notice, that the words he spoke were his will.

The circuit court reversed the sentence of the county court, and admitted the contents of the paper to probat and record, as a nuncupative will. And from this sentence, Winn appealed to this court.

In the argument of the cause here, by Spooner and Johnson for the appellant, and by Macfarland and Leigh, assigned by the court counsel for the appellees, three points, made by the counsel for the appellant, were discussed:

1. Whether it was competent to the appellees, being in fact held in slavery, to prosecute such a suit as this in forma pauperis? A suit not to recover their freedom by reason of an emancipation by a will duly recorded, but to have the will under which they claimed freedom, recorded in a court of probat. The question turned upon the construction of the statute concerning pauper suits, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, 5, p. 481, and the statute authorizing the emancipation of slaves, Id. ch. 11, § 53, p. 433.

2. Whether an emancipation of slaves could be made by a nuncupative will? Which depended on the construction of the statute last cited, which provides, that "it shall be lawful for any person, by his or her last will and testament, or by any other instrument in writing, under his or her hand and seal, attested and proved in the county or corporation court, by two witnesses, or acknowledged by the party in the court of the county where he or she resides, to emancipate and set free his or her slaves or any of them" &c.

3. Whether this was a good nuncupative will? The counsel for the appellant referred to the provision of the statute of wills concerning nuncupative wills, Id. ch. 104, § 7, p. 377, which is taken (with some variation not affecting this question) from the english statute 29 Car. 2, ch. 3, § 19. And they said, it was impossible a man 144 could make "a nuncupative will, without intending to do so, and without knowing that he was doing it. Here, if the deceased intended to make any will, and with that intention, uttered the supposed testamentary words, he intended to make a written will, and was prevented from completing his purpose by the approach of death. But the words were not themselves testamentary at all; they were, at the most, only declarations of what would be his dispositions when he should make his will. Weeden v. Bartlett & al., 6 Munf. 123. He did not know, that his words were reported to Morgan, and that he was committing them to writing: he did not know, that Morgan was writing down his words. He did not, and could not, see him at the table. He did not call upon any person present "to take notice or bear testimony that such was his will, or words of the like import;" which the statute expressly required to make a good nuncupative will.

The appellees' counsel cited Mason v. Dunman, 1 Munf. 456, to shew, that notes taken by the bed side of a dying man, may be a good nuncupative will, provided it appeared that the words noted were uttered with a testamentary intent, though it appeared that the testator intended to make a written will, and that he did not call upon persons present "to take notice or bear testimony that such was his will:" any circumstance tantamount to that, would suffice. That the words spoken by Schwartz, were spoken with testamentary intent, appeared from the evidence. He agreed to make his will; and after the preparation for writing it had been made, though he was not expressly told that such preparation was made, he commenced (of his own accord, as they understood the evidence) with the direction for the sale of his land, which was plainly a testamentary disposition. He commenced, likewise, the conversation with Bob and Frank, which ended in the declaration that they should be free. The emancipation, indeed, of Polly and her children was suggested by her, and that of Letty and her children, by her husband: but the gift of one half of the residue of his estate to his niece J. M. Winn, 145 uttered of his own accord, *distinctly evinced, that he was, and had been from the beginning, speaking with a present testamentary intent. They thought it the fair inference from the evidence, that he did know, that Morgan was writing down his dispositions as he uttered them to Dr. Worsham, and that he could and did see Morgan writing.

CARR, J. In this case, three points were made in the argument: 1. Can the petitioners appear as parties in this controversy? 2. Can slaves be emancipated by a nuncupative will? 3. Is this a good nuncupative will? I shall consider this last point only. The doctrine of nuncupative wills, was taken from the civil law, and is of very ancient date. The abuses and frauds, which were practised under it, gave rise to the provision of the statute 29 Car. 2, ch. 3, § 19, from which our act is, with some variations, taken. The intention of the statute was not to give a new principle, but to correct a mischief; and it should be so construed as to advance the remedy. It is said, in a note on Matthews v. Warner, 4 Ves. 196, that the case of Cole v. Mordaunt, before lord chancellor Nottingham, in the 28th year of Charles II. was the principal case which gave rise to the english statute of frauds. That was a case in which nine witnesses swore to a nuncupative will; and yet, on a trial at bar in the court of king's bench, it appeared that most of them were perjured, and Mrs. Cole guilty of subornation. In the case before us, there is not the slightest imputation upon the witnesses; but that must not influence our decision upon the law. The deceased was truly in extremis; for before the business was finished, his mind began to wander; he was taken with a strangling; they found he was dying. He seems to have been indisposed to make a will, if capable: he desired no one to write it; he did not know that Morgan was writing; Morgan sat in a distant part of the room, and did not pretend to take the words from the sick man, but they were reported to him by another; and, if the reporter misunderstood the speaker, or Morgan the *re- 146 porter, the paper would not contain his will. The statute is imperative in requiring that it be proved by two witnesses, "that the testator called on some person present, to take notice or bear testimony that such is his will, or words of the like import." Here we have neither the words, nor any of like import; no expression, indeed, or act of the sick man, to shew that he thought himself making his will; or whether he intended it to be by parol, or in writing; or that he wished any person to bear testimony to what was doing. To establish such a will as this, would, I think, be of the most dangerous tendency. I am clear, then, that the very foundation of the claim of the appellees fails here. It is not necessary, therefore, for the decision of this case, to consider the other points; and, as they are of great importance, and perfectly new, I had rather leave them open for future consideration.

BROOKE, J., and TUCKER, P., said, they concurred in the opinion of Carr, J., that this was not a good nuncupative will. And they intimated, that they thought, slaves could not be emancipated by a nuncupative will, and had intended to give that opinion on that point; but they yielded to the suggestion of Carr, J., that the point should be left open for consideration when it should be necessary to decide it.

147 *Hansbrough's Ex'ors v. Thom.

November, 1831.

Demurrer to Evidence—Setting Out Evidence—Joinder—Admissions on Record.—It is the settled practice in Virginia, on demurrers to evidence, that the demurrant shall set out the whole evidence, and that the court may compel the other party to join in the demurrer, without requiring the demurrant to make a formal admission on the record, of all the inferences of fact which the court may think fairly deducible from the evidence demurred to.

Same—Effect—Inferences.*—By demurring to evidence the demurrant waives all evidence on his own part that conflicts with that of the other party, admits the credit of the evidence demurred to, admits all inferences of fact that may be fairly deduced from the evidence, but only such facts as are fairly deducible, and refers it to the court to deduce the fair inferences from the evidence.

Same—English and Virginia Practice—Compared.—The English practice, and that which prevails in Virginia, in respect to demurrers to evidence, compared.

Slaves—Sale—Evidence of—In detinue for slaves, the question being whether a contract between plaintiff and defendant's testator, was a gift or a sale of the slaves by the latter to the former, the defendant demurs to the plaintiff's evidence:

HELD, the evidence states facts, from which it may fairly be inferred, that the contract was a sale, though there was no express proof of any valuable consideration paid or stipulated, and that therefore it was a sale.

This was an action of detinue, brought in the circuit court of Culpeper, by George I. Thom against James and Peter Hansbrough executors of Peter Hansbrough the elder, late of Culpeper, for slaves. The declaration stated, that the slaves had been delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants' testator in his lifetime, on the 16th September 1822, to be by him re-delivered to the plaintiff when thereto requested, and the failure and refusal of the testator, in his lifetime, and of the defendants, his executors, since his death, to re-deliver them to the plaintiff. The defendants pleaded the general issue.

At the trial, the defendants' counsel, after the argument before the jury had been begun and was nearly concluded, offered a demurrer to the evidence, and the plaintiff's counsel objected that, in that stage of the trial, it was too late to demur; but the court overruled the objection. Then the defendants' counsel demurred to the evidence, and the plaintiff's joined in the demurrer.

148 *It appeared from the demurrer, that the plaintiff adduced four witnesses, Massie, Mallory, Nalle and Willis; whose testimony was, in substance, as follows:

1. Massie testified, that on the third Sunday of September 1822, Peter Hansbrough deceased, called on the witness, and requested him to go with him to the plaintiff Thom's house, saying he had made an arrangement with Thom to let him have some negroes; the number was mentioned, but that the witness did not remember; the witness Mallory was present, and he probably remembered it. That Hansbrough further said, he was going to Thom's house to complete the arrangement; and, at the same time, told the witness, that Thom had purchased a tract of land at an unfortunate time, and (as he, Hansbrough, thought at the time the purchase was made) had given too much for it; that he had already assisted Thom, and intended to do more for him, if necessary; that it gave him pleasure to do so, as Thom had been very kind and attentive to him, and had rendered him services; that he had given Thom 3000 dollars; that he had given him a claim upon one Carneal of Kentucky (but the witness did not understand, that that claim was part of the 3000 dollars, nor did he remember that the amount of the claim was mentioned); that the 3000 dollars he had given Thom, was to enable him to comply with his unfortunate purchase of land, before alluded to, from one Armistead. The witness went with Hansbrough to Thom's house, according to his request, but returned without alighting from his horse.

2. Mallory testified, that, in September 1822, he fell in company with Peter Hansbrough deceased, who, in the course of conversation, informed him, that he was on his way to Fredericksburg, and below. That the witness invited Hansbrough to go home with him, as he lived immediately in his route; which Hansbrough declined, stating as his reason for taking another route, that he had made arrangements with Thom to let him have some slaves, and that there was to be a final close of the 149 arrangement the next *morning; he mentioned the number of slaves, seventeen. That, in the same conversation, Hansbrough said, that he had great confidence in Thom; that Thom appeared from his habits and management likely to do well; that Thom had rendered him considerable services, for which he had fully compensated him; that he had let Thom have some money that was due him in Kentucky, and had more than compensated his services. That, some two or three weeks after this conversation, as Hansbrough was returning home from the lower country, the witness fell in with him again, and he went home with the witness to breakfast; he then told the witness, he should have come to his house the evening before, but for some business he had with Dr. Waugh, relative to the slaves he had let Thom have, as Dr. W. had hired one of them. That Hansbrough's residence was some twelve or fourteen miles from Thom's. That Hansbrough was a man of strong mind, and particular in matters of business; and both he and Thom were well acquainted with the mode and forms of doing business.

3. Nalle testified, that, in the spring of 1822, there having been some motions made in the circuit court of Culpeper against Thom as the surety in some forthcoming bonds, Peter Hansbrough deceased observed to the witness, that he had a great regard for Thom, and wished him to do well; he thought him too liberal in becoming surety: upon which the witness observed to Hansbrough, that if Thom should have the money to pay to any of them, he Hansbrough was so wealthy he would not let him lose it: Hansbrough answered, he would like to aid Thom. That, about a month before Hansbrough's death, in another conversation between him and the witness concerning Thom, Hansbrough said that he had done a good deal for Thom; that Thom had purchased land at an unfortunate time, and that he had aided him in paying for the land. And the witness was induced to believe, from what Hansbrough said in this conversation, though he did not expressly say so, that he intended to pay for the land.

150 *4. Willis testified, that, in September 1822, a day or two before Peter Hansbrough deceased set off on his journey below (to the county of King George) the witness had a conversation with Hansbrough, in which Hansbrough observed he had some women and children that rendered him but little service; that, on his way down he should call at Thom's house, and expected to let him have some of his negroes. That, some time previous to this conversation (it might be two, three, or six months before), Hansbrough told the witness, he intended selling a parcel of his negroes to Thom; that Thom might pass them off to Armistead, for a debt he owed him; and that he Hansbrough could wait with Thom for the purchase money. That Hansbrough lived twelve or fourteen miles from Thom's residence. That when Hansbrough went down the country in September 1822, he was absent from home about two weeks; and he was taken sick about three days after his return home, and died the 15th October 1822. That, in November 1822, Thom shewed the order herein after mentioned to the defendants, and demanded of them the slaves in the declaration claimed, which they refused to deliver to him. That Hansbrough had four children, Peter (the father of Mrs. Thom) James and William Hansbrough, and Amelia the wife of James Bell; and he had had another son, John, who was dead leaving five children. This witness also proved the values of the slaves claimed in the declaration.

5. It was admitted by the parties, that the whole number of the deceased Peter Hansbrough's grand children, was thirty-five; and that he was a very wealthy man, not much in debt; his estate disposed of by his will, was worth from 100,000 to 150,000 dollars.

6. The plaintiff also gave in evidence the order mentioned by Willis; which was in these words: "Mr. John Henderson will shew and deliver to Col. George Thom, the following negroes, viz: Pompey (he has seen), Moses, Harry, Sarah and her three children with her, Patt, (about the house,)

Caroline and her two boys, Sally and 151 her three *children, Linda and her child. And oblige P. Hansbrough. 16th September 1822." And it was admitted by the defendants, that this order and the signature thereto, was in the hand writing of Peter Hansbrough deceased; and that John Henderson, to whom the order was addressed, was at its date, and at Hansbrough's death, his overseer, and had in his custody the slaves in the order mentioned.

The slaves mentioned in the above order, were the slaves claimed in the declaration. And this was all the evidence in the cause.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for the slaves in the declaration claimed, ascertaining the value of them respectively, subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrer to evidence. The court held that the law upon the demurrer was for the plaintiff, and gave him judgment upon the verdict. And the defendants appealed to this court.

Leigh for the appellants, said, that upon the evidence stated in the demurrer, Thom certainly could not sustain his claim to the slaves in question, upon the ground of a gift made to him by Hansbrough. The statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 51, p. 432, annulled every gift of slaves, unless the same be made by deed or will, duly proved and recorded, or unless the subject at some time come into the actual possession of, and remain with, the donee or some person claiming under him. Yet, he had little doubt, the judgment of the circuit court proceeded upon the opinion, that here was proof of a gift of slaves to be delivered at a future day, and that the provision of the statute applied not to gifts of that kind, but only to gifts of slaves which, by the terms of the gift, are to be presently delivered to the donee. But this distinction had been exploded by a decision of this court, of which the circuit court, when it decided this cause, was not apprised. Durham v. Dunkly, 6 Rand. 135. Then, the only question was, whether a sale of these slaves by Hansbrough to Thom, could fairly 152 be *inferred from the evidence set out in the demurrer? For though, upon a demurrer to evidence, the court may and must presume every fact, which the jury might have inferred from the evidence; yet those conclusions of fact must be such as a jury might from a just and reasonable construction, have made, and not arbitrary inferences or such as might be drawn from a part only of the whole evidence; per Roane, J., in Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. 210, 11. The demurrant waives all evidence on his part, that directly or by inference conflicts with the evidence adduced by the other party, and admits all that can reasonably be inferred from his adversary's evidence; per Green, J., in Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 357. Now, he said, the definition of a sale was, a transmutation of property from one man to another, in consideration of some price or recompense in value; for there is no sale without a recompense; there must be a quid pro quo. And though there be a contract to sell goods for a stipulated price, yet if neither the money or some part of it be paid, nor the goods or some portion thereof delivered, nor tender made, nor any subsequent agreement entered into, it is no contract, and the owner may dispose of the goods as he pleases. 2 Black. Comm. 446, 8. In the case at bar, there was no evidence of any price or recompense stipulated to be paid or given by Thom to Hansbrough; not even a pretence of the kind; much less, that any money was actually paid; and it was certain, that there was no delivery of the slaves, or any of them. Bearing these principles in mind, it would not be a reasonable inference from the evidence, it would be a very strained inference indeed, that here was a sale of these slaves by Hansbrough to Thom.

Johnson and Stanard for the appellee, premised, that a party cannot by demurrer to evidence, withdraw a contested question of fact from the jury, and submit it to the court; that would be to abrogate pro tanto, the trial by jury; the demurrant admits every fact which the jury could find 153 from *the evidence; Green v. Judith, 5 Rand. 1. And then, they said, it was apparent, that Thom claimed these slaves, upon the ground of a sale, not a gift, thereof by Hansbrough to him; that was the question of fact contested between the parties; that the point to which Thom's evidence was adduced. And the sale might be fairly inferred from the evidence; or rather nothing but a sale could be inferred from it. Hansbrough, in the first conversation with Willis, told him he intended selling some of his negroes to Thom, and that he could wait with him for the purchase money; and, in the second conversation with that witness, just before the transaction, he told him he intended to let Thom have some of his slaves. He told Massie, he had made an arrangement with Thom, to let him have some negroes, and that he was going to Thom's to complete the arrangement. He told Mallory, he had made arrangements with Thom, to let him have seventeen slaves, and that there was to be a final close of the arrangement the next morning; and afterwards, that he had been to Dr. Waugh's on business relative to the slaves he had let Thom have, as Dr. W. had hired one of them. This language was wholly incompatible with the idea of a gift, and only to be accounted for upon the supposition that a sale was intended and made. The order of the 16th September 1822 sufficed of itself to shew that a sale had been made: Why else was the property to be shewn to Thom? As to the want of evidence of the price to be paid, that was evidence which would naturally be placed in Hansbrough's own hands, and (it might fairly be presumed) was in the hands of the defendants, his executors. And Johnson said, he had laboured in Whittington v. Christian, to induce the court to bring back our practice, in relation to demurrers to evidence, to the true, convenient and just practice of the English courts, that of compelling the demurrant to make a distinct admission upon the record, of the facts which the evidence demurred to conduces to prove: it conformed best with the right of jury trial; it was due to the party

 154 whose evidence was demurred *to; it was safest for the demurrant himself. If the Virginia practice was to be persisted in, he said, the court upon the argument of the law on a demurrer to evidence, must take the demurrant as admitting all that the evidence conduces to prove; otherwise, these demurrers will be only a device to give the trial of questions of fact to the court.

CARR, J. This case comes before us upon a demurrer to evidence. My general view of the practice with respect to such demurrers, has been given in the case of Green v. Judith, to which I refer. In the case before us, the evidence is all on the side of the plaintiff, and we are to say whether it makes such a case as would authorize a jury, by fair inference, to say that the slaves for which this action was brought, are the property of the plaintiff? (Here the judge stated the substance of the evidence, and then proceeded.) In my mind the natural, fair, and, I might say, necessary inference from the evidence is, that Hansbrough sold these slaves to Thom; and the order to the overseer was such a transfer and delivery, as passed the property, and enabled him to maintain detinue for them. That it was a sale, the whole course of the transaction seems to shew: Hansbrough said nothing about giving Thom the slaves: and if it had not been for the relative situation of the parties, and the wealth of Hansbrough, such an idea could never have arisen. He told one witness, that he meant to sell slaves to Thom; and to others he said, he had made or was making arrangements for letting him have slaves &c. What arrangements could be necessary if he meant to give them? Finally, the order itself imports a sale: "you will show and deliver &c." Why shew them, if Thom was a donee merely? That such an order upon a sale is a transfer of the property, was decided by this court in Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, and many cases there cited to shew that it is settled law. I am well satisfied, therefore, that upon this record the plaintiff has a good title to the slaves, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

155 *CABELL, J. I cannot perceive that any inconvenience arises, from the practice in this country, of compelling a joinder in demurrer, without a formal admission on the record, on the part of the demurrant, of all the inferences of fact which the court may conceive to be fairly deducible from the evidence demurred to. On the contrary, I think our practice is better calculated to effect the purposes of justice, than the practice, said to prevail in England, of compelling the demurrant to make the admissions, before the opposite party is compelled to join in the demurrer. It is the court, according to both practices, that is to determine on the inferences which are fairly deducible from the evidence, and the court can, certainly, perform this function much more correctly, on grave consideration, on the final argument of the demurrer, than in the hurry and bustle of a jury trial. Nor is it any objection to a demurrer to evidence, that the evidence is circumstantial, and even complicated; as will clearly appear from the case of Stephens v. White. In the case before us, the evidence, circumstantial in its nature, was all offered by the plaintiff, and was free from contradiction. If the defendant chose to risk a demurrer I can perceive nothing in the case, to deprive him of the right to do so. Sales and gifts need not be positively proved. They may be inferred from circumstances. And the defendants here, in admitting by their demurrer, the truth of all the facts positively proved by the plaintiff's witnesses, necessarily left with the court the right to infer from those facts, whatever the jury might have fairly and reasonably inferred from them.

The real question before us is, whether we are to infer a sale or a gift? It seems to be admitted, that the one or the other may be fairly inferred. And I will here take occasion to say, that a demurrer admits only those things which may be fairly inferred.—I am decidedly of opinion, that the just and fair inference from the testimony, is that Hansbrough sold the slaves to Thom, and that he did not give them.

It is true, that he regarded Thom with 156 eyes of *favour, and that his object was to aid him in paying for the land which he had bought. But a gift was not the only mode by which that object could be accomplished. Aid might be extended by a sale of slaves, which Thom could readily apply towards discharging his debt; the vendor Hansbrough consenting to take a very low price, or even a full price, on long time of payment. It is in express proof that Hansbrough said, two, three, or six months before the transaction took place, that he intended to sell Thom a parcel of his negroes, and wait with him for the purchase money; and that Thom might apply them to the discharge of his debt. And the testimony exhibits him to the last moment, as engaged in negotiations and arrangements, in relation to these negroes, to which he regarded the concurrence of Thom as necessary. All this is intirely consistent with the idea of a sale, but is utterly incompatible with the idea of a loan or gift. The order, therefore, given to Thom for the slaves, proves, when taken in connexion with the other testimony, a sale and not a gift. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. Upon the trial of this cause in the circuit court, the defendants by their counsel tendered a demurrer to evidence, which was joined by the counsel for the plaintiff. He objected, it is true, to the court's permitting the defendants to demur; but this seems to have been because it was allowed after some progress had been made in the cause before the jury; an objection which according to the case of Hoyle v. Young, 1 Wash. 150, was not tenable. It is not distinctly asserted, that he was compelled to join in the demurrer, and may therefore be considered as having voluntarily done so.

Upon this demurrer to evidence, nothing appears but the evidence produced by the plaintiff to support the issue joined on his part; and the case is, therefore, freed 157 from *the embarrassment which has arisen, and may often arise, where a variety of testimony is introduced on both sides, and all inserted in the demurrer, in pursuance of our settled practice in Virginia. But, though the case is disembarassed in this regard, it is not without its difficulties, arising out of the exceedingly remote inferences, which it is proposed to draw from the matters set forth in the demurrer. The discussion has given rise to renewed remarks upon the difference between the english practice and ours, on demurrers to evidence; a subject fully discussed in Green v. Judith, Whittington v. Christian, and other cases. The practice with us is assailed, both as inconvenient, and as trenching upon the unquestioned privileges of the party, to have the facts of his case determined by the jury, instead of their being submitted to the decision of the court. Without meaning to bring these matters into serious discussion, or to compare the relative conveniences of the two modes of proceeding, I shall avail myself of the occasion to make one or two observations.

In the first place, I will remark, that I perceive no essential difference between the english practice and ours, as to the privilege of jury trial. By the former, it is required that the demurrant shall admit every fact, which the evidence of his adversary conduces to prove; Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Black. 207. Who is to decide what facts the evidence thus conduces to prove? Not the jury, assuredly, but the court. Id. 209. So with us: the demurrant being held to admit all that the jury could reasonably infer against him from the evidence, and to waive all his own testimony which contradicts that offered against him, and all objections to the credit of the testimony demurred to, the court no more passes upon the credit or the weight of evidence here, than in the english courts. The only difference is, that in England, according to what is said in the cases, the facts which the evidence conduces to prove, are ascertained by the court at the time of the demurrer, and spread upon the record, and thus distinctly admitted by the demurrant; whereas, in *Virginia, those facts are ascertained by the court at the time of the argument of the demurrer, as fairly inferrible from the testimony of the party, the verity of which his adversary is not permitted to question. Whether the one or the other course is most convenient, seems to be a subject of difference between the most able judges: Compare the opinion of Green, J., in Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 357, with that of Carr, J., in Green v. Judith, 5 Rand. 4. But, I confess that I am upon reflection strongly inclined to think with judge Green, that with the limitations prevailing in our courts, "the party whose evidence is demurred to, has all the benefit of the ancient practice, without subjecting the other party to its inconveniences; and no disputed fact is taken from the jury and referred to the court." There are, it is true, some difficulties, where there is a variety of facts on both sides, the practice in reference to which yet remains to be settled. With those I shall not meddle here.

I remark, next, that, notwithstanding the position that the demurrant must admit upon the record, the facts which the evidence conduces to prove; and notwithstanding the observation of lord chief justice Eyre in Gibson v. Hunter, that the court is to regulate the admissions which are to be made upon the record; yet the demurrer to evidence in that case, set forth, as we do, the evidence at length, and not the facts it was supposed to prove. And though it is true the court decided "that the examination of witnesses had been conducted so loosely, or the demurrer been so irregularly framed, that there was no manner of certainty in the state of facts, upon which judgment could be founded," and moreover declared that the defendant could not compel the plaintiff to join in demurrer, "unless he distinctly admitted upon the record, every fact and every conclusion which the evidence given for the plaintiff conduces to prove;" yet this rule does not appear to have been rigorously followed in other cases, even in England. For, in Cocksedge v. Fanshaw, Doug. 119, long anterior to Gibson v.

Hunter, the demurrer was framed precisely like our own; as *will appear from the note to Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Black. See too, 2 Plow. 1, and Tidd's prac. forms 325. I doubt not, our practice has been taken from that case, decided in the court of king's bench by Mansfield and Buller. Be this as it may, our reports, from Pendleton's time to the present day, bear recorded evidence of the uniformity of the practice in Virginia, of inserting the evidence in the demurrer, putting no admissions upon the record, and leaving the inferences from the evidence, to the court, as is now customary in our tribunals. In all our courts (and there are more than two hundred of them) this is the received practice. It would be pregnant with mischief to attempt to change it judicially. On the faith of the decisions of this court, parties litigant have acted, and are perhaps at this moment acting. It is one of those matters of practice which goes to the very right of the parties, and not to form merely; and he who has rested his case upon a demurrer drawn according to the established practice of our courts, may lose his estate through faith in our adjudications, if we should now unexpectedly alter the course of them.

Lastly, I will observe, before I proceed to pronounce on the particular case before us, that I think the expression, "that the demurrant must admit, or is considered as admitting, every fact which the evidence may conduce to prove," must not be understood too broadly. The language of this court is more appropriate; "that the demurrant must be considered as admitting all that could reasonably be inferred by a jury from the evidence given against him." For evidence may conduce, that is, tend or contribute towards the proof of a fact, which it is very far from establishing, and which could not be fairly inferred from it. Thus, in the present case: the order from Hansbrough to his overseer to shew and deliver the slaves to Thom, is one link, and a very important one, in the chain of proof to establish the fact of a sale by the former to the latter; and, in this sense, it may very truly be said to conduce to prove a sale. But, surely, from that fact alone, no jury or court could be justified 160 *in inferring a sale, which is a transaction complicated of various facts, such as the transfer of the property by the vendor, and the actual delivery of the possession to, and the payment of a consideration by, the vendee.

What then, is the case under consideration? It is a case in which, according to my conception, nothing can be inferred in favour of the plaintiff, except that Hansbrough had made him a present of the slaves from motives of regard. So strong, indeed, is this evidence—evidence too introduced by the plaintiff himself—that I have not the slightest doubt he went for a gift upon the trial of the cause, and that the judgment of the court proceeded upon the sufficiency of the evidence to establish such gift. On no other principle, can we account for his introducing this sort of evidence, instead of that of agreed price. The circuit court was not apprised of the decision in Durham v. Dunkly, 6 Rand. 135, and it is very possible, that very decision has induced the appellee to shift his battery, and go for a sale, as he now finds he cannot sustain his title as a gift. Be this as it may, there is nothing which, to my mind, can justify the inference that there was a sale. A sale implies a contract, for a valuable consideration. The case, as it is presented, affords no foundation, on which to rest even a violent presumption, that there was a consideration paid, contracted to be paid, or contemplated by the parties. Had there been such a consideration, the evidence would lead us very fairly to infer that we should have heard of it, through the witnesses, from the communicative old man. But his design was to aid his grandson, not to traffic with him. He meant to relieve him by paying his debt, not by shifting his burden. The only instance of his speaking of selling the slaves, occurred some months before; while all his recent conversations pointed to an act of benevolence from a rich old man to a favourite kinsman. The whole testimony, indeed, conduces, that is, leads or tends, to prove that a gift was intended and not a sale. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the judgment ought to be reversed. But the opinion of the court is that it be affirmed.

Jackson v. Ligon.

November, 1831.

Wills—Construction*—Case at Bar.—Testator, after making provision for his wife by his will, devises, that after his wife's death or marriage, his land shall be sold, and the money arising from the sale equally divided among all his children: widow renounces the will, and dower is assigned her: Held, ex'or has no power to sell during widow's life and widowhood, or to sell part of the subject.

Specific Performance—Sale of Land—Title—Reference to Commissioner.—Bill in county court, by vendor against vendee, for specific execution of agreement for sale and purchase of land: vendor insisting he has a good title to convey, and vendee that title is defective, and both parties by the pleadings referring the question (which is a question of law on the construction of a will) to the court; and the cause is brought to hearing by consent, neither party asking a reference of the title to a commissioner: Held, in such case, the court ought not to refer the title to a commissioner, nor, if title be defective, to give vendor time to perfect it, but should proceed to decide the question.

Same—Same—Decree Compelling Vendee to Take Defective Title;—Reversal—Case at Bar.—County court, in such case, though the title is, in truth, defective, without reference of the title, decrees specific execution: vendee appeals to superior court of chancery: Held, the chancellor ought to review the decree of the county court, upon the

Wills—Construction.—Under a power given the executor to sell the real estate of his testator after the death or marriage of the testator's widow, who renounced the will and dower as assigned her, such executor has no power to sell the land during her life or widowhood. For this proposition the principal case is cited and followed in Raper v. Sanders, 21 Gratt. 73.

Sale of Land—Title—Reference to Commissioner.—Where the facts are all before the court, and the objection to the title to land purchased is a question of law, it is unnecessary to refer the title to a commissioner. Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 128, citing Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh 161, 180 (see also, note). The principal case is also cited in Hudson v. Max Meadows, L. & I. Co., 97 Va. 347, 33 S. E. Rep. 586.

Same—Specific Performance—Defect in Title.—In Newberry v. French, 98 Va. 484, 36 S. E. Rep. 519, it is said: "It is well settled that a purchaser of land, at a private sale, will not be required to pay his purchase money and take in exchange therefor a defective or even doubtful title, and especially is this true where, as in the case at bar, he has contracted for a good and sufficient deed, which undertaking is not confined to the form of the deed, but includes a good title. Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call 309, 367; Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh 174; Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 82; Hendricks v. Gillespie, 25 Gratt. 181; Clark v. Hutzler, 96 Va. 73, 30 S. E. Rep. 469; and Matney v. Ratliff, 96 Va. 231, 31 S. E. Rep. 512." See also, citing the principal case, Max Meadows, L. & I. Co. v. Brady, 92 Va. 84, 22 S. E. Rep. 845.

And in Creigh v. Boggs, 19 W. Va. 252, citing the principal case, it is said that the rule governing courts of equity and suits for specific performance of a contract for sale of land is, that if the purchaser can get substantially what he contracted for, the agreement will generally be enforced at the suit of the vendor. To the same effect see, citing the principal case, foot-note to McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 340.

Also in Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 450, citing the principal case, it is said, when a purchaser has notice of a defect or encumbrance and requires from the vendor a warranty, the presumption of law is that the covenant was expressly taken against such known defect or encumbrance.

Courts do not sit to overthrow the agreement of actual state of case at time of the decree there; and as the decree was erroneous in compelling vendee to take defective title, to reverse it, and dismiss vendor's bill; and he ought not to open the proceedings, refer the title, give the vendor time to perfect it, and in case he succeeded in doing so, decree specific execution.

Same—Same—Time Made of the Essence of Contract by Acts of Parties—Effect.—In the case of an executory agreement, though the time appointed for performance may not be made (originally, by the terms of contract) of the essence thereof, yet it may be made material by the conduct of parties or circumstances afterwards; and, if so made material, the party in default is not entitled to demand specific execution against the other.

Same—Same—Right of Vendee to Perfect Title.—If, in an agreement for sale and purchase of land, vendee is apprised that vendor's title is defective, and agreement stipulates that vendor shall convey to vendee, a good and lawful right by a given day; at appointed day, vendor insists that his title is perfect, though in truth it is defective, upon which vendee, having received possession under the contract, abandons the possession, and refuses to proceed with the purchase, upon a bill for specific execution, by vendor against vendee, Held, vendee's previous knowledge of defects in the title, is no reason for compelling him to take such title as vendor can convey, that being defective.

Same—Same—Title to Part of Land Defective.—Upon bill for specific execution of agreement for sale and purchase of a tract of 686 acres of land for cultivation, vendor's title to 200 acres of tract is defective; this is separated from the residue by a public road, and all the improvements are on the residue, in which vendor has a perfect title: Held, vendee shall not be compelled to take the residue.

This was a bill exhibited by Ligon against Jackson, in the county court of Prince Edward in chancery, for spe-parties but to carry them into effect where they are legal and equitable and reasonable. Rader v. Neal, 13 W. Va. 388.

Same—Time of Essence of Contract.—It will not be presumed that time was intended to be of the essence of a contract for the sale of land, from the mere fixing of a day for the delivery of the deed or payment of the purchase price. Smith v. Fromitt, 82 Va. 849, 850, citing the principal case. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Barrett v. McAllister, 83 W. Va. 750, 11 S. E. Rep. 294; Hukill v. Guffey, 37 W. Va. 472, 16 S. E. Rep. 530.

In Abbott v. L'Honnmedieu, 10 W. Va. 677 (citing the principal case at page 712) it is held that, ordinarily, time is not considered in courts of equity of the essence of the contract for the sale of realty, and especially as to the payment of purchase money. There may, perhaps, be circumstances or terms employed which will take the case out of the general rule.

Same—Specific Performance—Title to Part of Land Defective.—In Kenner v. Bitely, 45 Fed. Rep. 134, citing the principal case, it was held that where the deficiency between the actual survey of the land and the amount as described in the agreement was so very great that a conveyance could not be a substantial compliance with the contract and a court of equity cannot decree specific performance pro tanto.

A vendor, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, is bound to make a good title free from encumbrance of every description which may embarrass the full and quiet enjoyment of the premises by the purchaser. McAllister v. Harman (Va.), 42 S. E. Rep. 922, citing Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call 308, Fed. Cas. No. 5,245; Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh 161; Hendricks v. Gillespie, 25 Gratt. 193, 194; 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 876.

In Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 238, it is said: "Where the contract made between the parties compels the vendor to convey the land with covenant of general warranty, and to put the party in possession of the land, a court of equity will protect the vendee against a defect of title to any part of the land included in the contract, although that defect was known to the purchaser, when the contract was made, unless there has been a waiver by the purchaser of such objection to the title. Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh 161. The parties must be bound by the contract they made, if it was free from fraud and mistake." See monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243.

See the principal case cited in Fidelity Ins., etc., Co. v. Shenandoah Val. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 265, 9 S. E. Rep. 187.

162 cific *execution of articles of agreement between the parties, executed the 12th November 1822, whereby Ligon covenanted to sell to Jackson, a tract of land in that county, containing by estimation 686 acres, but the quantity was to be ascertained by actual survey: for which Jackson covenanted to pay Ligon 15 dollars per acre, in four equal instalments, the first on the 1st January 1823, the second on the 1st May 1824, the third on the 1st September 1825, and the last on the 1st January 1827, and to give bond, with good and sufficient surety, for the payment of each of the instalments. And Ligon covenanted to give Jackson full and complete possession on the 25th December 1822, and meantime to allow him the privilege of preparing or using the land for crops, so that he should not interfere with Ligon's crop of tobacco then in the tobacco houses, or with any other property of Ligon then on the land. And Ligon bound himself to make Jackson a good and lawful right to the land, on or before the 1st January 1823, at which time the first payment was to be made.

In the interval between the date of the articles and the 25th December following, Jackson sowed a crop of wheat on the land, and full possession was given him on the 25th December 1822, according to the covenant. The parties met on the 1st January 1823, for the purpose of executing the articles; when Jackson requested that the business should be postponed for a few days, alleging (according to the account given by one witness) as his only reason for the request, that, as he had not been apprised of the exact quantity of the land, he was not then prepared with his bonds with surety for the deferred payments, but (according to two other witnesses) he suggested also, the same doubt about the title, which he afterwards specially objected, and which he then said it was necessary to examine; and, as those doubts arose out of the provisions of Owen Haskins's will, under which part of the land was claimed, he required Ligon to produce the will. Ligon assented to the postponement; and the 163 *the parties agreed to meet again on the saturday following. They both attended at the day and place appointed; Jackson prepared to make the first payment, and to give his bonds with surety for the deferred payments, and tendering them, if Ligon should make him a good and clear title; and Ligon prepared with a deed duly executed by him, conveying the land to Jackson in fee, with several warranty. Ligon tendered this deed to Jackson, and he shewed him the will of Owen Haskins under whose executor he claimed a large portion of the land, but Jackson refused to accept Ligon's deed, alleging specific objections to Ligon's title to that portion of the land claimed under Haskins's executor, requiring that the title should be cleared of those objections, and declaring that unless the defects or doubts of the title were removed, he would not proceed with the purchase. Ligon denied that there was any defect in the title, and insisted, that his deed with warranty was a full and just execution of the articles on his part, and that nothing more could be required of him. Upon this, the parties separated, without executing the contract. And, a few weeks afterwards, Jackson abandoned the land, and the contract.

In January 1824, Ligon exhibited his bill in the county court in chancery, wherein, after setting forth the articles of agreement, and Jackson's refusal to proceed with the purchase, he proceeded to state his title to the land: that the whole tract was found, by survey, to contain 698 acres; 489 acres of which, he held under a conveyance from his father, and as to that the title was indisputable; and as to the residue of the tract, 209 acres, he claimed two thirds thereof under a sale and conveyance with general warranty, made to him by Thomas Haskins, executor of Owen Haskins, in virtue of a power to sell vested in him by his testator's will; and the other third thereof he claimed under a contract made between him and Albert Haskins, one of the devisees of the testator Owen Haskins, who was entitled to this third; to which contract, he said, Thomas Haskins, the executor, had given his assent, and 164 which *Ligon had completely executed on his part, but Albert, though of full age, had died without making him a conveyance. He exhibited Owen Haskins's will, and the conveyance made to him by Thomas Haskins the executor, but he did not exhibit the contract between him and Albert Haskins. He then alleged, that, at the time of the contract between him and Jackson, Jackson was exactly informed of the state of the title; that the title was, in fact, such a good and lawful title, that Jackson could never be disturbed in the enjoyment of the subject; that his conveyance with general warranty, tendered to Jackson in January 1823 (which he also exhibited) was such a good and lawful right to the land, as he was bound to make, and Jackson bound to accept, by the articles of the 12th November 1822, and that he was not bound to do any thing more on his part, to entitle himself to demand performance of the contract on Jackson's part. And he prayed a decree for specific execution.

Jackson, in his answer, admitted that Ligon's title to the 489 acres, which he claimed under the conveyance from his father, was perfect; but as to the 209 acres, whereof Ligon claimed two thirds under the sale and conveyance of the executor of Owen Haskins, and the other third under the contract between him and Albert Haskins, he objected, that the executor had no authority under his testator's will, to make such sale and conveyance, so that Ligon had no title whatever to the two thirds he claimed under him; and that, as to the other third thereof, which he claimed under Albert, he had, by his own shewing, only an equitable title. He acknowledged, that he was present at the sale made by the executor, which was a public one, and was apprised that the executor professed to make the sale in execution of a power vested in him by his testator's will; and his confidence in the executor's judgment was such that he did not doubt he had the power; but he never was informed of the actual provisions of the will, until after his contract with Ligon was made. He said, that he expressly stipulated *that Ligon should make him a good and lawful right on the day appointed; and relying on that covenant, he took possession of the land, as stated in the bill, and prepared himself to execute the contract on his part, in good faith; but, finding that Ligon had no good title to so large a portion of the land, and yet refused to take any steps to perfect the title, insisted that his title was already perfect, and that his own conveyance with warranty, was a full compliance with his covenant to make a good and lawful right to the land, and declared he would do nothing more, he, therefore, immediately declined to complete the purchase and abandoned the contract, and as promptly as he could abandoned also the possession of the land. He referred to the terms of the covenant, whereby Ligon bound himself to make him a good and lawful right to the land on or before 1st January 1823, when the first payment was to be made by him; and insisted, that Ligon was absolutely bound to perfect the title in himself, and to convey a clear title to him, at or before the time appointed, and that his failure to do so absolved him, the purchaser, from all obligation to complete the purchase.

The controversy, then, turned upon the state of the title of the 209 acres.

This was parcel of a tract of 438 acres, whereof Owen Haskins died seized in fee in January 1808, having by his last will and testament devised and bequeathed as follows: "It is my will and desire, that all my just debts shall be paid by my executor; and that the following slaves (naming three men) shall be sold on twelve months credit, and the money arising from the sale thereof shall be laid out in young female slaves, for the benefit of my wife and children. It is my will &c. that all the money due me, after my debts are paid, shall be laid out by my executor in any manner he may think best for the benefit of my wife and children. It is my will &c. that my estate shall be kept together for the support of my wife and children, and as my children come of age or marry, they shall receive their proportionable *part of my personal estate, reserving one third part for the support of my wife, and at her death or marriage to be equally divided among all my children, to them and their heirs forever. It is my will &c. that my executor shall be at liberty to put such improvements on my land, as he in his discretion shall think proper, for the accommodation of my wife and children, and shall be at liberty to buy stock of any kind, and exchange or barter it, in any manner he may think best. It is my will &c. that, after my wife's death or marriage, my land shall be sold, and the money arising from the sale be equally divided among all my children." And the testator appointed Thomas Haskins his executor, who took upon himself the executorship.

The testator's widow renounced the provision made for her by the will, real and personal, and claimed her dower of the real, and thirds of the personal, estate of her deceased husband.

The testator left at his death, six children, all infants; Mary, Catharine, Albert, Edward, Henry and Francis. Mary and Catharine died infants, unmarried and intestate, their mother and four brothers them surviving.

Albert attained to full age; and exhibited his bill in the county court of Prince Edward, against the widow and the executor of his father, and his three brothers, who were still infants; setting forth his father's will, and the widow's renunciation of the provisions thereby made for her; and praying, that the widow's dower of the testator's lands might first be assigned her, and then partition made thereof among himself and his three infant brothers. To this bill, the widow and executor filed their answers, and an answer was put in for the infant defendants by a next friend; no guardian ad litem was assigned them. The court made an interlocutory decree, appointing commissioners to assign the widow her dower, and to make partition among the four brothers. At this stage of that proceeding, Albert, the plaintiff therein, died without issue and intestate. And then Ligon

(Jackson's vendor) exhibited his bill, 167 in the same *court, against the same parties defendants, referring to Albert Haskins's bill, and the proceedings thereupon; stating Albert's death; alleging that Albert, before his death, had transferred his whole interest in his father's land to him, as well what he derived from his father, as what he derived from his two deceased sisters, Mary and Catharine; that these having derived their shares of the land from their father, and died in infancy, their shares descended to their four brothers, to the exclusion of their mother; that, therefore, Albert, and Ligon claiming under him, was entitled to one fourth of the land, subject to the widow's dower; praying, that he might be substituted in Albert's place, and that the widow's dower might be assigned her, and partition made between him and the three infant brothers of Albert. To this bill also the widow and executor of the testator Owen Haskins, and the three infant defendants, Edward, Henry and Francis Haskins, not by guardian, but by next friend, put in an answer, admitting the allegations of the bill, and assenting to the decree therein prayed for. Upon the strength of this admission in the answer, without any proof whatever of the alleged transfer by Albert of his share to Ligon, the county court at July term 1822, made an interlocutory decree, appointing commissioners to assign the widow her dower, and to make partition among the other parties according to the prayer of the bill. In October 1822, the commissioners, in pursuance of this decree, assigned 146 acres of the testator Owen Haskins's land to the widow for her dower, and allotted 86 acres to Edward Haskins in severalty, and the residue, 209 acres, to Henry and Francis Haskins, and Ligon claiming Albert's share, jointly. The commissioners having made a report of this division of the land, the court, at July term 1823, made a final decree, confirming the report and establishing the division, and directing the same commissioners to convey Albert's one undivided third of the 209 acres to Ligon, without giving the infant parties any day, after their attainment to full age, to shew cause against the decree.

168 *And this was the precise state of Ligon's title to Albert Haskins's third of this parcel of 209 acres of land, at the time this suit of Ligon against Jackson was heard in the county court, and of the decree of that court in the same. The commissioners appointed to convey it to Ligon, had made no such conveyance.

As to the other undivided two thirds of the 209 acres, which belonged to Henry and Francis Haskins, which Ligon claimed under the sale and conveyance of Owen Haskins's executor, it appeared, that the executor made the sale and conveyance thereof to Ligon in October 1822, while Henry and James Haskins were still infants, in virtue of the provision contained in his testator's will, which directed that, "after his wife's death or marriage, his land should be sold, and the money arising from the sale be equally divided among all his children," notwithstanding the testator's widow was still living, and still remained unmarried. And she was still living, in widowhood, at the time of the hearing of Ligon's suit against Jackson, and of the decree of the county court therein. So that the sufficiency of Ligon's title to these two thirds of the 209 acres, depended on the question, whether the testator Owen Haskins's will gave his executor power to sell his lands, after his widow had renounced the provision made for her by the will, but before her death or marriage.

The evidence as to the precise time when Jackson abandoned the possession of the land, was vague. A witness examined for Ligon, deposed, that Jackson, after sowing a crop of wheat, received full possession on the 24th December 1822, and that he abandoned the possession within a few weeks afterwards.

It was doubtful also, upon the proofs in the cause, whether or no Jackson was apprised of or suspected the defects in the title, at the time of his contract with Ligon. It was proved, that the sale by the executor of Haskins, was made at public auction, in October 1822; that the executor stated publicly, that he was selling as 169 executor under his testator's will, for the benefit of his two infant children Henry and Francis, and that he would give a deed with a special warranty, and his own bond with surety, that the title should be made good, when the infants attained to full age, and that Jackson was present, and the witnesses supposed must have heard this; he was a bidder at the sale. On the other hand, it was proved, that, at the time of the treaty and contract between Jackson and Ligon, Jackson told Ligon he knew nothing about the title, and told the person who wrote the articles, to write such a contract as would bind Ligon to convey him a good title, and bind him to pay the purchase money. The deed of Haskins's executor to Ligon contained a covenant of general warranty; but no bond with surety, that the title should be made good when the infant owners attained to full age, was given by or demanded of him.

The cause was pending in the county court, from January 1823 till July term 1826, when it was brought on for hearing by consent of the parties, upon the state of the case as above detailed, neither party asking or proposing a reference of the title. The county court decreed a specific execution of the articles; that Jackson should accept Ligon's deed with general warranty for the whole tract of 698 acres, which had been tendered to him in January 1823, and pay the purchase money according to the articles.

From this decree Jackson appealed to the superiour court of chancery of Richmond. And before the cause was heard in that court, viz. in November 1827, Ligon filed the following deeds:

1. A deed, dated the 9th February 1826, executed by Henry Haskins (now of full age) to Ligon, releasing and confirming to him all his right in the land sold him by his father's executor.

2. A deed, dated the 26th December 1826, executed by the commissioners appointed by the decree of the county court, of July 1823, in Ligon's suit against the widow, executor and infant sons of the testator Owen Haskins, in pursuance *of 170 that decree, conveying to Ligon, Albert's third of the 209 acres of land; and along with this deed, Albert's covenant to sell Ligon this property, and the receipt of Albert's administrator for the purchase money.

3. A deed, dated the 19th December 1826, purporting to be executed by Catharine Haskins, the widow of the testator Owen Haskins and mother of all his children, and all the persons who could possibly have any interest, as heirs of that testator, or of his children, or any of them,—reciting the sales made to Ligon by Albert Haskins, and by the executor of Owen Haskins, that the testator's sons Edward and Henry attained to full age and then died, having both by their wills devised their whole estates to their mother Catharine, and that his daughters, Mary and Catharine, and his son Francis, died infants,—and conveying, releasing and confirming, to Ligon, all the right, title and interest, of the grantors in the 209 acres of land.

The cause was not heard in the court of chancery, till June term 1828, when the chancellor, without affirming or reversing the decree of the county court, referred Ligon's title to a commissioner, with directions to report the state of it, and whether Ligon had made, or could make, a clear title to the whole, or any part, of the land; if only part, what part; if his title was defective as to any part, whether that was essential to the beneficial enjoyment of the part of which he had conveyed or could convey a good title; and if he had a good title to the whole to convey, at what time he acquired the title.

The commissioner reported, that Ligon's title to the 489 acres he derived from his father, was perfect, and never had been doubted; and, as to the 209 acres, he referred to the three deeds filed since the cause had been pending in the court of chancery, and reported, that they conveyed, released and confirmed, to Ligon, a perfect title in this parcel of the land, except as to about one seventh of Francis Haskins's one third thereof, which, it seemed to the commissioner probable, though not certain, belonged to three persons, who 171 *were entitled to shares as his heirs at law, and who had not joined in the general deed of the 19th December 1826. And he reported, that the parcel of 209 acres, was separated by a public road from the 489 acres, and all the buildings on the whole tract were upon the latter parcel: that, upon the question whether the former was essential to the beneficial enjoyment of the latter part, the affidavits of many persons had been laid before him (which he returned with the report) and these were very variant and conflicting: that his own opinion was, that, though the parcel of 209 acres was a convenient appendage to, it was not essential to the beneficial enjoyment of, the 489 acres.

The chancellor, upon the final hearing, in April 1830, was of opinion, that at the time of the decree of the county court, Ligon's title was defective, and that court erred in decreeing specific execution without having first referred the title to a commissioner, to be examined and stated; and, therefore, he reversed that decree with costs. But he was also of opinion, that Ligon's title was now perfect, and that if the county court had perceived the defect of the title when the cause was heard there, and had proceeded regularly, and made a reference of the title, Ligon could have perfected the title there, as he had done here; and, therefore, proceeding to make such decree as the county court ought to have pronounced, if it had proceeded regularly, and the same results that now appeared had appeared there, he decreed a specific execution; adjudging that Jackson should pay the whole purchase money with interest; and, in case of his failure to pay it within four months, ordering a sale of the land to be made by the marshal, and the proceeds to be brought into court to be applied by future order to the satisfaction of the debt. From this decree Jackson appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Johnson and Leigh, for the appellant, and by the attorney general, Taylor and Stanard, for the appellee. There were five points made and discussed at the bar.

172 *1. Whether the time appointed by the articles of November 1822, for the conveyance by the vendor to the vendee of a good and lawful right to the land, was of the essence of the contract? or was made material by the circumstances of the transaction, and the conduct of the parties? For if it was, and if the vendor had not then a clear and perfect title, no matter whether or at what time he afterwards got the title in, he was not entitled to specific execution.

The appellant's counsel thought, that, in the case of a purchase of land in this country for cultivation, where the purchaser covenants to pay the purchase money in several and distant instalments, and stipulates that a good title shall be assured to him at an early day before he shall part with any of the purchase money, the time, in general, was highly material, and ought to be regarded as of the essence of the contract: that, in such a case, while the credit enhanced the price of the subject, the purchaser always reckoned on the profits, to be derived from his own labour and capital applied to the cultivation of the land, as a fund to aid him in making the deferred payments; but, unless he should be assured of the title at the time stipulated, he could neither safely make any improvements, nor certainly know whether the profits would be his own to dispose of; for if evicted, he would have to account to the true owner for the profits, while the owner would not be bound to make him any compensation for his improvements, nor would he be entitled to recover, on the usual covenants for assurance of title, the value of the improvements from the vendor: that, thus, the failure of the vendor to make a perfect title at the time stipulated, disappointed the purchaser, in very material respects, of the benefit of his purchase: therefore, that the case of such a purchase here, was different from the common case of purchase of lands in England—lands already improved to the utmost and yielding a certain rent; it was, in principle, like the case of a purchase of a house for a residence, and other cases 173 *specific view, in which the time appointed for the conveyance of a clear title is regarded as of the essence of the contract, on the ground that the failure of the vendor to perfect the title, defeats the purpose of the purchase. But, however this might be in the general case, they said the circumstances of this particular case, and the conduct of the parties, made the time appointed for the performance of the vendor's covenant to convey, unquestionably material. The vendee expressly stipulated, that the vendor should make him a good and lawful right on the 1st January 1823, when the first payment was to be made; the time was extended to the Saturday following, by mutual consent; the vendor then tendered his own deed with warranty, and upon the vendee making specific objections to the title, he insisted that the title was good, and neither offered to take measures to perfect it, nor in fact took any: he left the vendee no alternative but to take a title, doubtful at least if not plainly defective, or to decline to proceed with the purchase. The vendee did immediately decline to proceed, and shortly after abandoned the possession; yet the vendor acquiesced for a year without insisting on the contract; for his suit was not brought till January 1824. They cited the opinion of C. J. Marshall in Garnett v. Macon,* p. 15, 53, 4; Lloyd v. Collett, 4 Bro. C. C. 469, 4 Ves. 689, in notis; Harrington v. Wheeler, 4 Ves. 686; Guest v. Homfray, 5 Ves. 818.

The appellee's counsel said the case of Garnett v. Macon alone sufficed to refute the suggestion, that there was a peculiarity, in respect of the question whether time was of the essence of the contract, in a sale of lands in this country for cultivation; that case was like this, and though it was held that a change of circumstances rendered the time material, yet time was not held to be of the essence of the contract. Time may indeed, be made essential, but only 174 by plain agreement to that effect; Sugd. Law Vend. ch. 8, § 2, p. 284-292; Append. No. VI, p. 6. But, so far from there being any thing of that kind in this contract, the provision, that partial possession should be immediately permitted to the vendee, and full possession given to him, before the time appointed for the conveyance of the title, shewed, conclusively, that time was neither of the essence of the contract, nor originally deemed by the parties at all material. And the vendee held the possession till after the time for the conveyance of the title had passed by; and that was a waiver of all objections founded on the failure of the vendor to make a good title at the precise time appointed. Therefore, they said, this case was to be added to the numerous cases, in which a vendor has been held entitled to specific execution, if he can make the title at the time of the decree. They cited Sugd. ch. 8, § 2, p. 282, 3, where the cases are collected; and they referred, particularly, to Langford v. Pitt, 2 P. Wms. 630; Wynn v. Morgan, 7 Ves. 202; Coffin v. Cooper, 14 Ves. 205; Levy v. Lindo, 3 Meriv. 80; Boehm v. Wood, 1 Jac. & Walk. 419; Hepburn v. Auld, 5 Cranch, 262, 275; Hepburn v. Dunlop, 1 Wheat. 179; Brazier v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 528, 533.

*This was a case decided in the circuit court of the U. States for the district of Virginia. It was reported and published in a pamphlet form by Collins & Co. Richmond.—Note in Original Edition.

II. Whether, in fact, Jackson had knowledge of the alleged defects of the title, at the time the contract was made? and supposing he had, what influence that circumstance would have on the construction of the contract? and how far such notice, coupled with the fact of possession taken by him, would bind him to proceed with the purchase, notwithstanding the defects of the title?

As to the point of fact, both parties appealed to the evidence. Supposing Jackson had full knowledge of the defects of the title, the appellant's counsel said, it could not bind him to take a bad or doubtful title; and it rather served to account for and explain the stipulation he insisted upon, that a good and lawful right should 175 be made to him at the *precise day when he was to make the first payment. The appellee's counsel said, it was apparent, that if Jackson was apprised of the defects of the title, he must have known that they could not be removed at so early a day; and they cited Sugd. ch. 8, § 2, p. 286, 7; Pincke v. Curteis, 4 Bro. C. C. 329; Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265; Syme v. Johnston, 3 Call, 558.

III. The appellant's counsel insisted, that it was quite clear, that, at the date of the articles, at the date appointed for the conveyance of the title, and at the date of the decree of the county court, Ligon, the vendor, had no title to 209 acres of land. As to the third of that parcel, he claimed only an equitable title, and that upon the strength of a decree palpably erroneous, and subject to be set aside by the infant parties whenever they attained to full age. And as to the other two thirds, claimed under the executor of Owen Haskins, they said, the will of that testator gave the executor a mere naked power to sell, after the death or marriage of the wife, and gave all the children an interest in the profits till one of those events should happen, and gave them unequal interests. The wife's renunciation of the provisions made for her by the will, entitled her to dower, but only disturbed the testator's disposition of his property pro tanto. The power to sell could never arise so long as the wife was living and remaining in widowhood.

The counsel for the appellee said, that, when the wife renounced the provision made for her by the will, the reason that induced the testator to postpone the sale till her death or marriage, ceased; but the purpose for which he authorized the sale remained, and that purpose required the sale to be presently made. This was not a naked power, but a power coupled with an interest, or (which is the same thing) with a trust. Osgood v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 20, 21, 14 Johns. Rep. 553, 4 S. C. Such powers ought to be expounded liberally, so as to accomplish the intention and purpose for which they are given. Jackson v. Veeder, 11 Johns. Rep. 169; Roberts v. Stanton, 2 Munf. 176 129. *A power to sell after the death of a tenant for life, may be executed during the life. Harg. Co. Litt. 113a, note 2; Sugd. on Powers, 272; Uvedale v. Uvedale, 3 Atk. 117; Sutherland v. Northmore, 1 Dick. 56.

IV. And then, the question was—supposing this a case, in which the vendor was entitled to specific execution, if he could make a good title at the time of the decree, and supposing the decree of the county court erroneous, because he was then unable to convey such a title—what ought the court of chancery to have done, on the first hearing of the cause there, upon the appeal from the decree of the county court? Ought it to have reversed that decree, merely because the county court had not referred the title to a commissioner, and then to have retained the cause, referred the title, and made its final decree upon the commissioner's report shewing the title perfected since the decree of the county court? or, to have reversed that decree in omnibus, and dismissed the bill?

The counsel for the appellant maintained, that the latter was the only decree that could properly be made. They said, the doctrine that a vendor is entitled to specific execution, if he enable himself to convey a perfect title at the time of the decree, must have relation to the time of the decree of the court to which he resorts for relief, not to the time of a final decree in an appellate court, to which the cause may eventually be carried, by appeal from a decree which he himself has asked and obtained. The error of the county court consisted simply in decreeing specific execution when the plaintiff was no wise entitled to it, and when the defendant was entitled to a dismissal of the bill. There was no error, not the least irregularity, in the omission to refer the title to a commissioner: 1. because the cause was brought to hearing by consent, and neither party asked a reference of the title. 2. Because the plaintiff, without having taken, without offering to take, any steps to perfect the title, or pretending that he could or would make a better title, relied upon the title he 177 already had as a good one, *such as the defendant was bound to take; which the defendant denied; and both parties joined in submitting the dry question to the court, as to the sufficiency of the title in the then actual state of it. Rose v. Calland, 5 Ves. 186; Omerod v. Hardman, Id. 722. 3. Because there was no certainty, that the title could be perfected in any reasonable time: that depended on the infant owners living to attain to full age, and then confirming the title, or, if they should die in infancy, leaving no infant heirs entitled to share the inheritance (a very uncommon case under our system of descents) but only heirs of full age, competent and willing to confirm the title. Nothing could exceed the hardship of keeping the purchaser in such suspense. In this respect, the case was like Mackreth's part of the case of Whittaker v. Whittaker, 4 Bro. C. C. 31.

The appellee's counsel contended, that wherever a case is made by the pleadings, in which a vendor will be entitled to specific execution of the contract of sale, if he shall be able to make the title at the time of the decree, it is the duty of the court to refer the title to a commissioner, in order to ascertain whether the vendor can make a good title, or has the means of compelling others to do it, and to give him the opportunity to perfect the title, unless such reference be waived, unequivocally and without fraud or surprise; Jenkins v. Hiles, 6 Ves. 646. And this, though the questions upon the title, are mere questions of law; Marlow v. Smith, 2 P. Wms. 198; Cooper v. Denne, 1 Ves. Jr. 565; Abel v. Heathcote, 2 Ves. Jr. 98; 4 Bro. C. C. 278; Roake v. Kidd, 5 Ves. 647. As to the question, whether an appellate court may direct a reference of the title, when the inferior court has improperly neglected to do so, they said the case of Omerod v. Hardman, cited for the appellant for another purpose, was decisive on this point; for there, though it was not thought proper to refer the title, yet the question as to the reference was entertained in an appellate court.

And this court upon an appeal from 178 a decree of the *court of chancery, has directed a reference of the title; Beverley v. Lawson, 3 Munf. 317.

V. The last point was, whether admitting that the plaintiff was not entitled to specific execution of the contract as to the 209 acres, he was entitled to specific execution as to the other parcel of 489, as to which it was agreed on all hands he had, from the beginning, an undoubted title? The authorities cited upon this point were, Sugd. Law Vend. ch. 6, p. 209-214, and the cases there cited, particularly Poole v. Shergold, 2 Bro. C. C. 118; Thompson v. Jackson, 3 Rand. 508.

CARR, J. This is a bill by a vendor against the vendee, for the specific execution of a contract for the sale of a tract of land. The county court decreed a performance: On appeal to the superiour court, the chancellor, without acting upon the decree, referred the title to a commissioner; upon whose report and other evidence taken in that court, the chancellor on a final hearing reversed the decree, as having been entered prematurely, and then decreed a specific execution.

Was the decree of the county court right? It is a principle laid down in many cases in equity, that an unwilling purchaser shall not be compelled to take a title with a cloud upon it; and that principle is assuredly strengthened here, where the party has contracted for a good and lawful right. What was the state of the title at the time of sale? The tract consisted of 698 acres; to 489 acres of which, the vendor had an unquestioned title. To the residue, 209 acres, his title was of a different character: he held two thirds of it, by a deed from the executor of Owen Haskins, who had sold it under the will of his testator; and the other third, by a purchase from Albert Haskins, a son of the testator, of his undivided third part, but for this part he had no conveyance. The validity of his title to the part purchased from the executor, depended on the question, whether the executor had power under the will to 179 sell when he did? *The words of the will are—"It is my will and desire, that after my wife's death or marriage, my land shall be sold, and the money arising from the sale be equally divided among all my children." The testator had in a former part of the will, directed that his estate should be kept together for the support of his wife and children. The wife renounced the will, but was neither dead, nor married; and the children whose shares of the 209 acres the executor sold, were infants. It seems to me too clear for discussion, that the sale of the executor, under these circumstances, was not authorized by the will. Call it a naked power, or a power blended with a trust; construe it strictly or liberally; still you cannot make it a power to sell the land, while the wife was living and unmarried. The title, then, to these two thirds was clearly defective. The title to Albert's part was equally so: it was at best, nothing but an equity.

But it was insisted, that the vendee, at the time of his purchase, was well acquainted with the nature of the plaintiff's title, and therefore is bound to take such as he can make. I do not consider the fact of his knowledge sufficiently established: he denies it in his answer; and we hear him calling for a sight of the will, when the deed was tendered to him. However, suppose him to have had this knowledge, I do not think it would oblige him to take a defective title, even on a sale at auction; it might induce the court to give the vendor time to perfect the title; but, surely, the court would not oblige him to take a defective title, in the teeth of his covenant, by which he stipulated to get, and the vendor bound himself to give, a good and sufficient right, at a short day.

It was contended, that admitting the title to the 209 acres, to be defective, there are still 489 acres, about the title of which there is no dispute, and that the court ought to have executed the contract thus far: and much evidence, pro and con, was taken, as to the importance of these 209 acres to the enjoyment of the tract of land purchased. There are 180 *many cases that say, a trifling deficiency of a few acres in a tract of land, possessing no peculiar value in relation to the general tract, will not prevent the specific execution of a contract, as such deficiency lies in compensation (10 Ves. 306, 14 Ves. 413,) and this is interfering sufficiently with men's contracts. I have never seen, and I hope never shall see, a case going so far as is asked here. A man buys a farm of a certain size for cultivation; you deprive him of nearly a third, and insist that he shall take the residue, as a substantial compliance with the contract. This would be truly to make contracts, and not to execute those already made.

At the time, then, of the hearing before the county court, I am clearly of opinion, that the plaintiff had not made out such a case as authorized a decree for specific execution. Ought that court to have dismissed his bill, or to have referred the title to a commissioner, and given further time for perfecting the title? As to further time, no such thing was asked or thought of; no imperfection in his title was admitted by the plaintiff; on the contrary, he insisted by his bill, that his title was perfect, and that the deed which he had tendered, and which he exhibited with his bill and made part of it, was a full compliance with his contract. This was the issue made up by the parties, and submitted to the court; and to try this, they went to hearing by consent. Further time then for improving the title, was wholly out of the question. Ought the court to have sent the case to a commissioner for his report upon the title, before it proceeded to decide upon it? I think clearly not. The whole depended upon a dry point of law, which the court had as directly before it upon the pleadings and the evidence, as it ever could have it. To have sent the case then to a commissioner would have been to incur a vain and useless expense and delay; and that, when neither party wished it, but both were anxious for an immediate decision of the case in its actual posture. Even in England, where 181 their commissioners are men of learning and professional skill, a *reference would not have been ordered in such a case. This is clear from the cases cited at the bar, of Rose v. Calland and Omerod v. Hardman, where a reference was pressed and refused by the chancellor, —in the first case, saying, "he should create a needless expense by it"—and by Chambre justice, and baron Graham, in the last case, (sitting in the duchy court of Lancaster,) upon the same ground. I conclude, then, that the county court, on the hearing, ought neither to have given further time, nor to have referred the title; but finding it essentially and materially defective, should have dismissed the bill.

It is equally clear to me, that on the appeal, the chancellor ought to have tried the case upon the record, as it stood before the court below, and to have reversed the decree and dismissed the bill; which having failed to do, I think we should now reverse his decree and dismiss the bill.

CABELL, J., concurred.

BROOKE, J. The plaintiff put his claim to a specific execution of the contract, on two grounds; 1. on the validity of his title to the 209 acres purchased of the executor of Haskins and of Albert Haskins, his title to the 489 acres not being questioned; and 2. on the defendant's knowledge of the defect of the title to the 209 acres, supposing it to be defective.

I think there was nothing in the allegation that the defendant was apprised of the defect in the title, if any, at the time he entered into the contract. It is probable enough, that both parties believed that the title to the 209 acres of land was a good title, when the contract was entered into: yet the plaintiff stipulated to make the defendant a good and lawful right to the land: and the defendant's knowledge of its defects could not affect him, since he did not rely on that knowledge when he made the contract. Stockton v. Cook, 3

Munf. 68. If Jackson was asking 182 for a specific execution *of the contract, the case would be different: proof that he knew of the state of the title when he made the contract, would compel him to take the title, as he understood it at the time; or the court would dismiss his bill; it would not execute the contract in the terms of it. But he is here asking nothing of the court, and insisting on his legal rights under the contract; and there is nothing in his conduct to affect his conscience. If he had purchased the land at the sale made by Haskins's executor, at which he was a bidder, and had relied on his understanding of the title, and that alone, on a bill for specific execution, he would be compelled to take the title, as it was represented to him by the auctioneer; that is, the title he bargained for. But, in the case before us, however confident he may have been, when he made the contract, that the title was a good one, he was not bound to make an adventuring contract on his knowledge of the title; and he did not do so; on the contrary, he took a contract binding the vendor to make him a good and lawful title.

In this view of the case, there was nothing before the county court, to justify a reference of the title to a commissioner. Its validity depended on a just construction of the will of Owen Haskins, and the authority of his executor to sell the land under it. It was a dry question of law, for the decision of which the report of a commissioner could furnish nothing, and which the court alone was competent to decide.

That the county court erred in its decision is very clear. The sale by the executor was certainly premature. There are cases, in which the power of a trustee to sell, may be executed before the expiration of the time prescribed by the instrument giving the power; as in the case of Uvedale v. Uvedale, where the widow claimed as a creditor. But, in the case before us, the sale cannot be justified by the authority of that case, or any other. The renunciation of the will by the widow, was a release of her interest in the execution of the power, but was not equivalent to her marriage *or death (the events, on the happening of either of which, the executor was authorized to sell) either in the intention of the testator, or as regarded the interests of the parties, under the power. Some of them were infants; and they entitled to unequal interests in the subject, until one of the events prescribed by the will should happen. The intention of the testator was, in either of those events, the marriage or the death of the widow, the whole, and not a part, of the subject should be sold. The power to sell the whole and divide the money among the children, was a trust, which was not properly executed by selling a part after dower was assigned to the widow. The county court erred, then, in deciding that the title was a good and lawful title. There is nothing in the case to justify its decree, on the ground of a waiver by Jackson, of his title according to the terms of his contract. There is no proof, that, at the time he took possession of the land, he agreed to take any but a good and lawful title according to his written contract. His abandonment of it, in a few weeks after he discovered that the vendor could not make him a title until infants should come of age, nor then, if others also, in whom the title was in part, should dissent and elect to take the land, was evidence to the contrary.

Neither is this a case for compensation. It would be to make a contract for him, to compel him to take the 489 acres only, at a value not put on it by himself; for he has valued it in connexion with the 209 acres, and not by itself. As to time not being of the essence of the contract, unless expressly made so (which it is not in this case); time, nevertheless, may be very material to the justice of the case. Jackson was to pay for the land by instalments, and might reasonably calculate on the profits to assist him in the payments. To continue in possession under a doubtful title (at least) might be ruinous to him: he might pay the instalments, and put improvements on the land, or its value might be enhanced by other causes, and then he might lose all.

184 *It is the settled rule of this court, not to compel a vendee to pay the purchase money until he gets a title. In the state of the case before the county court, the bill ought to have been dismissed. And when the cause came into the court of chancery by appeal, that court ought to have reversed the decree of the county court, and to have rendered such decree as the county court ought to have rendered; there being no ground on which to retain the cause in that court, laid in the proceedings of the county court. Both decrees ought therefore to be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

TUCKER, P. In examining this case, I shall begin with the inquiry, what decree the court of chancery ought to have pronounced upon hearing the appeal from the decree of the county court? The practice in such cases is perfectly familiar to the profession. Where the appellate court is of opinion, that the inferior court has erred, it proceeds not only to reverse its decree, but to make such decree as the court below ought to have made. Thus, its reversal may be absolute and in omnibus, not only annulling what has been done in favour of one party, but entering an absolute decree in favour of the other; or it may be partial and interlocutory, when the court below has proceeded prematurely to adjudicate finally between the parties, without such preliminary inquiries, as appear, upon the face of the record, to have been essential to enable the court to pronounce upon the rights of the parties, with a full understanding of the case. Thus, in the present instance: if the county court ought to have decided, that there was no ground for specific performance, the decree should have been wholly reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs: for this the appellant's counsel contend. But, if there was enough in the record to shew that, instead of decreeing specific performance, on the one hand, or dismissing the bill on the other, the court should have directed a reference of the title to a commissioner, before it proceeded to pro-

185 nounce definitively between *the parties, then the court of chancery ought to have reversed the decree, and to have proceeded to direct that reference, which ought to have been directed by the inferior tribunal. Nor do I think the irregularity of omitting to affirm or reverse the decree, definitively, when the appeal was first heard, is material, provided the chancellor did not, in his subsequent decision, bring matters, introduced into the cause ex post facto, to bear upon the antecedent question of error or no error in the county court. This, indeed, would be altogether erroneous; for, except in a few cases, founded on the practice of the spiritual court, and some others resting on particular statutory provisions, it is a practice unknown to our law, for a superior court, when reviewing the sentence of an inferior, to examine the justice of the former decree, by evidence which was never produced below. We must, therefore, consider the decree of the county court, upon the proofs in the cause at the hearing there.

In that state of the cause, ought the county court to have pronounced the decree it did? If not, ought it to have dismissed the bill? or directed a reference of the title to a commissioner? That the decree of the county court was not justified by the proofs in the cause, was admitted by the chancellor. But I go further than he has done, being of opinion, that nothing appeared before the court to justify even a reference of the title, and that the bill of the plaintiff should therefore have been dismissed. This brings us to an examination of the merits of the controversy.

By the contract between the parties, Ligon contracted to give Jackson possession on the 25th December 1822, and to make him a good and lawful right, on or before the 1st January following. It was not a mere engagement to seal and deliver a conveyance, with the usual covenants of title, which Jackson regarded; the vendor bound himself to make a good and lawful right, and this, by the terms of the contract, was to be accomplished by the 1st January.

Whether Jackson knew, or did not know, at the time of the *contract, that the title was defective, is wholly immaterial: if he did not know it, he surely ought not to be compelled to take a defective title that was concealed from him, and which he could not have intended to receive: if he did know it, he provided against it expressly, by the covenant that required a good and lawful right to be made by a given day; and if, in the present case, the purchaser would be concluded from objections to the title, by the fact of his prior knowledge of its defects, it is not perceived what course a buyer is to take who desires to secure himself against known defects. The case of Stockton v. Cook, 3 Munf. 68, very clearly shews the understanding of this court, that a covenant against incumbrances, comprehends known as well as unknown incumbrances, and that the vendee is not precluded by his previous knowledge, from claiming the fulfilment of the covenant. Were it otherwise, it would be impossible for him to provide for his security.

The contract, then, having bound the vendor to make a good and lawful right, not with reference, as he supposes, to Jackson's notions of a good title, but with reference to the well established principles of the law, the next question is, whether a rigorous compliance with this engagement on the appointed day, was essential to Ligon's right to specific execution? This brings us to the subject of time being of the essence of the contract.

At law, in every case of dependent covenants, time is of the essence of the contract, since the plaintiff cannot recover without shewing performance on his part, or readiness and ability to perform. But, in equity, it is, upon general principles, otherwise. It is the boast of that court, that it looks at the substance of things, and is regardless of forms; that it relieves against penalties and forfeitures incommensurate to the injury which the party has done, and where ample compensation can be made will compel his adversary to accept such compensation. On like principles, although a vendor may not have complied in strictness with his contract to convey,—or the vendee 187 may not have paid his money *precisely at the stipulated time, equity will, nevertheless, upon a proper case made, enforce the contract, instead of permitting either party to insist on an arbitrary forfeiture of its benefits. Out of the exercise of this jurisdiction has grown the idea, that, in equity, time is not regarded as of the essence of a contract, and a false report of an opinion of lord Hardwicke, in Gibson v. Patterson, 1 Atk. 12, carries it to an extent in no wise justified by reason or later authorities. That parties may, if they please, make time of the essence of their contract, is not clearly admitted, and seems to follow from the unquestioned right of parties to frame their contracts at pleasure, unless, indeed, it can be shewn that this stipulation is against moral right, or positive law. It would seem, then, that the intention of the parties is, in this, as in other cases, to be looked to; and where it is plain that, in default of a strict performance on one part, it was the intention that the contract should cease to be binding on the other, that intention must be carried into effect: for courts do not sit to overthrow the agreements of parties, but to carry them into effect, where they are legal, equitable, and reasonable.

It cannot be denied, however, that the mere appointment of a day for the payment of money, or delivery of a title, has not been regarded as a sufficient indication that time is of the essence of the contract. Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 273-5. And, in the case at bar, there appears to me nothing to shew, that the parties so designed it here. There is, indeed, a strong provision to prove the contrary; the provision, namely, that Jackson might proceed to prepare for a crop, and should have possession on the 25th December, only seven days before the day fixed for making a title. On that day, he accordingly took possession, and actually went on the land to reside. Now, if time was of the essence of the contract, the first of January must have decided that it was either good or void; and, in that view, it is scarcely to be conceived, that Jackson would have contracted for the possession on the 25th December, with the risque 188 of being *obliged to relinquish it on the 1st January for want of title, instead of fixing the day of possession to the 1st January, only seven days later, when all suspense would have necessarily terminated.

But though time may not have been of the essence of the contract, yet it may have been rendered by the conduct of the vendor or vendee, subsequent to the contract, of the essence of the transaction between the parties. Such, I conceive, has been the case here. Jackson, I have little doubt, supposed that the title from Haskins the executor, and perhaps, that from Albert Haskins, would be good. But when he had, as I suppose, taken counsel of his friend, or of his lawyer, and found that the will conferred no authority on the executor, to sell during Mrs. Haskins's life and widowhood, he distinctly announced his objection to Ligon, refused to receive the title, and, in a few weeks, renounced the possession. It is said, indeed, that the time of his quitting the premises does not appear; that it might have been months, or a year. But I think we cannot infer that Ligon's own witness would have used the terms weeks, if the continuance of possession had been for months; nor, indeed, does any man, even in common parlance, ordinarily use the lesser denomination where the use of the greater is appropriate to the fact. I take it, then, that the possession was relinquished within a month; the rejection of the title was distinctly announced, and Jackson returned to his own home. In this, I think, he was fully justified, if he had good reason to be dissatisfied with the title. To have continued the possession would have been to close the door upon his objections. Moreover, if his objection to the title was a valid one, (the want of power in the executor to sell) it was most formidable, since it would have required years, and a fortuitous occurrence of events, ever to make it good. Whether, therefore, time was or was not of the essence of this contract, I think the vendee was justified at this early stage of the transaction, in this prompt, and (as far as we can see)

189 this bona fide rejection of the title, and of the "purchase. He has not, in the language of the books, "turned round the contract upon frivolous objections." He has renounced it upon vital and well founded objections, which it would have required years to remove, if indeed they were ever susceptible of removal. After this measure, Ligon is not heard of until the commencement of the suit, just twelve months after the renunciation of the contract by Jackson: he gives no notice to Jackson, that he shall attempt the completion of the title, or the enforcement of the contract; nor does he sue for that purpose until twelve months have elapsed. Neither has he proved, that he also abandoned the property, which, if true, would have been a fact of some importance in estimating his conduct in this affair. The case is thus brought, I think, strongly within the influence of that of Lloyd v. Collett, 4 Bro. C. C. 469; 4 Ves. 689. See also 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 559. It is not reasonable, that a purchaser, who in proper time has urged his objections to a title, and who on discovering that a good title cannot be made, has at once refused to perform the agreement, should be compelled to abide by it.

In this view of the transaction, it will be perceived, I have assumed as a postulate, that the title in this case was clearly defective, and that there was no reasonable calculation that it could be rendered otherwise. It is, therefore, proper that this question should in its turn be examined, though very cursorily.

The better opinion, upon the authorities cited at the bar, seems to me to be, that a power given to an executor to sell after the determination of a life, cannot be executed during that life. The sacrifice inevitably attendant upon the sales of reversionary interests, renders such a measure always hazardous; and, therefore, it is not fair to presume, where such a power is not given by the testator, that he could have designed it should be exercised by his executor. In this case, however, the widow by renunciation of the will has relieved two thirds of the estate from the incumbrance of her life, and has thus enabled the executor to 190 *proceed to a sale, which would not be liable to the objections, applying to the sales of reversionary interests. But, while one difficulty is removed, another is substituted of a not less formidable character. The testator directed the whole tract to be sold after his wife's death or marriage. His wife has claimed her dower; that has been laid off to her. If, as usual, it comprehends the dwelling house, and curtilage, and other improvements on the land, then it is impossible to say, that either the sale already made by the executor has not been injured by this partition, or that the sale of the dower land, after the widow's death, will not be so affected. It is not only very possible, but highly probable, that the sale of either without the other, would be prejudicial to both; and this is a matter which the heirs of Haskins, at a remote period, might have thought proper to litigate with Ligon, or with Jackson, if he had been the purchaser. It is impossible, I think, (to use the language of the books) that this court should compel Jackson to buy a law suit. Whether the legal title was in the executor or not, whether there was a trust, or an imperative duty or a mere power, the act of the executor in selling under such questionable circumstances, and in selling, moreover, the shares of two out of four heirs, when each had a right that the intirety should be sold for the joint benefit,—was liable to a rigorous scrutiny by the heirs, when they should attain to full age. When this would have been, does not distinctly appear in the record; but, as there were several under age at the time of the contract, it is certain that several years must have intervened, before the youngest would attain his full age, so as to ratify the act of the executor, and to quiet the title of the vendee. Could it be expected, that Jackson was to be held in suspense during this interval; and encounter, when it was determined, the sheer chance of the children ratifying the transaction? But this is not all. Those children might die before they attained their majority. Their interests might have devolved upon numerous heirs scattered over the country, some perhaps femes

191 covert, and *others infants of more tender years than themselves, whose acquiescence in the premature exercise of his power by the executor, would be the less easily acquired, in the disadvantageous situation in which he was placed. Thus circumstanced, I do not think Jackson was bound to accept a title so defective, and which could not be rendered good for several years, and might never be rendered good. He was not bound to speculate on the possibility of Ligon's being able to buy out or quiet the claims of the heirs. He was not bound to take an estate, which he must either suffer to remain unimproved, till the cloud had passed which hung over the title, or which he must improve at imminent hazard. He was not bound to take an estate without a marketable title, since without such title he might be subjected to the heaviest loss. Had he taken it, and found it necessary to sell, the doubt about the title would have rendered it a dead property on his hands; and (as this very decree shews) it might be forced by Ligon himself into the market for sale, with a cloud hanging over it, arising out of his own failure to fulfil his express engagement to make a good and lawful title.

It may be said, indeed, that it was impossible for Ligon to obtain the title. Be it so. Then what is the consequence? The answer is plain. As he cannot do what he undertook to do, as he cannot perform his contract, he ought not to expect Jackson to abide by it. He ought to be well satisfied, that there are no worse consequences, from his having contracted to do, what he now finds he cannot do. I have no doubt, that he contracted in good faith; that he supposed the executor's conveyance and Albert's contract were sufficient; and so, very possibly, did Jackson. But the latter did not choose to rest upon this opinion: he bound his vendor to make him, by a given day, a good and lawful right; and that vendor, too confident in his title, undertook accordingly. When he found he could not perform, and that Jackson promptly renounced the contract, he ought not to have hesitated to abandon his pretension to enforce it.

192 *In the view which I have taken of the title under the executor, I have not thought it necessary to scrutinize narrowly, the character or extent of his power; since, under any aspect, a purchaser under him must inevitably be exposed to the hazard of loss and litigation. It is, however, my opinion, that the executor in this case had but a bare power; that there is nothing from whence a technical trust can be inferred; and that the legal title descended to the heirs, subject indeed to the provision made for their support during the life and widowhood of the wife, and subject further to be divested by a due execution of the power after her death or marriage. If this be so, then the legal title was not conveyed by the premature exercise of his power by the executor, and all that his deed could pass was a questionable equity; which no purchaser is bound to take.

It is not necessary to point out the other defects of this title, at the time of the decree rendered by the county court. The invalidity of the conveyance of the executor, is itself sufficient to vacate the contract, unless it could be shewn that the vendee, even without this land, would get what he substantially contracted for. Of this, no evidence was before the county court; nor is it reasonably to be inferred, when we find that Jackson himself was a bidder for this very property at the executor's sale; that Ligon purchased it and sold it as an appendage to his own land, and that, to say the least, others besides Jackson deem the Haskins tract an important appendage to the Ligon tract. Besides this, there is no such allegation in the pleadings, but they stand solely upon the question, whether there has or has not been a compliance with the contract on the part of Ligon.

Upon the whole, I think it clear, that at the time of the decree in the county court, Ligon had not complied, and could not comply, with his contract; and, of course, the bill ought to have been dismissed, unless that court ought either to have referred the title to a commissioner, or have given further time for the completion of the title. Neither of these things, in my opinion, ought to have been done.

193 *As to reference of title: This practice, now so well settled in England, has not, I believe, prevailed very generally with us. The reason for having a report, is said to be, that the ground upon which the court proceeds, may appear upon the record. And, in England, where titles are complicated by mortgages, terms, family settlements, and outstanding trusts, it is of great importance as well as convenience, that such references should be made. The necessity can more rarely exist with us, where the title is generally more simple and the question of its validity is fairly presented by a few title papers of the simplest form. For, as the commissioner's opinion upon the validity of the title, is liable to exception, and to the revision of the court, it is obvious, that where the question of title is already fairly presented, and a distinct point is offered to the court for its consideration, a reference would only lead to embarrassment and expense, without subserving any beneficial end. The english practice will be found, indeed, I think, to coincide with this principle.

There, when a vendor files a bill for a specific performance, stating that he was unable to complete his title at the time fixed, but that he is now ready to do so, if he makes such a case as entitles him to relief in case he can make a good title, the court will refer the title to a master for his report. And, even when the vendor states that he is yet unable, but shews that he will soon be able, to perfect the title, the court, upon a proper case made, will direct the master to report whether a good title can be made at the time of the report, and if so, or if it can even be made at the date of the decree, it may suffice. In these cases, it must be observed, a single naked question is not often presented to the court, but the general question of the validity of the title proposed to be made; and, therefore, a reference is directed, in order that the necessary abstracts and information may be laid before the court, and the points of dispute fairly and distinctly pointed out, either by the report, or by exceptions which may be filed to it. So, if the defendant

194 *in answer to the allegation that the plaintiff can now make a good title, asks for a reference, by his answer or by motion, he is peculiarly entitled to it, as the plaintiff is asking relief beyond the law. 6 Ves. 646.

But, I think, there is no invariable rule, even in England, that the court ought never to decide upon the validity of the title, but should send the title to a master. This is established by the cases of Rose v. Calland, and Omerod v. Hardman. The latter is peculiarly strong and appropriate. (By the way, the remarks of the judges, upon the merits of the case, have a strong bearing upon this case.) The bill was filed in the court of chancery of the county palatine of Lancaster, for specific performance by a purchaser. The defendant by his answer took a variety of objections to the plaintiff's ability to make a good title; all of which, however, grew out of the instrument under which the plaintiff assumed the power to sell the premises. The vice chancellor dismissed the bill, without referring the title. In the argument, this omission is made the substantive objection to the decree of dismissal, although the counsel admitted, that if it had incontestably appeared, that a good title could not have been made, the decree would have been right. Chambre, J., said, 'against this decree it is said, that there is an invariable rule that the court ought not to decide upon the validity of the title, in the first instance, but that the title ought to be sent to the master, and should be taken into consideration by the court upon his report. If there was an inflexible rule of that sort, it would dispose of the case. But if no authority had been cited, I should find it very difficult to accede to that idea, that there should be such inflexible rule: for if it should clearly appear to the court, upon the pleadings and the evidence, that there are objections not to be removed, it would be an idle and unnecessary expense to the parties, to answer no purpose, to make such a reference. We are, however, relieved from any difficulty from the circumstance of a very recent and decided authority by the lord chancellor,"

195 (meaning Rose v. Calland) *Baron Graham coincided in this opinion: "What" (he emphatically asks) "is the effect of sending the case to a master, when we see the title can only be good, if the heir and other persons join?" And these opinions seem to be strongly sustained by the lord chancellor, in the case of Jenkins v. Hiles, which was cited for the appellee: he there distinctly intimates, that it is not the practice of the courts to refer the title to a master, where the answer of the defendant offers, "for the decision of the court, one neat dry point upon which his objection rests." Speaking, moreover, of the case of Omerod v. Hardman, he appears to approve the principle laid down by the judges as to this doctrine of reference, though (if I understand him rightly) he had some doubt of the propriety of its application to that case. He considers the cases of Rose v. Calland, and Omerod v. Hardman, as not within the ordinary rules requiring a reference, being cases where the vendor comes for specific performance, and the vendee calls for a decision upon the title offered by the vendor, who, instead of shewing by his bill that he can heal defects, puts himself upon the title he has offered, and chooses to abide by that. He says, that admitting the vendor's right, under the general rule, to clear away difficulties between the hearing and the report, "it would be difficult to say, that there could be no case, in which the plaintiff might not have stated himself so conclusively, that the court should hesitate in the first instance to decide. If I am to state a doubt upon the case in the duchy court, it would be a doubt, whether it could be collected from what was stated by the plaintiff, that, if the title was imperfect, it was stated conclusively, or whether, if stated conclusively, it was doubtful."

From this view of the cases, I am clearly of opinion, that a reference to a commissioner by the county court, was neither necessary nor proper, as this case appeared in that court; and a fortiori, it could not have been proper to give time to the plaintiff, from month to month, or from year to year, to see whether he could buy out or extinguish the outstanding rights to this

196 property. It is going far enough *to give time, as is sometimes the effect of a reference, to enable the party to get in the title, where he has already a right to the estate, and where the vendee is in possession, as was the case in Beverley v. Lawson, a fact I conceive of the utmost importance in these cases. But, I doubt whether any case can be made, in which it would be proper to give a plaintiff, who seeks a specific performance against a defendant, who has promptly rejected the title as defective, and thrown up the possession, an indefinite time to see, whether he can purchase up the rights of others in the estate, in order to enable him to comply with his engagements after the lapse of years. Such, in effect, I conceive this case to have been.

Both decrees reversed, and bill dismissed.

In a suit of Henderson against Jackson, in the circuit court of Harrison, judgment was rendered against Jackson in his lifetime, for 3957 dollars, with interest and costs; from which Jackson prayed an appeal, which was allowed him, "upon his entering into bond with sufficient surety, in the penalty of 8000 dollars, conditioned as the law directs." An appeal bond was forthwith executed by Jackson and his surety, in open court, in the condition whereof the judgment appealed from was recited as a judgment for 3900 dollars only, omitting fifty-seven dollars; and the court, not advertent to this misrecital of the judgment in the condition, accepted the appeal bond, and the cause was brought up to this court. While the appeal was pending here, Jackson died, and the appeal was afterwards revived by his administratrix; and before the cause came on to be argued *in this court, more than five years (the limitation to a writ of error or supersedeas, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 19, p. 492,) had elapsed since the date of the judgment of the circuit court.

And now Stanard, for the appellee, objected that the misrecital of the judgment in the condition of the appeal bond, rendered the bond naught, so that, if the judgment should be affirmed, the appellee could never have any remedy upon it; and, therefore, he moved, that the appeal should be dismissed, unless a good and sufficient appeal bond should now be filed, and for a rule upon the now appellant to that purpose.

Johnson and Leigh for the appellant, did not admit that the defect in the appeal bond would be a fatal objection to it in an action upon it; but supposing it was so, they said the motion came too late. The bond had been accepted by the circuit court, or rather by the appellee, for he made no objection to it, and the appeal had been so long pending here, that, if it should now be dismissed, no writ of error or supersedeas could be obtained; and the original appellant himself being dead, his administratrix certainly could not be required to execute an appeal bond, which would bind her personally, whether she had assets to pay the debt or not.

TUCKER, P. The appellee cannot, at this late day, have a dismissal on the ground of any supposed defect in the appeal bond, nor can he, Jackson being now dead, be entitled to a rule upon the now appellant, Jackson's administratrix, to give further security upon pain of having the appeal dismissed. The circuit court, which allowed this appeal, has certified in the record before us, that Jackson with his surety, upon the appeal being allowed, did execute such a bond as was required by the order. Admitting that the bond in the record is the bond alluded to, and that it is truly copied, the defects of that bond (if it be indeed defective, *which I do not mean to decide) were disregarded by the court, or were considered as not fatal to its validity. This defect, if such it be, was an error in the judgment of the court upon a matter vitally affecting the interests of the plaintiff Henderson, and which he ought to have promptly corrected, or to have been considered as waiving. The mode of correction was obvious, by an early motion to this court to dismiss the appeal, if the bond was not good. The appellant could take no step. He had executed such bond as the court required; his appeal was docketed without objection, and has been now depending so long, that, if it be dismissed, there can be no writ of error or supersedeas allowed. This would, surely, be grossly unjust. It would be to permit the appellee to derive a benefit from his own acquiescence in this legal appeal, and to take from the now appellant the right of correcting the error of the inferior tribunal, when neither she nor the intestate has been in any default; for the bond, in this case, was executed and prepared under the supervision of the circuit court, and of the appellee and his counsel. If, indeed, Jackson were now alive, the error, though so lately discovered, might be corrected; but as the appellee cannot now be relieved, without depriving his administratrix of her appellate rights, or requiring her to give security, which as administratrix she is not bound to give, no step should be taken in the cause for its dismissal. It ought to proceed without a new bond to a hearing; which, fortunately, in the present instance, will not be delayed. The case of Syme v. Johnston, 3 Call 523, and the rule there established, though not exactly in point, strongly sustains the course the court thinks proper in the present case.

The cause was then heard upon the appeal.

It was an action of assumpsit brought by Alexander Henderson, for the benefit of Gilman & Ammidon, against John G. Jackson, as indorser of a bill of exchange, drawn at Clarksburg (in Harrison county, Virginia) on the 26th *June 1816, by Jonathan Jackson, upon Jonathan Walmesley, in favour of James M'Cally, for 5000 dollars, payable 180 days after the date, at the bank of Marietta in the state of Ohio, which was accepted by Walmesley, pal case is cited in Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 477.

Same—Same—Custom—Pleading and Practice.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Liggatt v. Withers, 5 Gratt. 24; Hansbrough v. Neal, 94 Va. 725, 27 S. E. Rep. 563. See monographic note on "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 622.

and then indorsed by M'Cally to the defendant John G. Jackson, and by him to the plaintiff Henderson, cashier of the bank of Marietta. The original declaration contained two special counts upon the bill, and two money counts. The defendant pleaded the general issue. And upon the trial of the cause on these pleadings, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff "subject to the opinion of the court on the facts agreed by the parties." But what was called the facts agreed, was a detailed state of all the evidence adduced by both parties (which in the opinion of the circuit court, and of this court, was variant as to some material particulars, and part of it, indeed, was objected to as incompetent) to which state of the evidence was subjoined an agreement of the parties, in these words: "The parties admit the facts in the foregoing evidence, and agree that the jury shall find a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on the said facts, reserving exceptions to the admissibility of any of the evidence aforesaid." The circuit court, at a subsequent term, upon a motion of the plaintiff, set aside the verdict, gave him leave to amend the declaration, and remanded the cause to the rules.

The amended declaration, besides the usual money counts, contained six special counts upon the bill alleging the dishonor thereof, and the defendant's liability, in various ways, but all alike in two respects, 1. All the counts,—after setting out the bill of exchange, as bearing date at Clarksburg, the 26th June 1816, and drawn by Jonathan Jackson, on Jonathan Walmesley in favour of James M'Cally, for 5000 dollars, payable 180 days after date, at the bank of Marietta in Ohio, and setting out the acceptance thereof by Walmesley, the indorsement by M'Cally, the payee, to John G. Jackson, the defendant, and his indorsement to Henderson, the plaintiff,—alleged, that 201 "afterwards, when *the said bill of exchange became due and payable, according to the tenor and effect thereof, to wit, on the 27th December 1816, at the bank of Marietta in Ohio," the bill was then and there duly presented for payment, and payment was then and there duly demanded, and the acceptor then and there failed to make payment; and 2. all the counts charged (as usual) that the defendant became liable to pay the contents of the bill, according to the usage and custom of merchants. (It will be found, upon counting the time, that the 27th December 1816 was the fourth day after the expiration of the 180 days limited in the bill for the payment of the contents.)

To this amended declaration also, the defendant pleaded the general issue. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiff, and that for a larger sum than the court thought him entitled to; but the plaintiff releasing the excess, the court gave him judgment for the sum to which it held him entitled; namely, 3957 dollars with interest from the 27th December 1816, and costs.

The defendant, having filed five bills of exceptions, two to opinions of the court given at the trial, and three to opinions of the court on motions to set aside the verdict, and direct a new trial,—appealed from the judgment to this court.

1. The first bill of exceptions, stated the facts upon which the points of law submitted to the court arose, and the points of law themselves, so imperfectly and vaguely, that, in the opinion of this court, as it was impossible to decide, so it was unnecessary and improper to examine them.

2. The second bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiff, at the trial, offered in evidence the bill of exchange in the declaration mentioned, with the acceptance, and the indorsements thereon, which were in these words: "Exchange for 5000 dollars (350 cents stamp) Clarksburg, 26th June 1816. One hundred and eighty after this first of exchange (the second of the 202 same tenor and date unpaid) *pay to the order of James M'Cally, at the bank of Marietta in the state of Ohio, five thousand dollars, value received, and charge the same, with or without further advice, to account of your obedient servant." (Signed) Jonathan Jackson." (Addressed) "To Jonathan Walmesley, Clarksburg, Virginia." (Underwritten "Accepted; Jonathan Walmesley." (Indorsed) "Pay to John G. Jackson; J. M'Cally"—"Pay to Alexander Henderson, cashier of the bank of Marietta; J. G. Jackson." And the plaintiff proved, that the bill was presented at the bank of Marietta, and demand of payment made there, on the 27th December 1816. Whereupon the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the said 180 days in the bill mentioned, and three days of grace, having expired before the said 27th December, the demand then made was not a good and sufficient demand of the bill, and that for want of a good and sufficient demand, the defendant was discharged from liability upon his indorsement. But the court refused to give this instruction to the jury; to which the defendant excepted.

3. The third bill of exceptions was filed to an opinion of the court, after the verdict was rendered, overruling a motion made by the defendant, to set it aside, upon the ground that it was for a larger sum than the plaintiff was entitled to, for reasons detailed in the bill of exceptions, but which it is needless to state here; for the court concurred with the defendant, and declared that it would set aside the verdict, unless the plaintiff would enter a release for the excess of the sum found by the jury, over and above the amount which the defendant contended, and the court thought, was just; and upon the plaintiff entering the release accordingly, the court overruled the defendant's motion.

4. The fourth bill of exceptions was filed to an opinion of the court overruling another motion made by the defendant to set the verdict aside, and direct a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the justice of the case, upon the facts proved by the evidence. This motion 203 *being overruled, the defendant moved the court to state and certify the facts proved in evidence at the trial, which the court declined doing, otherwise than by setting out the whole evidence on both sides, and certifying that nothing appeared to impeach the credit of any of the witnesses.

Accordingly, this bill of exceptions did not profess to state the facts which the circuit court thought well proved by the evidence: it detailed the whole evidence adduced by both parties at large; and that evidence was, in the judgment of this court, variant and even conflicting, as to some material points. It is only necessary to state, that among the evidence set out in this bill of exceptions, there was evidence adduced by the plaintiff, which he and his counsel, both in the circuit court and here, relied on to prove; that the defendant, with full knowledge of the circumstances touching the dishonour of the bill, and affecting his liability as indorser, had afterwards assumed the payment of the contents to Gilman & Ammidon, the real holders of the bill, for whose benefit the suit was brought; though the appellee and his counsel, in both courts, insisted that the evidence did not prove any such assumpsit.

5. The course which the cause took in this court, rendered the fifth bill of exceptions wholly immaterial, and no notice was taken of it at the bar or by the court.

Johnson and Leigh for the appellant, contended, 1. That the circuit court ought not to have set aside the verdict rendered at the first trial, subject to the opinion of the court on the facts agreed by the parties, but should have proceeded to judgment upon it; for, though the facts agreed by the parties consisted in a state of all the evidence adduced by them both, yet (as they endeavoured to shew) the case and the evidence was such, that the facts, and the whole merits of the case, could no otherwise be stated, more fully, more fairly, or with more certainty, than by stating the evidence. And, therefore, they proceeded to argue the law of the case upon the facts so agreed at 204 the first trial, *and contended, that judgment ought to have been given for the defendant, upon the conditional verdict then found. 2. They said, the fourth bill of exceptions, also (that taken to the opinion of the circuit court, overruling the motion for a new trial, made on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the justice of the case upon the evidence) presented the merits of the case fully and fairly, for examination, so that this court, reviewing the opinion of the circuit court on this point, might, in effect, determine the cause upon the merits, and put an end to the controversy at once. The circuit court, indeed, refused to certify the facts proved by the evidence, and would only certify the evidence itself in detail, and that nothing appeared to impeach the credit of any of the witnesses; but it was justified in that course, and could only be justified, by the consideration, that the evidence was so simple and consistent throughout, that no serious contest as to any question of fact could arise. Therefore, these exceptions were well taken, according to the principle settled in Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh, 337. And then, proceeding to examine the evidence set out in the fourth bill of exceptions, they contended that the plaintiff could never be entitled to a verdict. 3. They took up the case upon the second bill of exceptions, and maintained, that the circuit court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, that the 180 days appointed in the bill of exchange for the payment of the contents, and three days of grace, having expired, before the 27th December 1816, when the bill was presented at the bank of Marietta and payment demanded there, that was not a good and timely demand, and therefore the defendant was discharged from liability upon his indorsement. The instruction prayed by the defendant, propounded the general law merchant applicable to such cases, exactly and truly. And though the days of grace to be allowed on bills of exchange, are regulated by the law or usage of the place on which the bill is drawn, and though, if a bill be made payable at a particular bank, and if it be the established usage of that bank, to present the bill and 205 demand payment *on the fourth day of grace, such a presentation and demand are sufficient to charge the drawer and indorsers; yet, this usage constitutes an exception to the general law merchant of this country, which requires that the bill shall be presented, and payment demanded, on the third day of grace; and if no such usage appear, the general law merchant must govern the case. 3 Kent's Comm. 71; Bailey on bills, 151-5; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 581; Mills v. Bank of U. States, 11 Wheat. 431; Bank of Washington v. Triplett &c., 1 Peters, 25. It was the duty of the circuit court to have stated the general rule of the law merchant to the jury; and if the plaintiff relied on any special usage constituting an exception to the general rule, or upon any fact which dispensed with his observance of the general rule, it was for him to present such matter to the court, and to ask its instruction as to the effect of it.

Stadard, for the appellee, did not decline the argument upon the merits of the case, as disclosed by the evidence stated in the case agreed by the parties upon the first trial, and in the fourth bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court overruling the motion for a new trial: he contended that if the court could or would look into the evidence, the justice of the appellee's claim would be found to be clearly established. Indeed, he thought it so apparent, that the verdict and judgment conformed with the justice of the case, that this court ought not to reverse the judgment and direct a new trial, on the ground of errors or misdirection of the circuit court, that could not and ought not to affect the result of the case. If it appeared that substantial justice was done, a new trial ought not to be directed. But, he said, the conditional verdict rendered at the first trial, subject to the opinion of the court upon the facts agreed, was necessarily set aside; because, in truth, there were no facts but only the state of the evidence agreed, upon which (as he shewed to the satisfaction of this court) there arose many controverted questions of fact; so that neither the circuit 206 *court, nor this court, could give any judgment upon that verdict. Henderson v. Allens, 1 Hen. & Munf. 235; Blank's adm'r v. Foushee, 4 Munf. 61. And the fourth bill of exceptions was not well taken; for that also stated the evidence in detail, and evidence from which the parties and their counsel, in the circuit court and in this court, endeavoured to deduce directly contrary inferences; and, therefore, this court could not review the opinion of the circuit court refusing the new trial, upon such a bill of exceptions as this. Bennett v. Hardaway's adm'r, 6 Munf. 125. The principle of that case was no wise impugned, but on the contrary approved and confirmed, in Carrington v. Bennett, 1 Leigh, 340, and Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh, 337. Then, as to the point made upon the second bill of exceptions, he said, the instruction prayed by the defendant, did not truly propound the law merchant applicable to the case. For, according to the law merchant, the days of grace were regulated, in this case, by the laws of Ohio, or by the usage of the bank of Marietta; yet the court was asked to instruct the jury, in effect, that, without regard to what might be the law of that state or the usage of that bank, it was absolutely necessary to charge the indorser, that the bill should be presented, and demand of payment made, on the third day of grace. The exception to the general rule was as much a part of the law merchant as the rule itself. Besides, the court was well warranted in refusing to give the instruction, because it was asked upon a garbled state of the facts; for it distinctly appeared in the record, that the plaintiff had adduced evidence to prove such an assumption of the defendant to pay the contents of this bill, as (if proved) would have put an end to all questions as to laches in presenting the bill for payment, or notice of dishonour; and the case before the jury turned mainly upon the sufficiency of the evidence to establish this assumption.

Cur. advis. vult. And a few days after, Cabell, J., said—The six special counts in the amended declaration are all 207 *against the defendant as indorser of a bill of exchange, charging him to be liable to pay the same under the custom of merchants. I understand, that all the judges are of opinion, that these counts shew that the defendant was not liable to pay the bill, under the custom of merchants; because they shew, that the demand of payment was not made until the day after the expiration of the three days of grace allowed by that custom. I understand, that all the judges are of opinion, that if these counts had been demurred to, the demurrer must have been sustained, or that if the defendant had, at the trial, moved the court to instruct the jury to disregard them, the court ought to have given that instruction. I understand, moreover, that it is the opinion of all the judges, that the plaintiff could not properly have introduced any evidence, at the trial, tending to prove a special custom of the bank of Marietta, allowing four days of grace; he having declared on the custom of merchants, and not on the special custom of the bank. In all these opinions I concur. But the defendant having taken issue on the faulty counts, and having failed to demur, or to move for an instruction to disregard them, a question arises, whether, under these circumstances, it was competent to him, on the trial of the issue, to move the court for the instruction set forth in the second bill of exceptions; namely, that the three days of grace according to the custom of merchants, having expired before the demand of payment was made, "the demand was not a good and sufficient demand of payment of the bill, and that for want of such good and sufficient demand, the defendant was discharged from his liability arising from his indorsement." This question was not adverted to in the argument at the bar; and as it involves a principle of great importance, not only to the parties in this case, but to the public generally, I wish, before I decide it, to hear all that the counsel on both sides may be disposed to urge upon it.

The question thus propounded by the court, involved the construction and effect of the new provision in the statute
208 *of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 103, p. 512, that, no judgment, after verdict, shall be staid or reversed, for any defect whatsoever in the declaration or pleadings, whether of form or substance, which might have been taken advantage of by a demurrer, and which shall not have been so taken advantage of." And this question was argued by the counsel for both parties; but Leigh intimating that the declaration appeared to him to be a good one, and the court telling him he was quite at liberty to argue that point—

He said, he understood the only objection to the six special counts of the declaration to be, that they all (of course) founded the plaintiff's demand upon the defendant's liability as indorser, under the usage and customs of merchants; and yet they all shewed (as the objection supposed) that the defendant was not so liable; because they all alleged, that the demand of payment of the acceptor, was not made until the day after the expiration of the days of grace allowed by the custom of merchants, in other words, by the general law merchants. These counts, all, after stating the drawing, the acceptance, and the indorsements of the bill, allege, that, "afterwards, when the bill became due and payable according to the tenor and effect thereof, to wit, on the 27th December 1816, at the bank of Marietta, in the state of Ohio," the bill was duly presented for payment &c. Now, the time when the bill became due and payable, according to its tenor and effect, depended on the law merchant applicable to the case: if there was no particular law of the state of Ohio, and no particular usage of the bank of Marietta, then, by the law merchant, the bill was payable on the third day of grace: if there was any law of Ohio, or any special usage of the bank of Marietta, regulating the days of grace, and requiring bills to be presented and payment demanded on the fourth day of grace, then (and still according to the law merchant) the bill was payable and properly demandable on the fourth day of grace; and the plaintiff alleging presentation and demand when the bill became due and payable according to the tenor and effect 209 thereof, was entitled to *shew any particular law or special custom requiring presentation and demand on the fourth day of grace, since the law merchant made the bill due and payable on the day when such particular law or local custom required it to be presented and demanded. In this respect, the view, which Mr. Stanard had taken in his first argument, of the law of the case, was certainly just. The effect of this general form of pleading, and letting in evidence of a local law or usage under such a declaration, would not be to surprise the defendant at all; since he, having indorsed the bill payable at a particular bank, was held to take notice of the special usages of the bank, if there were any, and to know that the bill would be dealt with accordingly (1 Peters, 32,) and was, therefore, as distinctly apprised, that evidence of the special usage would be adduced to prove the plaintiff's case, as if the usage had been specially pleaded by him. Accordingly, he said, in declarations upon bills payable in foreign places, where the days of grace allowed were different from those allowed by our general law merchant, the law or usage of the foreign place on which the bill is drawn, though that must regulate the days of grace, was never set out by the plaintiff in his declaration. He referred to the form of a declaration on a bill drawn on Venice, in Bailey on bills, 265, in which, though six days of grace are allowed at Venice, Chitt. on bills, 339, yet the law and usage of Venice in this particular, are no wise set forth, and the time of presentation and demand, alleged under a scilicet, is not the sixth day of grace, but an earlier day. And in Bailey's commentary on his form of the declaration (p. 283, 4,) the distinction was stated very clearly—that if the declaration allege presentation and demand on a particular day, without any express averment that the presentation was made on the day when the bill became payable, then the day stated must be the very day when in truth it became payable; but, if there be such an express averment (meaning, if due presentation and demand is averred, and then the date of such presentation stated under a scilicet) exact-

210 ness as to the day *is immaterial—perhaps, said Bailey—but all doubt was removed by the case of Bynner v. Russell, 7 Moore, 266; 1 Bingham, 23, S. C. There, the declaration against the drawer of a bill averred, that “when it became due and payable according to the tenor and effect thereof, to wit, on the 31st March 1822,” it was duly presented for payment. And upon special demurrer, shewing for cause, that the 31st March was Sunday, the court held the declaration good: that “the presentment was stated to have been made when the bill became due and payable according to the tenor and effect thereof,” and “that was quite sufficient, as the tenor and effect of the bill would appear upon the face of it. Besides, as it was laid under a scilicet, the precise day was not material, and need not be proved. Therefore, in the present case, he said there could be no doubt, that under all the special counts in this declaration, the plaintiff might have proved presentation and demand on the third day of grace, if the bill had in fact been presented on that day. But he went farther; he thought, that, if by any local law or usage, the bill ought to have been presented on the fourth day of grace, the plaintiff might have given evidence of such local law or usage, and proved presentation and demand according to it, though the local law or usage was not alleged in the declaration. Mr. Justice Thompson, indeed, in delivering the opinion of the court in Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 596, said, that if that case had come before the court upon demurrer to the declaration (which it did not) “there being no averment of the special custom as to the demand on the fourth day, and the general rule being that the demand must be made on the third, if the declaration alleged it to have been made on the fourth, the joinder in demurrer would admit the fact, and, of course, that the demand was too late. But had the declaration contained an averment of the special custom, it must have alleged the demand on the fourth day; that is, according to the legal effect of the note; and a demand laid on any other day, would have been bad.”

And, probably, it was this dictum 211 *(for it was avowedly nothing more)

that had led the judges of this court to the conclusion which had been announced, that the special counts in this declaration were faulty and demurrable. But, after it was settled, that the law merchant, though it in general requires the bill to be presented on the third day of grace, yet respects any local law or usage of the place on which it is drawn or where it is made payable, and requires, if the local law or usage requires, presentation on the fourth day;—and after it was also settled, that all parties to the bill are bound by the local law or established usage of the place where it is made payable or negotiable, whether they have a personal knowledge thereof or not, Mills v. Bank of U. S., 11 Wheat. 438, Bank of Washington v. Triplett &c., 1 Peters, 32, 3, he had never been able to see any reason why the local law or usage should be pleaded in the declaration, in order to entitle the plaintiff to give evidence of it at the trial, and of presentation in conformity with it, any more than that the holder suing upon a bill drawn upon a foreign country, should be required to set forth the law or usage of the country on which it is drawn, in order to entitle him to give evidence of the law or usage of the foreign state, and of the bill having been dealt with as the foreign law or usage required. The parties to a bill are held to have notice of, and to contract with reference to, the local usage of a particular bank at which the bill is made payable or negotiable, just as they are held to have notice of, and to contract with reference to, the law or usage of a foreign country, in case the bill be drawn upon it; and both alike are matters of fact, and matters of fact known, or presumed to be known, to the defendant as well as the plaintiff; so that the very nature of the demand apprises the defendant, that he must come prepared to try, whether the bill has been dealt with according to the law or usage of the place where it was made payable or negotiable, that being the very point on which his liability depends.

212 *CARR, J. On my first examination of this case, I inclined to the opinion that the second exception was well taken, and must reverse the judgment. Some of my brethren differed with me, and on conference, and further consideration, I acceded to the opinion, that in the actual posture of the case before the jury, the defendant had no right to the instruction of the court on the point submitted and stated in the second bill of exceptions, it being foreign to the issue joined between the parties. This was founded on an understanding of the declaration, which the arguments and authorities of Mr. Leigh have satisfied me was erroneous. The six counts all averring, that the bill was "presented when it became payable according to the tenor and effect thereof," I do not think the scilicet, which follow can vitiate these positive averments: and upon the issue taken upon these counts, I think the whole matter, whether of the general custom, or any special custom, which might be proved, was fairly before the jury. With these preliminary remarks, I proceed to the examination of the case.

I do not see how we can look to the case agreed on the first trial. A new declaration was afterwards filed at rules, whither the cause was sent for that purpose; a new plea put in; a trial upon it, and a general verdict for the plaintiff. On that trial the defendant took several exceptions to the opinion of the court; and to these I think we are confined.

The first bill states, that the defendant asked the opinion of the court on several important points; but they are so defectively stated, that it is impossible from the case made by the exceptions, to say that the court erred in refusing the instruction.

Then, as to the second bill of exceptions: as I understand it, the defendant propounded to the court a naked point of law, arising upon the face of the bill, and the proof of the demand; asking the court to instruct the jury, that it is a general rule of the law merchant, that a demand of payment of a bill of exchange, must be made on the third *day of grace, and that a failure to make such demand discharges the indorser. Now, if this be, in truth, a correct statement of the general rule, the court ought so to have declared it. Nor could such declaration have injured the plaintiff in the slightest degree, if he had evidence to take his case out of the rule, either by proof of a particular custom at the bank of Marietta, or by a subsequent binding promise of the defendant: for, in such case, the plaintiff would immediately move for an instruction, that the special custom governed the case, or that the subsequent assumpait dispensed with proof of a regular demand. But how did the refusal of the court to give the instruction prayed by the defendant affect him? He contended, that this was a rule of law to the benefit of which he was entitled, and he asked the court (the proper tribunal) to declare this law. When the court refused to tell the jury that such was the law, giving no reason for such refusal, it, in effect, instructed the jury that such was not the law. Was this correct? The supreme court of the U. States, in Renner v. Bank of Columbia, said, "we admit, in the most unqualified manner, that the usage of making a demand, on the third day of grace, has become so general, that courts of justice will notice it ex officio, and in the absence of any proof to the contrary, will presume that such was the understanding of all parties to a note when they put their names to it." In Mills v. Bank U. States, the court said, "There is no doubt, that according to the general rules of law, demand of payment ought to be made on the third day, and that it is too late, if made on the fourth day of grace." In The Bank of Washington v. Triplett &c. the chief justice, delivering the opinion of the court, after stating the third as the last day of grace, said, "The allowance of days of grace is a usage which pervades the whole mercantile world. It is now universally understood to enter into every bill or note of a mercantile character, and to form so completely a part of the contract, that the bill does not become due on the day mentioned on its face, but on the last day of grace."

214 A *demand of payment previous to that day will not authorize a protest, or charge the drawer." This is the unquestionable general rule; and so in this case, ought the circuit court to have declared it. Its refusal to do so, was clear error.

With respect to the third bill of exceptions, the ground of that was removed by the release of part of the damages.

As to the fourth. A motion was made for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the justice of the case upon the evidence. We have no facts certified by the judge of the court below, but the whole evidence set out at large, and that evidence (as I understand it) contradictory in several respects. In Bennett v. Hardaway, this court (apparently, after great consideration) decided that it would not examine the evidence, which had been before the court below, on a motion for a new trial, but such facts only as the judge would certify; and though in Carrington v. Bennett, this case was, as I thought, a little departed from, a majority of the court disclaimed any such intention; and being a divided court of three judges, could not overrule the previous solemn decision, or settle the law. Nor does the case of Ewing v. Ewing, according to my recollection of it, purport to overrule Bennett v. Hardaway: I am sure I should not have concurred if I had so understood it. That case, therefore, I still consider as giving the law; and under it we cannot look into this evidence set out at large, and contradictory. This answers the remark also, that if upon the whole record, the court should see that the case of the party, against whom the instruction is given, is a bad one, the judgment should not be reversed, though the instruction were wrong. Here, we cannot look into the evidence to see how the whole case is: for, if we may not look into it, to see whether the party has a right to a new trial, surely we cannot, to support an erroneous instruction given against him, upon the ground that his case is bad.

I think that the judgment must be reversed, and the case sent back, with direction to the court to give the instruction 215 *stated in the second bill of exceptions, if it should be asked on the new trial.

CABELL, J. I am of opinion, that the defendant was entitled to the instruction stated in the second bill of exceptions, and, therefore, the court erred in refusing to give that instruction; and, consequently, that the judgment must be reversed.

BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. The first question in this case is, that which arises out of the first verdict, and the order setting it aside; and of this I shall dispose by the single remark, that as the verdict consisted of an undigested mass of evidence, instead of finding the facts, to be submitted to the court, it was not such a verdict as would have justified the court in pronouncing judgment in the cause. The cases cited at the bar are decisive.

Proceeding then to the second trial, we find five bills of exceptions. The fourth of these arose out of a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict rendered by the jury was against evidence, which motion was denied by the court. The defendant thereupon moved the court to certify the facts, which the court refused to do, but certified the evidence given upon the trial. This, according to the case of Bennett v. Hardaway, was irregular, nor can the case even be brought within the broader principles, which seem to be avowed by one of the judges in Carrington v. Bennett. For the bill of exceptions, presents a mass of mere evidence for the consideration of this court. In this mass of evidence, is the conflicting testimony of witnesses upon points probably of vital importance. The facts are not, therefore, so stated as to enable the court to decide. But this seems not to have been the fault of the defendant or his counsel. The court refused to certify the facts. What is the consequence? Can this court set aside a verdict for 216 *an error of the court below posterior to its rendition? This would be to make the effect precede the cause. Or, must the party agreed resort to compulsory means, to compel the court to certify the facts? a question which seems to have been discussed in Vaughan v. Green, 1 Leigh, 292. Such a course would, in this case, be impracticable, as the judge who signed this bill of exceptions, is no longer the judge of the circuit, and he who now presides knows nothing of the case.

From these difficulties we must seek relief, in a resort to the other points in the cause. The next I shall consider, is the second bill of exceptions. I was, at first, inclined to think that this was not well taken in point of form, as it seemed to have selected a garbled state of the evidence, and the instruction asked seemed broader than would have been justified. But I am satisfied this is not so. The facts upon which the motion was rested, were alone necessary to be stated, provided it sufficiently appeared the instruction asked was relevant and material. This has been done; and the instruction asked, not only did not and could not have precluded the defendant from moving a counter instruction upon other facts (such as that four days of grace were allowed at the bank of Marietta, which would have made the demand and protest valid) but it did not go farther than it ought to have done, provided the instruction asked was proper in point of law. This, then, is the question to be solved, and this appeared to me to depend upon a preliminary question as to the declaration in the case.

My impression was, that the six first counts were defective in this, that the statement in each of them of the presentment for payment, "when the bill became due and payable, to wit, on the 27th December 1816" (which was the day after the expiration of the days of grace) was inconsistent with itself: or that, if the words "on the 27th December" were to be taken as explaining or modifying the former words, which seemed the fair construction, then the declaration did not shew presentment until after the expiration *of 217 the three days of grace, and so furnished no ground of action against the defendant. This scilicet, indeed, is often rejected, when it makes nonsense or is repugnant; but when it only serves to explain or to modify the meaning of what goes before, it will not be disregarded, and particularly where the day laid is material. For it is said in Hobart, 172, that a videlicet shall make a restriction, where the words are general; and where it is not repugnant to the preceding matter, but well agrees with it, there it amounts to a direct affirmation. See 1 Wms. Saund. 170, note 2, 2 Id. 291, note 1, Salk. 325, 6 Com. Dig. 60, 19 Viner, 46, 12 Mod. 579, 611. Upon examination, however, I find that the case of Bynner v. Russell in 7 Moore, cited by Mr. Leigh, is a direct authority upon the point before us, and establishes that in a case like this, the scilicet must be rejected. To this authority I refer (and the rather because I am averse to technicalities) though it appears to me at variance with the established doctrines in relation to the scilicet. The scilicet, then, being rejected, the declaration states the case of a presentment "when the bill became due and payable," that is on the third day of grace; for as no custom is stated, the general law merchant must be intended; and, as the evidence proved the presentment on the fourth day instead of the third, it neither supported the declaration nor shewed a cause of action. Hence, the instruction would have been proper.

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the cause sent back, when, if the pleadings remain unchanged, and the evidence of presentment and protest should be the same as set forth in the second bill of exceptions, without any thing more, the instruction asked for at the last trial, must, if again required, be given.

The judgment entered by the court conformed with the opinion of the president.

218 *The Mutual Assurance Society &c. v. Stone and Another.

November, 1831.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Mutual Assurance Societies—Lien of—Effect as to Bona Fide Purchasers.—By the statutes relative to The Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings, and the constitution and rules of the society, the society has a lien on property insured, for all quotas called for under the original act of incorporation of 1794, and for additional premiums upon revaluation and reassurance under the act of 1805, and for all contributions required under the act of 1809 or 1819: and this lien attaches to, and follows, the property in the hands of a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice of the lien or of the insurance.

Same—Same—Purchaser—When Complete.—Upon a plea of purchaser without notice, if the purchaser has paid the whole purchase money, though he has not got a conveyance of the legal estate, yet if he has acquired the preferable right to call for the legal estate, he is a complete purchaser entitled to avail himself of this defence: per TUCKER, P.

The act of assembly, passed December 1794, for establishing The Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings in this state—after declaring the principles of the society to be, “that the citizens of this state may insure their buildings against losses and damages occasioned accidentally by fire, and that the insured pay the losses and expenses, each his share according to the sum insured;” and providing, that subscriptions should be opened in different parts of the state; that so soon as the subscriptions should amount to 3,000,000 dollars, there should be a meeting of the subscribers to make rules and regulations, which should be binding on all those who should insure their property in the society; that they should be incorporated, with the usual powers of bodies corporate, and, among the rest, with power to alter and amend their bye laws and regulations from time to time; and that certain premiums of insurance should be agreed upon to constitute a fund to pay losses—enacted further, § 6, That “if the funds should not be sufficient, a repartition among the whole of the persons insured, shall be *made, and each shall pay, on demand of the cashier, his, her or their share, according to the sum insured and the rate of hazard at which the building stands, agreeably to the rate of the premiums, for which purpose it is hereby declared, that the subscribers, as soon as they shall insure their property in the assurance society aforesaid, do mutually for themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, engage their property insured (but none other) as security, and subject the same to be sold, if necessary, for the payment of such quotas.—§ 7. That these quotas shall always be so rated, as to raise and keep up a fund so that the interest thereof may be deemed by the president and directors (to be elected by the said society) sufficient to pay the annual losses and expenses. If such quotas are found necessary, the president is to publish in the public newspapers, how much the quota is of each rate of hazard per every hundred dollars; whereupon the insured shall pay the same on application to the cashier, in whose office the property is insured. Whensoever any person or persons shall neglect to pay such quotas, the assurance to him made shall cease and discontinue, from the day on which they became due until paid.—§ 8. And to the end that purchasers and mortgagees of any property insured by virtue of this act, may not become losers thereby, the subscribers selling, mortgaging, or otherwise transferring such property, shall at the time apprise the purchaser or mortgagee of such assurance; and indorse to him or them, the policy thereof. And in every case of such change, the purchaser or mortgagee, shall be considered as a subscriber in the room of the original, and the property so sold, mortgaged, or otherwise transferred, shall still remain liable for the payment of the quotas, in the same manner, as if the right thereof had remained in the original owner.”—§ 9. Provided a compensation to W. F. Ast, the author of the scheme of the society.—§ 10. “The subscribers, in default of paying the premiums at the time fixed therefor, shall, on request of the cashier, be compelled to pay the same with six per cent. interest *thereon to the day of payment; and their property shall be liable to be sold for the same as aforesaid.”

By an explanatory act, passed December 1795,—after some regulations as to the manner of calling and holding general meetings—it was enacted and declared, “That the premiums for the non-payment of which, property, agreeable to the said first recited act, may be sold, shall be understood to be those premiums only, which under the regulations to be formed by the said society, shall become payable in consequence of any insurance to be hereafter made or subscribed for with the society.”

An act to amend the act of incorporation, passed January 1799, gave the society a summary remedy by motion, on ten days notice, to recover the whole or any part of such premiums or quotas, as were then or might afterwards become due, from any delinquent subscriber or member, under his subscription or declaration for insurance made to the society: but it was provided, that this act “should not have a retrospect

Mutual Assurance Societies—Lien of—Bona Fide Purchasers.—In Shirley v. Mutual Assurance Society, 2 Rob. 709, in reference to the lien given by the legislature in favor of mutual assurance societies, it is said: “There can be no doubt of the intent of the legislature to give a valid and effectual lien, not only against the original member, but against all persons deriving any ownership of the property from him. And this lien was held by this court, in the case of Mut. Ass. Soc. v. Stone, etc., 3 Leigh 218, to attach to and follow the property in the hands of a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice of the lien or of the insurance.” The principal case is cited in note to same case on this question. See monographic note on Insurance, Fire and Marine” appended to Mutual, etc., Soc. v. Holt, 29 Gratt. 612.

Bona Fide Purchasers—When Complete.—In the principal case it is said by TUCKER, P. upon a plea of purchase without notice, if the purchaser has paid the whole purchase money, though he has not yet a conveyance of the legal estate, yet if he has acquired the preferable right to call for the legal estate he is a complete purchaser entitled to avail himself of this defence. to persons who had subscribed before the organization of the institution, and had not sent in their declaration for insurance, unless they should afterwards send them in."

An act was passed January 1805, for carrying into execution a constitution of the society then lately adopted at a general meeting, by which very important and even vital changes were made in the principles of the institution. An entire separation was made between the interests of town and country insurers; provision was made for the revaluation of houses insured in towns and in the country, respectively, and that where such revaluation should exceed the former valuation, an additional premium should be paid; and provision was also made for enabling any member to withdraw from the society, upon giving six weeks notice, and paying all arrearages due at the time of withdrawing. There was no provision in this act declaring in express terms, that the premiums or quotas should be or continue a lien on the property insured—but it was enacted (§ 16.)

221 that the several "acts of assembly previously passed, relating to the society, and all rules and regulations of the society, should be thereby repealed, so far as the same or any part thereof might be repugnant to that act—and (§ 18.) "that all debts, demands, rights, interest and claims of the society, now due or existing, or hereafter due or existing, may be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, in the name of the society, after the commencement of this act, in the same manner, in the same courts, and upon the same principles, as they may be now sued for, prosecuted and recovered," &c.

In February 1809, another act was passed, making material alterations in the principles of the institution; by which it was enacted (§ 6,) "That hereafter no quota or quotas shall be assessed upon the members of the said society; nor shall any member who may have paid his original premium, cease to be insured, notwithstanding he may have failed to pay any additional premium, quota or parts of a quota, heretofore required, and that the general meeting of the said society, or the committee aforesaid, be and they are hereby authorized to require the members of the said society, or such as may hereafter become members, to pay annually for the next succeeding ten years, such part of the original premium as they have or may deem proper, to be collected and accounted for in the mode herein after directed; Provided, that such annual sum do not exceed one fifth of the original premium in the towns, and one seventh in the country; and provided also, that no person or persons be required to pay such part of a premium, until the first day of January next after he shall have paid such original premium."

And by an act passed in March 1819, the society was again authorized to require from the members thereof, the payment of such part of the premium upon their property, as the general meeting or the standing committee should deem necessary, provided such annual requisitions should not exceed one fifth part of such premiums &c.

222 *The constitution, rules and regulations of the society, formed and adopted in general meeting on the 11th January 1805 (the same which the act of assembly of January 1805, was enacted to carry into execution) contained the following provisions: Art. 8, § 6. "Any person refusing or failing to have his building revalued agreeably to the rules and regulations of the society, shall forfeit his right to claim any benefit under his insurance, till a revaluation thereof be made; and any person failing, for the space of three months after revaluation of his building shall be made, to return thereupon to the general office a new declaration, or to pay the additional premium, if any, which may be due, shall forfeit every benefit he might otherwise claim under his insurance, till the declaration be filed, and the additional premium, if any, be paid.—§ 7. The additional premiums, required by the new rates of hazard fixed by the president and directors, shall also be paid on buildings, which may have been declared for insurance, and on which policies may not have been issued: Provided the materials of which they are erected, or their contiguity to other buildings, be such as to subject them, agreeably to the said rates of hazard, to the payment of additional premiums; to ascertain which fact, buildings so liable to the payment of an additional premium, shall be specially reported to the principal agent, by the special agent of the district, borough or town, in which they may be situated; and before policies shall be issued on such buildings, the principal agent must have like proof as is required in other cases, that the additional premiums, as well as those originally due on the declaration returned to this office, have been paid to the cashier general, or to some authorized collector of the society."

But, by the constitution, rules and regulations of the society, revised in May 1819, it was provided, art. 13, § 13, that "The failure to revalue a building shall not produce a forfeiture of the insurance nor a suspension of the same; but any additional premium, arising on a subsequent revaluation *of such building, shall be paid, with interest from the time at which such revaluation should have been made; and in case of loss by fire, of any building not revalued according to the rules and regulations of this society, before any warrant shall issue for the payment of such loss, a regular estimate of the value and hazard shall be returned to the general office; and the additional premium, if any, with interest thereon, shall be deducted from the amount of such loss; and in all such cases, the premium shall be estimated upon four fifths of the smallest valuation; according to which, the loss shall be paid."

And by the constitution of the society, under all its modifications, and its rules and regulations from the beginning, every person insured became a member of the society, and by his declaration for insurance, bound himself, in express terms, to abide by, observe and adhere to the constitution, rules and regulations, already established, or afterwards to be established, in general meeting.

In January 1821, the society exhibited a bill against James Vaughan, executor of William Vaughan deceased, and Daniel Stone, in the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, setting forth, That William Vaughan, on the 15th October 1802, made a declaration for insurance of buildings in the borough of Norfolk; and afterwards, on the 2nd January 1806, made another declaration for insurance on the same buildings, which had been revalued pursuant to law (meaning the act of January 1805). That by deed executed in May 1808, Vaughan conveyed the buildings so revalued and reassured, to the defendant Stone. That, according to the rules and regulations of the society, there was, upon the revaluation and reassurance of these buildings, duly assessed, and due to the society, for additional premiums, 76 dollars 76 cents, bearing interest from the 1st December 1806, and the further sum of 437 dollars 88 cents, the aggregate of the annual quotas of 36 dollars 49 cents, due on the said buildings so reassured, commencing in 1809 and ending in 1820, with interest on each quota from 1st April in each year, the date when it fell due. That Vaughan died in 1811, and the defendant James Vaughan was his executor. And that application had been made by the agents of the society, to both defendants, for payment, which they both had refused. Therefore, the bill prayed that the premises insured should be declared subject, in Stone's hands, to the debt due the society for premium and quotas, and sold for satisfaction thereof; and that, if necessary, the defendant James Vaughan should be required to render an account of his administration of his testator's estate, and the assets in his hands, if any he had, should be applied to the payment of the debt.

The executor of Vaughan answered, that his testator gave notice of withdrawal from the society in October 1806, and therefore, was exempt from the duty of paying any quotas subsequently called for; and that he had fully administered the assets of his testator's estate.

The defendant Stone in his answer said he purchased the premises in 1808, without notice that the vendor had ever insured the buildings or made any declaration for insurance in the Mutual Assurance Society; and he himself had effected an insurance with the Eagle Fire Company of New York, and continued his assurance there till 1818, when, for the first time, he was apprised of the demand now set up by the society; and as it was a rule of that company, as of this society, that insurance effected with any other company avoids the policy effected with it, the consequence to him was, that he had been insured in neither. That his vendor Vaughan's estate was certainly liable for the debt, in the first instance; yet the society had so long neglected to assert its claim, that the assets of Vaughan's estate, which he believed would have been sufficient to have paid the debt, and applicable thereto, if it had been timely claimed, had been probably fully administered, without notice of the claim; and this 225 laches of the society alone, *ought, under the circumstances to exonerate his property from the lien asserted, if indeed any such lien ever existed. But he denied, that the society ever had the lien it claimed. And if it had such lien on the property in the hands of his vendor Vaughan, he insisted that it was only an equitable lien, and pleaded that he was a purchaser without notice.

There was no proof, that Vaughan withdrew, or took any measures to withdraw, from the society, in October 1806.

It appeared, that Vaughan, first, by deed dated the 14th March 1806, conveyed the insured premises to James Wallace, in trust, to secure a debt of 500 dollars due to Thomas Newton as guardian of George Kelly, and to indemnify James Taylor, who was indorser at bank for Vaughan's accommodation to the amount of 2500 dollars, against loss in consequence thereof; and in this deed, Taylor and Newton covenanted, that upon tender of the money, at any time before a sale of the trust subject, they would receive the same, "and upon receipt thereof, that, they would grant good and sufficient discharges for the same, thereby releasing and waiving all power to demand of the trustee the execution of the trust therein before declared." That Vaughan's deed to the defendant Stone, dated the 23d May 1808, recited the deed of trust of the 14th March 1806, and that Stone had undertaken to pay the debts thereby secured to Taylor and Newton the guardian of Kelly; and in consideration thereof, conveyed the property to Stone, with general warranty. That, in January 1816, Taylor, by deed, acknowledged the receipt in full, from Stone of the money which he had paid as Vaughan's indorser, and released all claim under the deed of trust; and Kelly also, by deed, in consideration of satisfactory arrangements made with him by Stone, for the payment of the debt due to him, released all his claim under the deed of trust. But that Wallace, the trustee to whom the legal estate was conveyed by the deed of trust, had never conveyed or released to Stone. This was the state of Stone's title at the hearing of the cause in the court of chancery.

226 *The chancellor was of opinion, that, according to the 6th and 7th sections of the 8th article of the constitution, rules and regulations of the society, formed and adopted in January 1805 (above quoted verbatim) no policy could issue on a declaration of revaluation, unless the additional premium was paid, and the society was not responsible for any loss, unless a revaluation was made and the additional premium paid, so that no insurance was effected, and therefore no quotas could arise in such case; and that no pledge of property was ever, at any time, made by the assured to secure the payment of premiums or additional premiums: therefore, he dismissed the bill with costs. The society appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Daniel for the appellants, and by Leigh for the appellee Stone.

I. One question was, Whether Stone's purchase was so completed, as to sustain his plea of purchaser without notice? Upon which Daniel remarked, that Stone had even now only an equitable title, the legal title being yet outstanding in Wallace, the trustee, to whom it was conveyed by the deed of trust of March 1806—he cited Tourville v. Naish, 3 P. Wms. 307; Wigg v. Wigg, 1 Atk. 382, 4; Hoover v. Donally, 1 Hen. & Munf. 316; Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 38. Leigh, adverting to the peculiar covenant of Taylor and Newton, the cestui que trust, in the deed of trust of March 1806, and to the deeds of release executed by Taylor and Kelly to Stone in January 1816, said, that these were tantamount, in effect, to a defeasance of the deed of trust; and, if they did not amount quite to a defeasance, they certainly gave Stone a right to call for the legal title, in preference to all the world, which was equivalent with actually getting it in. Williamson v. Gordon's ex'ors, 5 Munf. 257.

II. Then there arose several points peculiar to the case of policies or declarations for assurance in this society. 1. Whether there was any lien provided by the 227 6th section of *the act of December 1794, on the property insured or declared for assurance, for original or additional premiums, or whether the lien was provided to secure the quotas to be afterwards called for, only? 2. Whether the act of January 1805, making so vital a change as it did, in the constitution of the society, and by separating the town from the country assurance, altering the obligation, duties and rights of assurers and assured, was not an abolition of the lien for quotas given by the original act of incorporation? If not, 3. Whether the 6th section of the act of February 1809, providing that no quota or quotas should afterwards be assessed, but authorizing the society to exact from the members, annually, for ten years, portions of the premium, these requisitions were quotas to which the 6th section of the original act of December 1794 applied, and gave a lien for, on the buildings insured? 4. Whether, in case the additional premiums or quotas were not paid, on any property declared for insurance, before the act of February 1809, the declarant was to be regarded as insured, by force of the 6th section of that act, or of the 13th section of the 13th article of the revised constitution, rules and regulations, of May 1819? If such declarant was not insured, 5. Whether, nevertheless, the effect of the 6th section of the original act of December 1794, was to give a lien on the property declared for insurance, for premiums or quotas? 6. Whether, if the lien was given, to any extent, on the subject in the hands of the declarant for insurance, such lien did or could follow it into the hands of his assignee, without notice, and though he be not insured? Lastly, Whether the society had not lost its claim against Stone, if any it ever had, by its laches in not earlier giving notice of or asserting it? In the discussion of these questions, the counsel went into a minute examination of the provisions of the several acts of assembly above quoted, and the general principles of law which, they supposed, might influence the construction and effect of them: the general course of the argument will be collected from the opinions of the judges.

228 *The following authorities were cited: Currie's adm'rs v. Mut. Ass. Society, 4 Hen. & Munf. 315; Greenhow &c. v. Barton, 4 Munf. 590; Korn & al. v. Mut. Ass. Society, 6 Cranch, 192; Mut. Ass. Society v. Watts's ex'or, 1 Wheat. 279; Stratton v. Mut. Ass. Society, 6 Rand. 22.

CARR, J. It was admitted by the counsel who argued this cause for Stone (as well as it could be argued), that by the 6th section of the original act of 1794, a lien for quotas attached to the property insured, in the hands of the insurer. But, though it was admitted as a point too plain to be argued, that this lien bound the property in the hands of the first owner, it as strongly denied, that such lien existed when the land had passed into other hands, and the broad position seemed to be taken, that the legislature could not raise a lien which should thus follow the subject into all hands. That the act meant to create such a lien, is clear from the use of the word assigns, which could have been introduced for no other purpose; nor can I doubt the power of the legislature to do this, since the law violated no right, but merely settled the terms of the contract, between the society and the insured, and left every one at liberty to become a member or not. Every man has a right to bind his property by a lien, a mortgage, for instance, which when perfected according to law, follows it into all hands. This was nothing more. The party insuring, for himself, his heirs and assigns, engaged his property as a security for all moneys due or to become due on it.

But it was insisted, that the 8th section of the same act made the insured property liable in the hands of vendees, only where they received a notice of the insurance from the vendor. That section enacts, that to the end, that purchasers, and mortgagees of property insured by virtue of this act, may not become losers thereby, the subscribers selling, mortgaging or otherwise transferring such property, shall at the time apprise the purchaser or mortgagee of such assurance, and indorse to him the policy thereof; and in 229 *every case of such change, the purchaser or mortgagee shall be considered as a subscriber in place of the original &c. It was contended, that such change meant a sale or mortgage accompanied by notice and assignment of the policy. I cannot think, that the language used renders this construction necessary; and it is most clear to me, that, so far from being the intention of the law, it would mar and prostrate the whole scheme on which the institution was founded. The law was speaking of changes of property by sale, mortgage or other transfer; and the following phrase "in every case of such change," means of a change by sale, mortgage or other transfer. If the act, meant to hold the property bound, only where the sale was attended by notice, why did it say, that notice should be given to save purchasers or mortgagees from loss? They could incur no loss, where there was no notice, if the sale to them without notice discharged the lien. There are many other considerations, which I need not state, that convince me, that such a construction would go far to destroy, at a blow, the whole institution.

But it was insisted, that the act of 1805 was a new constitution, abolishing all pre-existing laws, liens &c. I think clearly not. It was an amendment, and only abolished former laws, rules and regulations, so far as they were repugnant to that act. Such are its words. The former act creating a lien on the property insured, was so far from being repugnant, that it was the very foundation on which this amendment rested. This is apparent; for take away that act, and there is no lien on the property insured, even in the hands of the original subscribers. It was also insisted, that the company has been guilty of laches. I do not think that doctrine attaches, farther than it would to a mortgagee. The lien of the society is by an instrument under seal, which the law says binds the property, as a security for all charges growing due under the laws, rules &c. of the society; and this is the exact definition of a 230 mortgage. *There has been no such laches here as would affect the claim of a mortgagee.

There were several other objections made, but none of any weight. I think the decree should be reversed.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. 'The merits of this controversy mainly depend, upon the true construction of the laws, constitution, rules and regulations of The Mutual Assurance Society.

The scheme of this society, however simple in its principles, has, unfortunately, not been carried into effect, with an ability proportioned to the benevolence of the design. We have the authority of the act of 1794 for saying, that the plan upon which the simple idea of an association of individuals for their mutual insurance against fire, was to be carried into effect, was formed, suggested and published, by Mr. Ast; and though he may have had the aid of some professional gentleman to throw it into the form of a law, its clumsy and artificial execution can leave little doubt of its real parentage. Drawn without system, and expressed, in many instances, in terms wholly inappropriate, it is not wonderful, that it has been a fruitful source of litigation; and so deeply imbued was the first act with these defects, that all the subsequent legislation seems to have been marked by the original vice of its constitution. Such an instrument therefore requires to be construed with a liberality which will attain the real objects of the contracting parties, instead of a critical rigour which would defeat their most obvious intentions; and this, indeed, is the more proper, as the parties stand in the double relation of insurers and insured, and their contract cannot properly be interpreted, more strongly against them in one character than in the other.

Awkward as is the draft of the original constitution, it is not difficult to penetrate its real design. Contemplating an association, which might embrace every owner of a building in the commonwealth, and 231 which should engage to insure *all its members against losses from fire, it was intended, that each member of the association should contribute, to the common fund out of which losses were to be repaired, a certain per centage, called a premium, upon the value of the property he should himself seek to have insured. And as the original sum thus subscribed or contributed, would in the ordinary course of things be exhausted, unless provision was made for replenishing the fund, it was provided, in substance, that whenever the reduced state of the funds should require a further contribution, there should be a call upon the members for such contribution, and each should be bound to pay an equal per centage upon his original premium. These subsequent contributions were called quotas; and thus, if the wants of the society required that it should call for a sum equal to half the original capital, each member was called upon to pay a sum equal to one half his original premium, which was called a half quota; et sic de similibus. Having ascertained the sums to be paid by each, as contributors to the common stock in which they were interested as insurers, or (which is the same thing) the sum to be paid by each as insured, it next became necessary to provide for the enforcing of these contributions from the refractory or the backward. To effect this object, the project (whether wise or unwise) was to render the property, thus insured from destruction, and supported and upheld by the society, responsible for the payment; doubtless, upon the idea of some supposed relation between the advantage it derived, and the duty to be imposed. So it is, it was declared in the original act of 1794, that the subscribers mutually for themselves, their heirs and assigns, engaged the property insured (but none other) as security, and subjected the same, if necessary, to be sold for the payment of such quotas; that is to say, for such future contributions as might be necessary from time to time to maintain the integrity of the fund.

A question has been much discussed heretofore, whether the property insured was or was not bound for the original 232 *premium, if the subscriber failed to pay it; and, in Greenhow v. Barton, judges Fleming and Roane, though differing in the judgment they gave, seem to have agreed in the opinion, that until the payment of the premium the insurance was incomplete, and the property was not bound in the hands of the purchaser. It seems, however, to be a question of no importance in relation to the original insurance in this case, as the original premium was paid, and the assurance was of course complete; but we shall have occasion to examine it, as it respects the new declaration. Nor can it admit of doubt, that Vaughan himself was personally responsible for quotas anterior to the act of 1805, and that the property was in like manner responsible while it continued in his hands.

By that act, considerable changes were effected in the constitution of the society: some of them so vital, as to have been arraigned as unconstitutional and void. The separation of the town from the country insurance, in other words, the absolving a large portion of the society from the burdens of the contract, and thus depriving the rest of that aid in sustaining them, for which they had in effect contracted, was deemed by many, high-handed, unjust and unconstitutional. The small towns, particularly, complained of being left to encounter the hazard of the sweeping losses of the cities, without the aid of the country contributions. But this question was put at rest by this court, in Currie's adm'r v. The Mut. Ass. Society. One very salutary and acceptable provision, however, was introduced; I mean the clause which permitted any dissatisfied party to dissolve the contract as to himself, by withdrawing from the society. After the enactment of this provision, no party who did not avail himself of it, could fairly be understood to wish to give up its benefits, or get rid of the burdens it imposed.

This act has been called a new constitution, out and out; but I think it must be regarded rather as an innovation ingrafted on the original stock. It did not repeal the old constitution and laws in toto, 233 but only in such matters as were repugnant to the act itself. What was its effect upon some of the most material provisions of the first act will be presently examined. At the time it passed, Vaughan was living, and still owner of the property, and the act having authorized, and indeed required, a revaluation, he acquiesced in the measure. A revaluation was made, and he signed a new declaration, binding himself to abide by the constitution &c. of the society. A further premium was however required of him, as the revaluation proved the property to be worth more than before, which premium, it seems, never was paid by him, and constitutes in fact a part of the society's demand. It was the opinion of the chancellor, that no pledge of the property was at any time to be made to secure the payment of the original premiums, or of the additional premiums; and it appearing that part of the demand was for additional premiums, the bill was yet dismissed in omnibus. This would seem to have been an error, even if the premises were true; for, though the property was not bound, it does not follow, that Vaughan's estate, if there was any (which ought to have been ascertained), was not responsible for the additional premium which accrued in his time. For judge Roane and judge Fleming concurred in the case of Greenhow v. Barton, in thinking the subscriber personally bound for the unpaid premium, though the former thought the property was not so liable in the hands of a purchaser, and the latter supposed it not so liable even in the hands of the insurer. Moreover, unless the failure to pay the additional premium, not only left the new contract incomplete, but also abrogated the old one, which cannot be pretended, it is not easy to conceive why the bill should have been dismissed as to the whole demand, merely because a part of the demand could not be sustained.

Let us, however, pursue this subject of the non-payment of the premiums somewhat farther. The personal liability of the declarant, for the premium, has been already shewn to have been established by the concurrent opinions of judges Roane and Fleming, which opinion is sustained 234 by the 10th section of the act of 1794.

The liability of the property of the declarant, for the premium, seems equally to be provided for by the same section; which declares, that, in default of payment of the premiums, the subscribers may be compelled to pay them, and their property shall be liable to be sold for the payment of the same. The meaning of this section, is further explained by the act of December 1795, which may be considered, indeed, as part of the res gesta. From this act also it is clear, that the property was to be held liable for the original premiums, as a general principle; but, it was declared to apply only to subsequent insurances, obviously with a view to favor those who had contributed to carry the scheme into execution by becoming subscribers, but who seem, from the preamble of the act, to have been inclined to withdraw before they were irrevocably bound, unless such a provision was enacted. With these views, I intirely concur with judge Roane, that the property was bound for the premiums, while it remained in the hands of the declarant; nor can I perceive how judge Fleming, who expresses a different opinion, could avoid the force of the enactment in the 10th section. The fact, that by the law the society was not bound, while the premium was unpaid, cannot sustain this opinion; for it was not bound while a quota was unpaid, and yet it is agreed on all hands, that the property was subject to quotas. The truth is, the legislature obviously discarded (in relation to this institution) the ordinary principle of contracts, that both parties shall be bound, or neither; for it expressly provided, that the responsibility of the society for losses, should be suspended the instant a quota was in arrear, and yet left the insurer liable to the recovery of the quota with interest thereupon.

Having thus shewn, that the contract of insurance, however incomplete as to the responsibility of the society, was nevertheless complete as to the liability of the declarant, and of the property insured, while it continued his, it may next be asked, how the property can be considered as absolved in the hands of an assignee, who pur- 235 chases with notice. *If the property be bound in the declarant's hands, can he by his act remove that liability? If the contract was complete before the sale of the premises, so far as to render both person and property liable, is it rendered incomplete by the sale? I cannot think so; and cannot therefore concur in the opinion expressed by judge Roane that "the 8th section of the act of 1794, relating to the liability of purchasers and mortgagees, is confined to cases of property, the insurance of which has been perfected by the payment of the premiums." For, according to this opinion, if one declares for insurance, and then sells to another before he pays the premium, though the vendee have full notice of the assurance, the property, which in the hands of the vendor was bound, is in the vendee's hands absolved, because, as it is said, the insurance was not perfected, when the assignment was made. This does not seem reasonable; and I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that the property continues bound, for payment of premiums, as well as quotas, in the hands of an assignee with notice.

How is it as to an assignee without notice? This question becomes important to be decided in the present case, because the defendant has not only pleaded, but has shewn, I think, that he is a purchaser without notice. As this matter was much discussed at the bar, it is my duty to shew the reasons of this opinion. The rule is unquestionable, that he who would protect himself as a purchaser without notice, must shew himself to be a complete purchaser. If, therefore, either his purchase money remains unpaid, or he has not completed his title by obtaining a conveyance before he receives notice, the notice will affect him; for, if he receive that notice before both of those acts are perfected, he ought to stop until the equity is inquired into, or he will be bound by it. Sugd. Law Vend. 530. Thus, although he has paid every cent of his purchase money, and the hopeless insolvency of his vendor would prevent his ever recovering it back, yet if he has not completed his title by having a conveyance prior to his notice of the prior equity, 236 he must stop, and will not be permitted to go on to secure himself by obtaining the legal title, from the common vendor. And this is in strict consonance with justice, and in strict analogy with equitable principles. It rests upon the maxim which prevails in equity, as well as at law, Qui prior est in tempore, potior est injure, where two equities are equal, the prior equity shall prevail. If then A. has made the first purchase of an estate, he has prior equity to B. who purchases afterwards; and, in a mere contest of equities, A. must prevail; for if the vendor refused to make title to either, and a suit were brought in equity for a title, the court would obviously decree a conveyance to A. Such then being the case, as soon as B. receives notice of the prior equity of A. he becomes at once apprised of the fact, that he has the best right to the land, and that a court would so decree. It is then, obviously, a fraud in B. to proceed to get a title to that property which he knows to belong to another, though the formality of a conveyance has not been complied with. But if he has paid his money and obtained his conveyance before notice, his conduct has been fair, and having equal though posterior equity, he will be protected, because he has the legal title also, fairly acquired. He must, however, have obtained the legal title, or must shew, that, though posterior in time, he has the best right to call for the legal title. In this case, Stone most certainly has not the legal title: that legal title is in the trustee Wallace: the releases of the cestuis que trust never can pass it. But, though he has not the legal title, he has the best right to call for it. He stands, in relation to the purchase, in the shoes of the creditors whom he has paid. He bought from Vaughan with the knowledge of the creditor's claims, and upon engagement to pay them; and his case comes clearly, I think, within the principle of Williamson v. Gordon's ex'or; and he has proved, very clearly, that he had paid the purchase money.

I recur then to the question, whether an assignee without notice, will be protected in equity against the claim of this 237 *assurance society? On this subject, we have the express decision of the supreme court of the U. States in The Mut. Ass. Society v. Watts's ex'or, and also the opinion of judge Fleming in Greenhow v. Barton, that the clause of the act, which requires the seller to give notice to the purchaser, is a matter merely between themselves, with which the society has no concern, and that the property is bound in the assignee's hands without notice. Let us examine this matter for ourselves.

The contract of assurance is a covenant real, entered into by the insured with the insurer. It is a covenant entered into by the fee simple holder, whose jus disponendi is absolute. His charges upon the property by way of covenant, cannot be gainsaid by a subsequent purchaser. That purchaser, in making his purchase, takes the property cum onere, and he can only look to his vendor's covenants to protect him against the incumbrance. Like the grant of a right of way, or of a right to divert a water course, this covenant is binding upon a subsequent purchaser, who has notice of its existence, and even if he has no notice, provided the rights arising under the covenant are legal and not merely equitable. For the covenant is one of those which runs with the land. It is indissolubly connected with a covenant on the part of the society to insure against fire; a covenant which goes to sustain, support and uphold, the property which is charged. It is emphatically, then, one of those contracts, which being for the benefit of the estate, and annexed to it, passes with the title to all who purchase with a knowledge of its existence. And having taken with such knowledge, they are personally bound in respect of the estate which they hold, so long as the property continues theirs. A fortiori, the lien upon the property remains; and neither can be removed but by notice of withdrawal, as provided by law. But, not only is the assignee with notice bound both in person, and as to the property purchased; but the property is bound even without notice, whether he is bound personally or not; a question, which I do not mean to

238 touch. *For, the liability of the property is not only imposed by the party himself, in adopting and consenting to abide by the constitution, laws &c. of the society; but the act of the legislature itself declares, that the subscribers, as soon as they shall insure, "do mutually for themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, engage their property insured, as security, and subject the same to be sold, if necessary, for the payment of quotas." This charge declared and imposed by the law itself, cannot be regarded as a mere equitable claim. The jurisdiction exerted by a court of equity for carrying it into effect, does not change its nature from a legal lien into a mere equity. Like other cases, in which parties are before a court of equity, where the claim of one is superior to the other in the estimation of the law, equity will respect the legal preference. Thus, if various creditors are before the court, seeking the distribution of legal assets, the legal superiority of a claimant is duly respected. If various creditors have judgment liens, which are obstructed by a fraudulent conveyance; upon setting aside that conveyance, the eldest judgment creditor will have his priority of right duly preserved. So in this case; though equity lends its aid to the enforcement of this lien, yet it is emphatically a legal and not an equitable lien. It is declared by the law itself, as strongly as the lien on the debtor's land created by judgment in behalf of private individuals, or the lien on the lands of public defaulters in behalf of the commonwealth. It must, therefore, be treated as a legal lien, and as such it cannot be successfully repelled by the plea of purchaser without notice; a plea which can avail only against a merely equitable title.

In the argument of this case, it has been contended, that whatever may be the effect of the act of 1794, the act of 1805 contains no provision giving to the society a lien on the insured premises, for the additional premium, and the annual instalments required, by that act, or for those which have been subsequently authorized by the act of 1809. It is true, there is no such express provision in either of those 239 acts, but the first of them repeals only such parts of antecedent laws as are repugnant to itself. It left untouched the sections of the act of 1794, which declare the liability of the property insured, for the payment of the quotas. But it was said there are no longer any quotas, but instead of them, an annual contribution, first by the act of 1809 for ten years, and now continued by that of 1819, at the discretion of the society. These are, however, the same thing in effect. For, as I have already said, the quota was itself but such contribution as might be necessary from time to time, to maintain the integrity of the fund. And what else are the annual assessments made, first under the act of 1809, and afterwards under that of 1819? The terms, indeed, are changed, but the substance is the same; and so, for more than twenty years, the law has been universally understood.

With respect to some other topics, I must content myself with very succinct remarks. No fault is attributable to the society, for not giving notice to the purchaser, for it is not presumable the agent in this city is consant of the sales made in remote parts of the state. Nor am I aware, that the legal rights of the society can be affected by their omission to demand payment at an earlier day; by which failure, as it is said, the defendant Stone will be a sufferer. Whether it would have forfeited its lien by failure to give notice of it, if a notice of Stone's purchase and of Vaughan's situation could have been brought home to it, is a question which the facts in the case do not require me to examine; but without any evidence of fraudulent concealment on the part of the society or its agents, or of knowledge of the interest of Stone in the transaction, it is impossible, I think, that it can justly be deprived of its lien. I cannot but observe, that common prudence would naturally dictate an inquiry on the part of a purchaser, whether his vendor is or is not an insurer; an inquiry so easily satisfied, by an application to the public office established by the society according to law. Yet, on the other hand, 240 I will remark, that it is singular the society have not made an effort to prevent, as far as possible, disputes as to notice, by affixing, as is usual with insurance companies, some emblem of the insurance on some conspicuous part of the tenement insured. For, although I am of opinion, that, notice or no notice, the lien is preserved, yet this opinion, it is well known, has not always nor universally prevailed.

The decree entered by this court, declared, that the appellants were entitled to have a sale of the premises for the amount of their demand, unless the appellees or one of them should pay and satisfy the same within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court of chancery: therefore, the chancellor's decree was reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded in, according to the principles here declared.

241 *The Auditor of Public Accounts v. Dugger and Foley.

November, 1831.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Tobacco Warehouses—Effect Where Amount of Duties Insufficient to Pay Officers' Salaries—Liability of Commonwealth When Tobacco Burned.—Though a tobacco warehouse established by law, shall not yield a sufficient amount of duties, to pay the inspectors' salaries and rents to the proprietor, for three years in succession, yet such warehouse is not thereby ipso facto discontinued, under the 3rd section of the statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 220. and if inspectors continue to be duly appointed, and so the inspection be in fact kept up, and such warehouse be burnt, the commonwealth is liable to make good the loss to the owners of tobacco there inspected and deposited within the year preceding the loss, under the 67th section of the statute.

Claim against Commonwealth—Doubtful—Interest.—A claim against the commonwealth is presented to the auditor, which though just is yet doubtful, and therefore the auditor disallows it: and an appeal is taken from the auditor to a court of justice, which adjudges the claim against the commonwealth: Held, in such case, the court ought not to allow interest.

Same—Interest—Quære.—Whether, in any case of a claim adjudged against the commonwealth, interest should be given?

Dugger and Foley, having each had seven hogsheads of tobacco in Westbrook warehouse, Petersburg, and the warehouse, with their tobacco in it, having been destroyed by fire, presented their respective claims against the commonwealth, for the value of their tobacco so destroyed, to the auditor of public accounts. The auditor disallowed both claims in toto; and they took an appeal to the superior court of chancery of Richmond, according to the statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 174, § 6, p. 2.

Claim against Commonwealth—Doubtful—Interest.—On this question the principal case is cited in footnote to Skipwith v. Clinch, 2 Call 233; Stearns v. Mason, 24 Gratt. 494. See monographic note on "Interest" appended to Fred v. Dixon, 27 Gratt. 541.

The claims were founded on the 67th section of the tobacco inspection law, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 220, p. 166, 7. The auditor disallowed them, mainly upon the ground,—that, at the time the warehouse was burnt, it was not an existing public warehouse established by law, but ought to be regarded as a warehouse discontinued under the 3rd section of the statute, Id. p. 137.*

242 *In the court of chancery, the two claims were presented together, and proceeded in as one cause, and the facts were agreed, as follows: Westbrook warehouse had been, for a great many years, a public warehouse established by law for the inspection of tobacco. But, for more than three successive years before it was burnt, the duties received from it had not amounted to a sum sufficient to pay the inspectors' salaries and the rents of the warehouse. Nevertheless, during those three years, and in the year when the fire happened, the inspectors had been regularly and annually recommended by the county court of Dinwiddie, and commissioned by the executive, and no proceedings had ever been had or commenced for discontinuing the inspection. Dugger had seven hogsheads in the warehouse when it was burnt, which had been inspected there; but of these five had been inspected, and the inspectors' receipts for them bore date, more than a year before the fire; the other two had been inspected within the year. Foley had seven hogsheads in the warehouse, all of which had been inspected there, within the year preceding the fire, and was burnt with it.

The chancellor directed a commissioner to ascertain the value of the tobaccos. He reported that Dugger's five hogsheads that had lain in the warehouse more than a year, was worth 561 dollars, and his two hogsheads inspected within the year, 120 dollars—and Foley's seven hogsheads, all inspected within the year, 642 dollars 243 —at the time they *were destroyed by the fire. Whereupon, the chancellor decreed, that the auditor should give his warrants upon the treasury, to Dugger for 120 dollars, and to Foley for 642 dollars, with interest thereon from the date of the loss. From which decree, the attorney general took an appeal to this court.

And in the argument to the cause here, he insisted, 1. That the commonwealth was not bound to make good this loss: that the warehouse having failed for three successive years, to yield an amount of duties sufficient to pay the inspectors' salaries and the rents to the proprietor, the inspection was ipso facto discontinued by operation of law; that this must necessarily be the construction of the 3rd section of the statute, since no particular method of proceeding was provided to discontinue an inspection, in such a case; that as, therefore, the inspection had been kept up in violation of law, and as only the surplus of duties imposed on tobacco inspected, over and above the inspectors' salaries and the rents, was paid into the treasury, and was the only premium which the commonwealth received for the insurance of tobacco, it was unreasonable and unjust that it should be held to insurance in this case, in which it received no premium. 2. That the decree was erroneous in giving interest. The commonwealth ought in no case to pay interest. It provided funds for the payment of all its debts. If claims against the treasury, presented to the auditor, were plainly just (as in most cases they were) the officers of the treasury allowed, and paid them, on demand. If the claims were doubtful, it was the auditor's duty to reject them; in which case, the laws gave the claimant a most summary remedy, by appeal to the courts of justice to decide the question of right. The commonwealth was obliged to confide the liquidation of claims to its officers, and to rely on their judgment and discretion. It was impossible to impute it as a default to the commonwealth, that it should not pay what the proper officer, the auditor, thought an unjust de-

244 mand; *and the auditor, having no motive to commit the injustice of rejecting claims concerning which there was no reasonable doubt, must be presumed, whenever he disallowed a claim, to act fairly according to the duty of his office. There had been cases, indeed, in which interest had been adjudged against the commonwealth; but there had been cases also, in which it had been denied to the claimant; and he believed it would be found, that, whenever the point had been made, interest had been denied. In Lilley's case, 1 Leigh, 525, the point was made, and interest was denied by the court, according to the opinion of Green, J., Id. 528. In the state of that case, in the report p. 526, it was stated, that the judgment of the circuit court was "for five years full pay with interest from the 22nd April 1783:" but that was a mistake: the judgment of the circuit court was for the five years full pay without interest; and this was the judgment that this court affirmed.† As to the case at bar, it could hardly be denied, that the claim was doubtful at least, and very doubtful, in principle; neither was the value of the article ascertained; it was not only a disputable, but an unliquidated, demand: therefore, however right it might be to allow interest in cases differently circumstanced, it ought not to be allowed here. Kerr v. Love, 1 Wash. 172; M'Connico &c. v. Curzen, 2 Call, 358. At any rate, the interest ought not to have been carried back beyond the date of the demand made at the auditor's office.

*§ 3. provides, that "In case any warehouse now or hereafter to be established, shall not, in the space of three succeeding years, receive a sufficient quantity of tobacco to pay the inspectors' salaries and rents of the warehouses, the inspection of tobacco at such warehouses, respectively, shall be thenceforth discontinued, unless the same shall be supported at private expense."

†§ 67. provides, that "If any warehouse, already or hereby or hereafter to be established, shall happen to be burnt, the loss sustained thereby for tobacco either there inspected or stored, shall be made good and paid to the several persons injured, by the commonwealth, and no inspector or inspectors shall be held accountable for the same in consequence of any receipt by him or them given; provided, that if the receipt given be of an older date than twelve months"—"such tobacco shall not be paid for by the public, but the owner or proprietor thereof shall bear the loss."—Note in Original Edition.

*Upon looking into the original record, I find that the attorney general was right: there was the mistake he pointed out, in the state of Lilley's case, in my report of it.—Note in Original Edition.

Macfarland for the appellees, contended, 1. That the 3rd section of the statute was merely directory to those officers of government, upon whom it depended to continue or discontinue a particular inspection; namely, to the justices of the county court whose duty it was to recommend, and to the executive whose duty it was to commission, inspectors, only at such inspections as ought to be continued, and to omit the recommendation and appointment of inspectors for warehouses that ought no longer

245 to be continued. This *was the method provided by law for discontinuing inspections, when the duties ceased to yield enough to defray the charges. It was impossible to hold, that the planter, seeing an inspection existing de facto, was bound to examine the state of the accounts returned to the treasury, of the duties collected for three years before he brought his tobacco for inspection, to see whether the inspection was properly kept up or not.

2. As to the claim of interest, he said it was material to consider the nature of the claim, and of the duty which the commonwealth had taken upon himself. The law required the planter to carry his tobacco, intended for exportation, to some public warehouse for inspection, and to leave it there in the care of the inspectors, who were officers of the public, not bailees of the planter; and the commonwealth, levying a duty upon all tobaccos inspected, professedly to provide a fund to indemnify the planters against losses by fire, undertook to insure the property. It was tantamount to a contract of assurance; the planters paid the premium, in paying the duties; and, it was well known, that the fund thus provided, had greatly exceeded what was necessary for the avowed object, and that these duties had been made a source of revenue for general purposes. The commonwealth, then, was bound to insure the planter; to indemnify him against loss by fire. Whatever was the true measure of his loss, that was the measure of justice to be meted to him. Then, plainly, his loss was the value of his property at the time it was destroyed, with interest from that time till retribution was made to him: the interest which the principal would have yielded, was as much a part of the loss as the principal. If the proper officer of the government, charged with the duty of adjusting such claims, should think a particular claim doubtful, and disallow it, and drive the creditor of the public into the courts of justice; the officer might be blameless in this, but yet he acted for the benefit of the commonwealth; and if he should reject a claim as doubtful, which turned out to be just, the 246 public, whose agent he was, and not the injured creditor, ought to *bear the consequences of his mistake: the public ought to pay, not the creditor to lose, the interest. As well might any ordinary insurance company refuse to pay interest on losses, which its agents refused, whether with or without reason, to adjust and pay. As to these claims being unliquidated, they were no otherwise so than that the market value of the tobaccos at the time of loss, was to be ascertained by evidence; which was the case in every instance of the kind; and, if that were to justify the auditor in disallowing these claims, and should be held to exempt the commonwealth from the duty of paying interest on such claims during years of litigation, the planters, who were compelled to bring their property to the public warehouse, to leave it there, and trust to the insurance of it by the public, would, in every case, be only partially indemnified. It was, however, the duty of the auditor to ascertain and adjust the loss, as well as to give his warrant upon the treasurer for the payment of it.

CARR, J. These claims are founded on the 67th section of the tobacco inspection law; and, as it is agreed that the tobaccos for which the chancellor has given the appellees a decree, were in the warehouse and consumed with it, there could be no doubt as to the liability of the commonwealth to pay for them, but for the 3rd section of the act. It is agreed, that for the three successive years preceding the fire, this house had not received tobacco enough to pay the warehouse rents and salaries of the inspectors; yet that no step had been taken to discontinue the inspection, but on the contrary, that for those years inspectors had been regularly recommended by the county court, and commissioned by the executive. Under this state of things, the attorney general insisted, that the inspection was ipso facto discontinued by the law, and could not be kept up by the improper conduct of the county court in recommending inspectors, or of the executive in commissioning them. But I cannot think so.

It has long been the policy of the 247 commonwealth *to take into her own hands the regulation of this staple; and many are the laws, and various the duties and penalties imposed, all having for their object, the improvement of that article, and the benefit and security of those who make and those who deal in it. A number of public warehouses are erected, to some one of which all tobacco must be carried. There it is to be inspected by officers, appointed, commissioned and paid by the public, and there it is to remain, the inspectors giving receipts describing each-hogshead, and binding themselves to deliver it to the owner or his order when demanded for exportation; with many other regulations which it is needless to enumerate. The 3d section, which enacts that warehouses not receiving tobacco enough to pay the rent and salaries of the officers, shall be discontinued, is made for the benefit of the commonwealth, that she may not be burdened, in such cases, with the payment of these expenses. The returns directed to be annually made, both to the county courts and the executive, enabled these bodies to ascertain at any time, when under this 3rd section, a warehouse was to be put down; and the regular way to effect this, was to omit the appointment of inspectors. This would at once give notice to the planters, that there was no longer an inspection at the place, and they would take their tobacco elsewhere. But so long as they found the inspection in full operation, the officers attending and doing business as usual, they had occasion to look no further, and would never dream of going to the county court to find out whether the receipts of the warehouse paid the expenses. I think, therefore, that wherever the inspection was kept up by the commonwealth, she was bound to pay the planter for any tobacco deposited there, and lost by fire, if it had not been stored more than twelve months.

The question of interest remains to be considered. It has been several times discussed, whether the commonwealth is liable to pay interest on claims against her; but, as a general doctrine, I do not think it has been decided exactly on what footing she stands in this respect. In the 248 *case of Com. v. Lilley, interest was refused, not on general grounds, but because of the intrinsic difficulty of the questions, which was thought to excuse the government from the imputation of any wrongful delay in refusing to satisfy the claims, without a judicial decision. As there are only three judges present, I think it safest to pass by the general question for the present, and to decide this point on the particular circumstances of this case. And I am of opinion, that they are such as justified the auditor in referring this matter to the decision of the courts; and, consequently, that no interest ought to be given.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. Two questions are presented for the consideration of the court in this case: 1. Is the commonwealth responsible for the demand of the petitioners? and if it be so, 2. Is the commonwealth bound to pay interest upon the sum which may be found to be due?

The demand arises under the 67th section of the tobacco inspection law; and the commonwealth's exemption from liability is claimed under the 3rd section of the same law. Upon the agreed state of the facts of the case, I am clearly of opinion, that the commonwealth is liable for the tobacco of the claimants. The provision of the law does not, in my conception, operate ipso facto a discontinuance of the warehouse. It is merely directory to the functionaries of the government. So long as they continued to appoint inspectors of the warehouse, so long were the tobacco planters justified in looking upon the establishment as a public establishment. The discontinuance of the warehouse was to depend upon the state of the accounts; upon a comparison between the disbursements and receipts; a comparison which it was the duty either of the county court or of the executive (both of which were in possession of the returns) to make, before each annual appointment of inspectors. It could not have been the design of the act, that 249 every tobacco *owner should, before his deposit in a warehouse established by law, go to the records of the county court, or to those of the government in Richmond, and examine into the state of accounts. Such a regulation would have been attended with embarrassments not to be long endured, and the loss, as the owners of tobacco are compelled, nolens volens, to deposit it in some public warehouse, previous to exportation.

The question relating to interest is more important, and not so clear. It is contended, that the commonwealth engages by the statute, that she will make good the loss of tobacco sustained by the owner; that she discharges the inspectors and assumes their responsibility; and that as the inspectors would have been liable to interest, the commonwealth must be so. But I am of opinion, that, whatever may be the general principle, interest ought not to be allowed in this case.

Decree reversed, as to so much thereof as allowed interest, and affirmed as to the residue.

*Newell v. Mayberry.

November, 1831.

[23 Am. Dec. 261.]

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Pleading and Practice—Variance between Allegations and Proof.—Declaration in assumpsit on a written agreement, takes no notice of a note subjoined to the agreement, limiting its continuance to a day certain: the agreement offered in evidence on the general issue, has such note subjoined thereto: Held, this is a fatal variance between the agreement laid in the declaration and the agreement offered in evidence; and the agreement is not admissible evidence, unless it appear that the note was subjoined, without the plaintiff's knowledge or consent, and so was no part of the agreement.

Contracts.—Agreement between M. and N. that if N. can get possession of a runaway slave belonging to M. before a certain day, N. shall have the slave at a stipulated price, and that the agreements shall continue in force only till that day: N. gets possession of the slave, after the appointed day, and continues to hold him: Held, M. may maintain an action for the slave, but not for the stipulated price.

Same—Alteration—Effect.—If a written agreement not under seal, be altered by the party claiming under it in a material part: Held, he can never recover upon the agreement so altered, nor can he avail himself of the contract in its original and true form: there is no distinction between deeds and other written instruments, in this respect.

Assumpsit by Mayberry against Newell, in the circuit court of Botetourt. The declaration alleged, in substance, that a written agreement was made by and between Mayberry and Newell, and signed by Newell, on the 2d July 1816, whereby it was agreed between the parties, that Newell should give out that he had purchased a slave named Lewis from Mayberry, or had exchanged with him a slave named Reuben for Lewis, and should try by all means in his power to take Lewis; and when taken, Newell was either to keep him, and settle with Shepherd for the price of him, or deliver him to Mayberry, at Newell's option; and if Newell kept him, no deduction was to be made for taking him; but if he delivered him to Mayberry, he was to receive 20 dollars for his trouble: that Mayberry had purchased the slave Lewis of Shepherd, for 621 dollars, and the slave, at the time of the contract, had absconded from May-

Alteration of Instruments—Effect.—The alteration of an agreement or any written instrument if made by an obligee in a material matter without the assent of the obligor destroys the agreement. Yeager v. Musgrave, 23 W. Va. 111, citing Newell v. Mayberry, 3 Leigh 250, also a large number of other cases in other states. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 544; Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 107. See monographic note on "Contracts" appended to Enders v. The Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364; Art. "Alteration of Instruments" in 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 180.

berry's service: that Newell did regain 251 possession *of the slave Lewis on the 20th July 1816, and elected to keep him, and to pay Shepherd the price of him; and had ever since and still claimed, under the agreement, and held the slave, as his own property, and refused to take 20 dollars tendered to him for his trouble, and to restore the property to Mayberry; and yet Newell did not, and would not, pay Shepherd the above mentioned price of the slave, and Mayberry had been compelled to pay the same to Shepherd by reason whereof Newell became liable to pay Mayberry the said sum of 621 dollars, and being so liable, in consideration thereof assumed to pay the same to him. Yet Newell had not paid him the same, but the same to pay him hitherto always had failed and refused &c. Newell pleaded the general issue. Verdict and judgment for Mayberry, for 621 dollars, with interest from the 10th November 1816.

There were six bills of exceptions filed to opinions of the circuit court in this case:
 it is only necessary to notice three of them,
 the second, fourth and sixth.

The second stated, that Mayberry offered in evidence at the trial, the written agreement mentioned in the declaration, which was in these words:

"Memorandum of agreement made this 2nd day of July A. D. 1816, between T.
 Newell and T. Mayberry. Said Newell is to give out that he has purchased negro Lewis, or exchanged with him for negro Reuben, and to try all means in his power to take said Lewis, and when taken said Newell is either to keep him and settle with Shepherd for the price of him, or to deliver him up to said Mayberry at his option, that is, Newell's; if he keeps him, no deduction for taking him, and if he delivers him up to Mayberry, then he is to receive 20 dollars for his trouble. And the said parties bind themselves on their honour, that neither of them will ever divulge or communicate this agreement to any person whatever, either directly or indirectly, except Job Moore—(signed) T. Newell. This agreement to be in force until 12th July."

252 *Whereupon Newell's counsel objected to the reading of this paper in evidence, on the ground that it was variant from the instrument described in the declaration, in which no mention was made of the note at the foot of the agreement limiting it to the 12th July; and though it was therein averred that Newell regained possession of the slave on the 20th July, yet there was no allegation that the agreement had been extended afterwards beyond the 12th July. But the court,—being of opinion, that the variance was not such as should prevent the paper from being given in evidence to support this declaration, that if Newell had intended to take advantage of the variance, he ought to have done so by way of plea, to which Mayberry might have had an opportunity to reply, and that Newell could not take advantage of the variance by way of objection to the evidence,—overruled the objection, and permitted the paper to be read in evidence to the jury.

The fourth bill of exceptions, after setting out the written agreement again in hæc verba, stated, that Newell's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that, as it appeared by that instrument, that the agreement was to be in force only until the 12th July 1816, if they should find that Newell did not get possession of the slave till after that day, they ought to find a verdict for him, in this action; because, in such case, Mayberry would have been no wise bound to permit Newell to retain the slave as his own property, and Mayberry would have had an action to recover the slave himself or his value, but could not maintain an action on this agreement. But the court refused to give the instruction.

The sixth bill of instructions, repeating the agreement in hæc verba, stated, that Newell's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that if it should find from the evidence, that the agreement had been altered, after it was executed, by Mayberry himself, without Newell's consent, whether in a material or immaterial part,—or that it had been altered by a stranger, without Newell's consent, in a material part,—in either case, the jury ought to find for New-253 ell. And, *thereupon the court instructed the jury, that if it should find from the whole evidence, that the agreement had been altered, since the execution of it, in any material part, without Newell's knowledge and consent, either by Mayberry or any other by his procurement, then the agreement ought to be wholly disregarded by the jury, and it ought to find for Newell, unless the contract should be substantially proved by other evidence; but, if the jury should find, that the agreement had in fact been altered, whether in a material or immaterial part, but had not been so altered by Mayberry himself, or with his consent, or by his procurement, in such case the jury ought to disregard the altered parts only, and find accordingly.

To these opinions Newell's counsel excepted, and appealed from the judgment to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant: Johnson for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. I am of opinion, that the words, this agreement to be in force until the 12th July, if underwritten at the time of the contract, or afterwards and before that date by the mutual consent of the parties, did constitute a part of the contract between them, and a most material part of it, since it limited (as I conceive) the right of purchase on the part of Newell, to the 12th July. Until that date he had a right to keep the slave, if he chose to do so, under the contract, and pay Shepherd for him. But after that date, he had no such right. If he detained him, he did not detain him under the contract, but of his own wrong, for which he was responsible in another form of action, but not in this. The declaration, therefore, having set out the contract as indefinite, and the contract being in fact limited, the variance was fatal, in this action, upon the trial of the general issue. If, indeed, Mayberry had offered proof, that these words were not subjoined by the parties as part of the contract, and that they were neither added by himself nor by any other at his instance or with 254 his connivance, then the *paper should have gone to the jury, with an instruction, that if it believed such evidence it should disregard those words; in which case, the agreement would have corresponded with the declaration. I am, therefore, of opinion that the circuit court erred in the points stated in both the second and fourth exceptions.
